SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARTLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

I stood on the verge of a distant strife.
As nighter embraced the morn.
And saw a amongst the worlds affair.
A come wheel the radiant car
Of the smiling new year born.
Whistlers and moons went sailing past.
Like lightning's flash! so fast!
With angels to the funeral
Of the departed year.

Though space seemed like a shoreless sea—
The stars as distant lights—
I saw the myriad spirits flee
To the bulwarks of eternity,
And perch upon their heights.
Then every angel dropped a tear,
As they laid the gray head of the year.
In the tomb, 'mid the burial
Of days for ever gone.

FROM THE AUTHOR'S SCRAP BOOK.

How many good old customs and feelings, which once made the poetry and music of domestic life, are fast disappearing from the homes of England. We remember the time—and summer yet lingers on our brow, although certain spectral silvery hairs warn us that it is nearly past—when Christmas was looked forward to, not only as a relaxation from care, and the wearying struggles of the world, but as the heart's holiday; when the heads even of the humblest families, like the patriarchs of old, gathered their children, and their children's children, around them at the hospitable board, and counted them as blessings.

At Christmas, too, the mother's love—that silken thread on which life's only real pearls, our affections and sympathies, are strung and held together—was frequently employed in the sweet work of reconciliation; few natures, however stern, could resist her prayers and tears—offending ones were recalled and forgiven—brothers, whom cold interest had estranged, met once more as brothers should meet—and sisters exchanged again the innocent confidence of childhood. It was a season of smiles and tears in most households;—smiles for the happy present, tears for those whose vacant places round the hearth could never more be filled.

Maternal love is the divinity of woman's nature.
The tie which keeps her children united by encircling them in affection's chain, once broken, earth has naught else that can supply the loss: the separation of most families dates from the mother's grave.

To return to our subject. Christmas, except in a few remote districts, is no longer a family festival, but a noisy fête-day—an occasion for display and lavish expenditure. The presence of strangers desec-rates the hearthstone, and causes the meeting to degenerate into a mere fashionable party; its religious character and household influences are gone. The angels who, on the first dawn of Christmas, proclaimed peace on earth and good-will to man, may soon, we fear, sing its funeral dirge.

New Year's Day, which so speedily follows, has,
we grieve to say, equally declined in importance.
The world is too busy to occupy itself with such old-fashioned anniversaries. In great cities it is scarcely noticed, unless by the poorer classes—generally the last to abandon national traditions—and the bell-ringers, who, either from a love of their craft, or to entitle themselves to a share in certain parochial funds left by our pious ancestors, still obstinately insist on ringing the old year out and the new one in.

Not even May-day—when the teeming earth sends forth its silent prayer in the grateful perfume of a thousand opening flowers—has escaped the indifference of the age to the feelings and traditions of the past. Nature alone continues faithful—her vast altar still sends forth its incense; but the worshippers are either absent, or reduced to the outcasts of humanity, in the group of "Jack in the Green—my lord and my lady," who, in the crowded streets of our vast cities, levy a mercenary contribution on the patience of the passers-by.

Elizabeth loved the May-day games, and honoured them with her presence. Shakespeare has enshrined them in his immortal verse; but progress, as it is called, has put them down. We wish that progress for once would take a lesson from the crab, and march backwards. Why should materialism, in its pursuit of the real, run so far a-head, that the poetry of life is left behind?

If Michaelmas has met with a better fate, we suspect that it is owing to rent-day and the stubble goose so generally sacrificed on the occasion. Those who are most indifferent to flowers or music have a profound regard for gold and feasting. With such men, all that remains of heart has taken refuge in the stomach, or—a worse place—the pocket.

O for the England of my boyhood! Its manly games, and cheerful sports! which kept the body healthful, and the mind at peace. There was no time for morbid feelings then. Youth, in the present age, is too intently occupied to heed such simple pleasures. Excitement! Excitement! is the cry. We have few boys now; they step from the school-room to the world—the hot race of life commences—and its struggles prematurely stamp them men.

Have we gained by the change? Modern society will answer yes; age and philosophy smile sadly, and shake the head.

Dreams! dreams! we think we hear some of our fast readers exclaim. Possibly; but they are not the less truthful. Beauty lies in the ideal, and true happiness is more closely allied to dreams than the wide-awake ones of the earth suspect.

If we have dwelt thus long in our musings and regrets on the decadence of the four great festivals of the year, it is that some important event in the course of our tale will be found connected with each of them.

London excites wonder and admiration when viewed in its ensemble, but appals when studied in detail. It is impossible for the mere observer to thread its streets without being struck by the hum of busy life—the well-dressed crowds pouring like a continuous stream in every direction—the glaring shops—the well-appointed equipages, and heavily-laden vans transporting the world's merchandise from one point of the metropolis to the other—unmistakable signs of industry, prosperity, and wealth.

This is the picture as Claude might have painted it—sunny bright and cheering; but Rembrandt would have treated the subject in a widely different manner—his view would have been taken at night, when poverty, fierce hunger, and reckless crime emerge from their retreat, imitating the tiger's instincts in seeking their prey in darkness.

It is not, however, to be supposed that even a picture by Rembrandt would be all shade; on the contrary, wondrous lights, bright as the falling star, would flash from his canvas startling episodes of moral beauty, proving humanity not to be all of clay.

Thousands of our readers who have heard of the Belvedere-road are, we suspect, profoundly ignorant of its locality. They have a vague suspicion that it lies somewhere between the West End and the Borough, Temple-bar, or Paddington; and there all idea of its topographical position ends.

For the benefit of these unlearned persons, we shall proceed to describe not only its exact situation, but add a slight sketch of its peculiar physiognomy.

The Belvedere-road is a long, irregular, narrow, dirty street, commencing on the Surrey side of Westminster, and terminating at the foot of Blackfriars bridge; it runs parallel with the Thames.

Although serving as a relief to those great arteries of London, Parliament-street, Fleet-street, and the Strand, by diverting no inconsiderable portion of heavy traffic, in the shape of wagons, carts, trucks, and vans, it is but little frequented by foot-passengers, probably because it is only partially paved, and in wet weather, from the lowness of its situation, becomes a mere tract of mud.

In 1847—the period at which our tale commences—the houses in the above-named locality were of the meanest and shabbiest description, and inhabited chiefly by sawyers or draymen, employed in the wood yards and breweries, and also, we regret to add, by a far less respectable description of characters—fugitives from justice; men at war with society, playing at hide-and-seek with the world, and trusting to the chances of the coming night for a dinner the following day.

Lately, we are told, several of those pioneers of gentility, the over-worked, under-paid race of clerks, have ventured to squat in the neighbourhood (pardon the Americanism), and an improved state of things is slowly taking place. We are inclined to believe this; for the last time we ventured to visit it, we observed that the line of gloomy, comfortless-looking houses—whose windows required no blinds (dirt supplying their place)—was broken by the erection of several smart-looking new ones. True, they had no pretensions to architectural beauty—a thing we have long ceased to look for in London; but they were clean. The first step has been taken; and we sincerely trust the example may prove what the locality has long been—contagious! Barbarism and civilisation, represented by their champions, filth and cleanliness, are in contact. The struggle may be long, but the result is inevitable. Dirt must eventually succumb.

Before passing under the arch of Waterloo Bridge, which intersects it about midway, the Belvedere-road takes a capricious bend, leaving a large semicircular piece of ground, occupied as a timber-yard, at the back of which stands a row of low-built cottages, forming a sort of irregular crescent.

One of these cottages had been inhabited for several years by an exceedingly poor family, named Markham; and yet the Markhams had no right to be poor, for the father was an intelligent, well-educated man, thoroughly conversant with accounts, and possessed of no mean talents for business. Unfortunately there was one drawback—disappointment had made him a drunkard: in his moody humour he frequently cursed destiny instead of his besetting vice for his misfortunes, and wondered why everything failed with him. A child might have given him the key of the enigma.

At the age of twenty-one, George Markham had married Rachel Bently, the only child of a wealthy city merchant, in whose counting-house he had been reared. Although the marriage took place during the absence of the father in India, where the affairs of the firm had called him, it was not altogether a clandestine one, for the mother of the bride gave her consent, and sanctioned it by her presence.

Unfortunately, Mrs. Bently died suddenly—a week or two before her husband's return; and a letter, written on her death-bed, explaining, it is supposed, the motives of her conduct, could not be found.

It would be difficult to decide whether indignation or surprise predominated most in the heart of Mr. Bently, when, on his arrival in England, he found his daughter the wife of one of his clerks. Apart from the inequality of the match, it destroyed the cherished hope of years, the prospect of uniting her to his nephew, Carus Kearn, a junior partner in the house.

Although the merchant really loved his child, he had never been very demonstrative in his feelings; pride and affection were both wounded, and anger is an unwise counsellor.

"You have chosen for yourself," he said, in answer to Rachel's passionate entreaties for forgiveness. "You had your mother's sanction; mine, it seems, was of little consequence. The wife of my clerk, George Markham," he added, coldly, "cannot remain under my roof. Her home is beneath her husband's. I leave London for three days, on a visit to my old friend Thornton. On my return I shall not expect to find you here."

"Oh, that letter!—that fatal letter!" sobbed the poor girl, in an agony of grief.

"It would not alter my determination," observed her father, coldly.

With these harsh words he quitted the room, and proceeded at once to the counting-house, where his first act was to send for his son-in-law into his private office, and dismiss him from his employment; his next, to pay him the sum of a thousand pounds, the amount of a legacy which a distant relative had left to Rachel.

"I had hoped," observed the young man, deeply stung by the proceeding, "that you would have acted more generously, sir, and permitted me at least to retain my situation. I have served you faithfully."

A sneer, expressive of doubt, curled the lips of Mr. Bently.

"Have you anything to urge against my character, sir?" demanded the speaker, proudly.

"An accountant has gone through the books," replied the merchant, deliberately; "and everything appears to be correct."

"Everything is correct," exclaimed his son-in-law, impetuously.

"I trust so," was the calm rejoinder; "and the house will give you the usual references in the event of your obtaining another situation; though probably," added the speaker, in a sarcastic tone, "you will enter into business on your own account."

"Probably," repeated George Markham, carelessly, for he felt that he was harshly used. "Good morning, sir."

One person besides the two whom we have just introduced to our readers had been present at the interview—Peter Mangles, the oldest clerk in the establishment. He and Richard Bently had been boys together, and, independent of the relation of servant and employer, the strictest friendship united them. Whatever Peter did was sure to be found well done. He had all the accounts of the house at his fingers' ends, and, on more than one occasion, had rendered eminent services, by his experience, knowledge of the money market, and great aptitude for business.

In person Peter Mangles was exceedingly thin, and had a slight stoop, doubtless from his many years' labour at the desk; his features were sharp, intelligent, and marked by great benevolence; there was an almost child-like simplicity in his manners, and a slight dash of eccentricity about him out of business. Probably, because he was a bachelor, many considered him without one tie or interest in the world. They were in error; the counting-house was his world; he knew no other.

As the speaker was quitting the private office, the old clerk looked up from his desk and pronounced his name.

George Markham turned.

"I am sorry you are about to leave us," said Peter, extending his hand to him, a thing he had never done before during the number of years they had known each other, "for you have great talent for business, only a little too speculative; but that is the fault of youth. Good-bye," he added; "if ever you require a friend, you know where to find one."

"Thank you! thank you, Mr. Mangles!" replied the young man, in a tone which showed he was not insensible to kindness, especially at such a moment. "You, I am sure, never advised that an accountant should be sent for to examine my books."

"No! Certainly not."

"You believe me honest?"

"As honest as my ledger," replied the old clerk, emphatically, at the same time striking the book before him with the open palm of his hand; "and if any one doubts it, tell them that Peter Mangles said so."

This was a proud testimony to his integrity. George Markham felt it as such, and his heart beat the lighter as he quitted the private office of his father-in-law and late employer.

Mr. Bently felt doubly dissatisfied; in the first place with himself, for conscience whispered that he had acted harshly to his child; and in the second, with his confidential clerk, whose conduct annoyed him.

"I think you might have chosen some more fitting place," he said, with considerable asperity, "to display this sudden ebullition of friendship for one who has so deeply wronged me."

"But not a more fitting time," observed the old man, mildly.

"And you still believe George Markham to be honest?" added the merchant.

Peter Mangles nodded his head affirmatively.

Despite the missing securities for ten thousand pounds, which unfortunately are negotiable in India, continued the speaker, impatiently.

Peter scratched his right ear, a habit he had contracted when anything went wrong in the firm, or the state of the money-market puzzled him.

"Can't make it out! can't make it out! but I shall do so one day. Never rested for a week after the loss. One thing, however, is certain, your son-in-law knows nothing about them; he never had the keys of the iron safe in his possession an instant."

"Were the securities ever there?" demanded his employer, doubtfully.

The clerk appeared painfully surprised. "Placed them there myself," he exclaimed; "took the keys home with me, and slept with them, as I have done for the last five-and-twenty years, under my pillow; in the morning they were gone. There are only two sets of keys," he added, "yours and mine. Did you take yours with you to India?"

"No."

"That was wrong."

"I left them," said Mr. Bently, "in the secret drawer of my cabinet, where I found them on my return. George Markham must have been frequently at the house, and —"

"Rubbish!" interrupted the former. "I tell you he is honest. I have watched him from a boy; always found his petty cash right to a farthing. You may just as well suspect me," he continued; "in fact, I am not quite certain you do not; one injustice generally leads to another."

"It is you who are guilty of injustice now," said the merchant, with a smile; "but I forgive you, for you mean well. We must not quarrel."

"I am not quite so sure of that," observed Peter Mangles, in a tone in which wounded feeling and anger seemed to contend; "in fact, Richard Bently, I begin to feel it necessary that we should quarrel; I shall be better after it. I am certain something dreadful will happen to the firm," he continued, "if we do not; for whilst you were talking to poor George in that unchristian, unbusiness-like manner, I made a wrong entry in the ledger, and two blots! two blots, sir!—two on the same page!! Look through the books for the last thirty years, and you will not find such a disgraceful thing; and all through you, Richard," he added, reproachfully—"all through you!"

In his excitement the speaker had quitted his stool at the desk, and as he stood in the centre of the room a singular resemblance might be traced in his appearance to that of a respectable jackdaw—a cathedral one, of course. His thin legs, cased in tight black pantaloons and well polished hessian boots, the head and shoulders bending forward, and the palms of the hands crossed behind the back of his narrow-tailed body-coat.

"You forget my feelings," answered his employer.

"Rachel has broken my heart."

"Pride is breaking it," muttered the old clerk.

"Married a beggar."

"Beggars!" repeated Peter. "I see we must quarrel, there is no help for it. Beggars! What were you, when a foolish but true friend lent you all he had to commence business with? George Markham has all that you then possessed—industry, talent, and integrity. Discard him, disown him, crush him, if you will! but, mark my words, he will make a bright man of business yet! It was not without good reasons, I feel assured, although I have not the slightest idea what they were, that your late wife consented to the marriage. She was a good woman, Richard, and—"

"I cannot listen to this, even from you," exclaimed the merchant, impatiently. "Let us drop the subject."

"But I can't drop it! I won't drop it!" replied the former, nervously. "You have disappointed me sadly, Richard; I knew you were as obstinate as a mule, but never suspected before that you could be positively wicked; your conduct, I repeat, is unlike a father, unlike a man of business. When a house fails, no sensible creditor closes the account by thrusting their acceptances into the fire. No; he waits for a dividend; and Rachel's marriage, properly treated, will still pay twenty shillings in the pound."

Despite his anger, Mr. Bently could not avoid smiling at an argument drawn from the daily pursuits of the speaker.

"Could any one in his senses," continued the old man, "unless he wished to ruin him, have given a young fellow in George's state of excitement, a thousand pounds?"

"It was his right, Peter," observed the merchant.

"No, it was not. Rachel is not yet of age. It will all be lost in some dreadful speculation! His calculations must prove false, for his brain is no longer cool. He will be ruined, and his father-in-law gratified. I feel much better now I have relieved my mind," added the clerk. "I knew I ought to quarrel with you, and it's done. There are the keys of the iron safe, Mr. Bently; there are the books, and you may send for an accountant to go through them as soon as you please."

Peter Mangles took down his hat from the peg where he had been in the habit of hanging it for nearly forty years, pulled it over his brow with an air of intense determination, and prepared to leave the room.

"You cannot mean to leave me?" exclaimed his astounded friend and employer.

"Indeed but I do, Richard."

The words were evidently uttered with a violent effort, and vibrated on the heart of his hearer.

"And what shall I do without you?"

"Can't imagine; but badly enough, no doubt," replied Peter, all but crying.

"And the firm; the edifice we have both so laboriously reared; the first house in the City? I can never trust the books to any one else."

This was Peter's weak point, perhaps his only one; but he looked upon the firm as something he had assisted to create, and for the first time his resolution wavered.

"You have a nephew," he muttered.

"Carus is a good young man, but he has not your experience," observed the merchant. "Come, come, old friend, take back the keys; we began the race of life together, and must not separate at the close of our career. The disobedient ones deserve a lesson."

"Well! well! perhaps they do," murmured the old clerk, trying to conceal his tears, "provided it is a wise one."

"Leave all things to time," added Mr. Bently; "the truest judge."

It is more than probable that the speaker was sincere when he thus hinted at the possibility of a future reconciliation with his offending child; at any rate, Peter believed him to be so, for he walked back to his desk not without a certain air of satisfaction, hung up his hat, and, in a few minutes, forgot all that had taken place in the columns of figures before him.

It is not to be supposed that the old man's talents for business were the only considerations which induced the wealthy merchant to make this seeming concession. They had been companions in boyhood; it was the money of Peter Mangles which gave him his first start in business, and his name had long since appeared in the firm but for his constant and repeated refusal of the offer.

"No! no! Richard," he used to say, whenever the subject was broached, "I am very well as I am; have more money than I know how to spend. I may be a good servant, but I should lose all confidence in myself were I a principal. You will find me much better as your clerk than your partner." And a clerk he remained.

As Peter Mangles predicted, the thousand pounds proved an injury rather than a benefit to George Markham and his sorrowing wife. Instead of taking a situation, the young man started in business on his own account. For some time he struggled bravely; a helping hand might have saved him, and changed embarrassment into prosperity; but there was no one to stretch it forth. Despite his exertions, the crash came at last, and brought ruin in its train.

The creditors, satisfied that he had acted honourably by them, spared him the shame of seeing his name in the Gazette, contented themselves with taking everything, and left him a beggared man.

There is a latent strength—a power of endurance, in woman's nature, unknown to man—unsuspected even by herself, until the hour of trial calls it forth to exercise a healing ministry, pour the sweet balm of consolation on the wounds the world has irritated, heal the galled mind, and whisper future hope.

Such a consoling angel did Rachel prove to her unhappy husband. Never had she appeared more cheerful, or smiled upon him so tenderly, as in the hour of misfortune. The task was a painful one, but a wife's and mother's love sustained her; and if at times, when alone in the cheerless lodgings to which they had removed, she felt her courage fail her, a glance at the cradle of her first-born restored it.

For several months George Markham remained without employment. To a mind naturally active, idleness is a fearful counsellor. In poor or rich, it matters not which, it generally leads to vice, unstrings the heart, renders its feelings morbid, robs morality of its tone, and manhood of its energy.

It was not long before the unhappy man yielded to this sad influence, which betrayed its presence in the most debasing form, by leading him to drink.

Frequently would he resolve to break the fatal spell, and promise his wife, who felt both shocked and alarmed, to abstain from the intoxicating draught which stole away his reason; but the draught, unfortunately for his happiness, was too cunningly mixed—a hand he could not see prepared it, and his promises were no sooner made than broken.

In consequence of this degrading vice, its wretched victim lost situation after situation, till at last he could procure no regular employment, and became reduced to write for a law stationer in Parliament-street, who only gave him work occasionally; for the man had a staff of steady, respectable copyists, on whose regularity he could depend, and he felt it a duty not to let them remain idle.

Thus, year after year, the Markhams descended in the social scale, till they took up their abode in the cottage in the Belvedere-road, where a second child, a girl, was born in poverty and misery.

On more than one occasion an appeal had been made to the paternal feelings of Mr. Bently, but he continued inexorable. His pride was too deeply stung; and, let us add, his affection.

Frequently when returning home of an evening from his club, the wealthy merchant had encountered his son-in-law and a worthless companion named Styles, whom he had turned from his employ for irregularity, rolling in the street drunk, and the sight had so disgusted him that his heart became harder than ever. Little did the father of Rachel imagine that these encounters had been cleverly arranged, and still less did he suspect by whom.

Equal care had been taken that Peter Mangles should witness the same revolting spectacle, and it grieved the old man sadly; for he had a horror of excess, it was so unbusiness-like. The kindness of his nature, however, did not allow him to abandon Rachel, whom he continued to assist from time to time, sparingly indeed, for fear her husband should expend the money in dissipation, but always with words of good advice, and without solicitation.

It is now time that we should speak of the offspring of this unhappy marriage—we do not use the word unhappy in the ordinary acceptance of the word, for affection yet lingered in the hearts of both. Despite his habits of intemperance, George still fondly loved his wife, who never forgot, even in the hardest of her trials, that he was the lover of her youth, the husband of her choice, the father of her children. There was the tie, the golden link in affection's chain which bound her; had it been iron it must long since have broken.

Richard, the eldest of the children—he had been named after his grandfather—was now in his thirteenth year; and despite the privation in which he had been reared, not only a handsome, but a well-grown, healthy boy. He had his father's intelligent, open brow and clustering hair, joined with his mother's deep blue thoughtful eyes, and much of her gentle, affectionate disposition; his strength was in his heart.

Nature had done more for him than education. True, he could read and write, and possessed a slight knowledge of arithmetic. There his instruction ended.

Devotedly fond of his mother and little sister Mary—a fairy-like, lovely child, now six years old—Richard did everything in his power to alleviate the sorrow he shared, and render their home less cheerless during the frequent absence of his father at the tavern.

"I shall soon be strong enough to work for both of you," he frequently exclaimed, "and then there shall be no more want."

On hearing this, Mary would clap her tiny hands, laugh, and make him promise to buy her a new frock, whilst Rachel smiled through her tears.

There is something noble as well as touching in the love of a fine manly boy for his mother. It is the green sapling which may one day become a staff for her declining age, and repay—if it be possible for a child ever to repay them—the cares and tenderness lavished upon his infant years. It is a bright promise—a germ of hope—the spring time of a happy future.

CHAPTER II.

But whilst in peace abiding
Within a shelter'd home,
We feel as sin and evil
Could never, never come;
But let the strong temptation rise—
As whirlwinds sweep the sea—
We find no strength to escape the wreck,
Save, pitying God, in Thee.—MRS. HALE.

It was the first day of the parting year, and the Markhams were seated at the scantily-spread breakfast in their clean but humble cottage. George, whose eyes were still bloodshot, his throat parched from the excess of the preceding night, refused to eat anything, although he eagerly drank the tea his patient wife poured out for him. True, it was exceedingly weak—but it quenched his burning thirst, calmed the feverish excitement which caused his hand to shake as he raised the cup to his lips.

There was very little bread and no butter on the table; the money which should have purchased a fresh supply had been spent at the tavern. Rachel divided it silently between the children reserving only a small crust for herself.

"I am not hungry, mother," whispered her son, putting the largest portion of his back; "and you ate nothing last night."

Little Mary, too young to comprehend the misery around her, began eagerly to eat her share.

The father felt annoyed, as most drunkards do, at a reproach, even when it is an indirect one.

"You were playing with Jack Manders last night," he observed, in an angry tone of voice; "don't let me hear that you do so again."

"You shall not, sir," replied Richard, respectfully; for his mother had studiously inculcated in his youthful mind the lesson of obedience.

"I like Jack," exclaimed Mary, laughingly; "he gave me a cake last night."

"You should not have taken it," said George Markham.

"Oh, but I like cakes," replied the child, "and was so hungry."

Rachel pressed the little speaker in her arms to prevent her saying more, and did not even regard her husband; woman-like, she wished to spare him the humiliation. The child, however, was not so easily satisfied, but persevered in her questions.

"Because his father was a thief, my love," was the reply; "and his uncle, with whom the boy lives, is a returned convict. He is training his nephew badly."

Mary did not exactly understand what the words thief and convict meant.

To prevent further conversation on the subject, George Markham rose from the breakfast-table, with the air of a man who feels dissatisfied with himself, and proceeded to a smaller one, covered with law papers, near the window. Several times he attempted to write, but his hand shook so that he found it impossible to proceed.

"How nervous I am this morning," he muttered, at the same time throwing down the pen impatiently.

His wife regarded him mournfully. Memory recalled the time when he was a far different being.

"I must take a turn in the fresh air," he added, "to set me right."

Rachel knew by bitter experience what setting him right meant. The tavern! the dram!

The unhappy victim of dissipation took up his hat and quitted the cottage, without daring to cast a look on those whom he had so cruelly injured. He had no money with him—a circumstance, unfortunately, but of little consequence; he could always obtain credit at "The Crown and Magpie," in Westminster, his obliging friend Styles being answerable for his score.

And yet the dupe continued blind!

"You will wait for my return, Richard," said his mother, after a pause, during which she had reflected on the possible consequences of her son's intimacy with Jack Manders, and resolved, at any sacrifice—even to that of parting with him—to put an end to it.

The boy promised; and Rachel, taking the last trinket she possessed—a locket, containing her father's hair—from a small workbox, prepared to leave the house to dispose of it. The rent was due that very day, and she had not a shilling to meet it. As the broken-hearted creature gazed on the memorial of other days, recollections of her home, and the love that had surrounded her there, crowded upon her, memory's and feeling's fountains were alike unsealed, and, sinking on a chair, she wept bitterly.

"Don't cry, mother," exclaimed her son, throwing his arms around her neck and kissing her; "I cannot bear to see it."

"My tears are for you, Richard," answered his parent.

"For me!"

"Should you yield to temptation, follow the example of your evil companion, and become, like him, a thief, it would kill me."

"No fear of that, mother," replied the boy, drawing himself proudly up; "I would starve first. But I can't—I won't see you starve," he added, with a burst of feeling, "if I can prevent it."

"Honestly," sobbed Rachel; "say honestly, Richard."

"I meant honestly, of course," murmured the lad, in an under-tone.

Somewhat reassured, the anxious woman left the house to dispose of her last resource, and in less than an hour returned, but only with a few shillings. One was spent in purchasing food, the rest carefully wrapped in an old cambric handkerchief and placed in the workbox, which neither her husband nor the children ever touched, knowing how dearly she prized it.

Leaving by far the largest portion of the food she had obtained by so painful a sacrifice for George, his wife, accompanied by her son, who carried Mary in his arms, set out for Blackheath. She had resolved to implore the assistance of Peter Mangles, not for herself, but for her boy, to save him from crime and shame. She could have consented to a far greater humiliation. He was her pride—her hope—her life's last stay!

"He will not refuse me," she thought; "the good old man will aid me."

Doubtless the hope of the speaker would have been realised had she seen him, but, unfortunately, New Year's eve was the only day in the year on which her friend dined and spent the evening with the clerks of the firm.

When George Markham returned to the cottage, he was surprised to find Rachel and the children absent. As the hours passed, the feeling changed to annoyance. He disliked being alone, for solitude brought reflection. To occupy the time he seated himself at the table, and began to write; but he loathed the task, which became doubly painful as the dram lost its effects, and his hand again became unsteady.

In this irritable state of mind he heard a peculiar whistle.

"You may come in," he said, opening the door; "my wife is not here."

A sullen, hard-featured man, with beetle brows, shabby-genteelly dressed, lounged into the room. It was his evil genius, Tom Styles.

"Alone!" exclaimed the fellow, looking around him with the air of a broker taking stock of the furniture.

"Rachel is absent," replied her husband.

"So much the better," said the tempter, with a sneer. "There is a match at 'The Crown and Magpie,' won't you come?"

"Can't."

"Why not?"

"I have no money."

On any other occasion, Styles would have offered to frank him; but the present one was too favourable an opportunity for his purpose to permit such an act of liberality.

"That's a pity," he observed, "for Bob is sure to win; and something might be made on it. There will be rare sport. Have you nothing to pawn or sell?"

"Nothing," murmured the wretched man; "all has been parted with."

His visitor looked round the room a second time, but saw nothing that would fetch even a few shillings, till his eye rested on the workbox.

"Rather a pretty thing that," he observed, advancing to take it up.

"Don't touch it," cried George Markham, stepping between the speaker and the object of his curiosity; "it is my poor wife's,—my first gift to her. We have wanted bread, but I never had the heart to ask her to part with that."

"More fool you, then," said Styles, sneeringly.

"What is in it?"

"Only a few letters."

"And money?"

"Money!" repeated the drunkard; "where should Rachel procure money? It is long since her—"

The speaker suddenly paused. He had taken the box in his hands, and something rattled inside; it sounded like silver.

Styles laughed ironically.

"I told you there was money in it!" he exclaimed.

George Markham slowly raised the lid, as if afraid of his own act. At the bottom of the box were four half-crowns and a shilling.

"It is for the rent," he exclaimed. "She has sold the locket her father gave her," he added, after examining the rest of the contents. "It would be sacrilege to touch it."

"Of course it would, although you might win pounds with it."

"Pounds!" repeated his dupe, with a bewildered look.

"And pass a pleasant night into the bargain."

"How so?"

"Didn't I tell you there was to be a match at cribbage between Bob and Harry Turner?" replied the ruffian. "Bob is sure to win."

"No, no!" cried the drunkard, greatly excited; "it would be base—unmanly! Fallen, degraded, lost as I am, I cannot descend to rob my wife!"

"Rob!" repeated his visitor. "How can a man rob his wife? What's hers is his; he can take everything but her wedding-ring. I've heard Sneak, the lawyer's clerk, say so a dozen times. But as you please," he added, "as you please. I'm off to 'The Crown and Magpie.' A pleasant evening to you, and a happy new year."

The last words were uttered in a mocking tone, as the speaker quitted the cottage of the man whose moral ruin he had so nearly effected. He walked slowly up the Belvedere-road, and lingered on Westminster Bridge, in the expectation that his dupe would overtake him, for he knew how weak his resolutions were. For once, however, he was disappointed—he arrived at the tavern alone.

Had Rachel returned, there is little doubt that her husband would have remained firm, or, at the worst, asked her for a portion of the money; but as night drew on, and the wretched man sat alone, without fire or light, in his miserable home, the nervous impatience—the burning thirst—the desire for excitement grew stronger: he could resist no longer.

"I may win," he muttered, as he took the contents of the box.

A deep blush—the silent reproach of his unworthy action—mantled on his cheek as he did so; but the mad fever in his blood proved stronger than the sense of shame, or the reproaches of a half-stifled conscience. The next instant he was in the street; the means of intoxication in his pocket, home and wife were forgotten.

It was nearly ten o'clock when Rachel and her children, weary and foot-sore, reached their desolate abode.

"Are you here, George?" she asked, as she crossed the threshold.

There was no reply. Oh, how bitterly did the silence fall upon her heart.

Little Mary began to ask for food.

"Directly, my love," said her distracted mother, "directly." The rent—the threat of the landlord of turning them into the streets—the impossibility of replacing the sum—were alike forgotten at the cry of her child. She groped her way to the little table, caught up the workbox, and opened it. The money was gone.

For the first time since her marriage the lips of Rachel curled in scorn at the heartless conduct of the man for whom she had sacrificed so much, who had sworn at the altar to be a protector to her—it was but a momentary feeling—grief mastered anger, and she sank heart-crushed upon a chair.

"What is the matter, mother?" exclaimed Richard, placing his sister, whom he had hitherto held in his arms, upon the floor, and running to her.

"Nothing! nothing! only a momentary weakness. I—I am better now."

"George must not be made to blush before his boy," she thought. "I will not destroy the respect of the child for his father."

The resolution was a womanly, but a useless one. Her son more than suspected the cause of her grief.

"We will go and seek your father," she said, at the same time taking Mary in her arms, "and then you shall have food, my love."

"But I want it now," sobbed the child. "I am so hungry."

"He cannot have spent it all," thought Rachel; "something must be left."

Richard said nothing, but his reflections were dangerous; he compared the warning his father had given him on the subject of Jack Manders, and the abstraction of the contents of the workbox.

Lessons of virtue and honesty, without the practice, seldom make a lasting impression, even from a parent's lips.

There was a great crowd at the bar of "The Crown and Magpie;" the landlady, a stout, vulgar-looking woman, with red ribbons in her cap, a profusion of false curls, a heavy gold chain round her neck, and numerous rings on her fat fingers, was busily engaged in pouring out gin for her customers—the regular ones she was treating; for it must not be forgotten that it was New Year's eve.

"Here's to you, misses," said a bleared, asthmatical cabman, tossing off his glass.

The landlady nodded in acknowledgment of his civility, and drank hers. The man regarded her with a look of profound admiration.

"That's the tenth, since I've been here!" he observed to a brother whip, a short stumpy fellow, half buried in an enormous cast-off livery coat, which had once served some aristocratic coachman. "Who says that Old Tom is bad for the constitution? It's my 'pinion it's worth all the doctor's—stuff in—ugh—ugh!"

A violent fit of coughing interrupted his praise of the poison which was slowly destroying him.

Although the mistress of "The Crown and Magpie" could take her glass as well as most women, she never filled it from the same tap she served her customers from, or drank during business: her glass had been filled with water.

We can imagine the intense disgust of her admirers had they discovered the cheat.

"Oh, it's mother's milk to some people," exclaimed a fast-looking youth, who had been chatting for the last half-hour with two showily-dressed girls, lounging in front of the bar, but without calling for anything.

"Can't have my place crowded and taken up on a night like this," said the landlady, tartly; annoyed, probably, at the laugh the observation had excited.

The lad put his hand into his pocket, and pulled out half-a-crown, which he threw upon the counter with an air of great dignity, and called for a pint of gin.

There were no more complaints of the bar being crowded.

Such was the scene of vice and dissipation which met the eye and sickened the heart of Rachel, when, with little Mary in her arms, and protected by the presence of her son, she ventured into the house.

"Is Mr. Markham here?" she inquired, faintly.

The question had to be repeated several times before she could obtain an answer.

"Can't tell the names of any of my customers," replied the mistress of "The Crown and Magpie," snappishly.

"Perhaps you will oblige me by ascertaining."

"Too busy, mam! Hot water, Sally! Three and eight-pence, sir. Half-and-half, directly!"

"You can't go in there," shouted the landlady, as Rachel was making her way towards the parlour. "Mine is a respectable house: I allow no females beyond the bar."

"But I am Mr. Markham's wife."

"So they all say," answered the woman, with a sneer.

There was a coarse, mocking laugh from the crowd of half-drunken wretches standing near. The eyes of Richard flashed angrily, but the voice, and still more, the imploring look of his mother, restrained him.

"Let us return home," she said, in a despairing tone. "I feel faint and sick at heart."

And leaning on the arm of her son, the unhappy wife tottered rather than walked from the place.

The keen frosty air partially restored her strength, and Rachel proceeded with her children till she reached the thoroughfare leading through St. Margaret's churchyard towards the Almonry, when a faint moan from Mary, whom she still carried in her arms, arrested her steps. She placed her hand under the thin faded shawl which covered her; the child was cold as ice and shivering, as if seized with an ague fit.

"She is dying!" groaned the terror-stricken parent—"dying for want of food!"

The heart of her boy could endure no more—it was breaking. The cup of misery and endurance had been filled to overflowing. His brain was on fire—tears could not quench it.

"Take her home, mother," he cried; "take her home! never fear but I will bring you food. Mary shan't die. I'll beg—beg," he added; "anything to save her."

"Richard! Richard! do not leave me," shrieked his agonised parent; "let me not lose both my children! If you love your mother, return; for pity's sake, return!"

The appeal came too late. Her son, stung, madened beyond endurance by the sufferings of those so dear to him, had broken from her feeble grasp, darted down the thoroughfare, and was already beyond the reach of her voice.

Rachel clung to the railings of the churchyard for support, till a second moan, fainter than the first, sent a pang through her maternal heart.

"She must not die in the streets," murmured Rachel. "Home! home! if I have strength to reach it."

"O God," she cried, with a sudden burst of anguish, "protect my boy; shield him from crime; guard him against the vices and the hideous snares which in a thousand forms assail unfriended youth; or take him," she added, solemnly, "take him in Thy mercy!"

It was a Christian's prayer wrung from a mother's heart, uttered in faith, in agony, and tears; and angels bore it to the mercy seat on high.

Clasping her perishing child yet closer to her aching bosom, the drunkard's wife hastened towards her home.

When Richard Markham, yielding to the promptings of despair, quitted his mother and sister in the streets, it was with the fixed resolve of procuring them food. He felt as if he could have torn it from the jaws of a hungry tiger, rather than return without it. The plaintive moans of little Mary, the cry of her distracted parent, rang in his ears, and he continued to run, heedless of the course he took, till he found himself in St. James's-park, where he relaxed his speed, and paused to recover breath.

"What am I to do?" he asked himself; "there is no succour here."

"What am I to do?" he cried again, as he passed the long range of leafless trees, whose skeleton arms he more than once imagined waved menacingly above his head as they moved in the night wind's pitiless blast; "there is no succour here."

The scene was in truth a desolate one. Snow upon the ground; snow, crisp to the tread, and cold as the world's charity. The evergreens in the Inclosure bent beneath its weight; and the lake was one sheet of solid ice, save where the keepers had broken it for the wild fowl, whose mournful solitary cry startled, at intervals, the silence of the night.

By way of contrast with this dreary picture, broad gleams of light were streaming from the windows of one of the splendid mansions upon Carlton-terrace; sounds of music heard, and shadows distinctly seen upon the curtains, as the young, the gay, and happy, flitted past them in the dance.

The boy regarded them wistfully.

"If they only knew," he thought; "if they only knew."

There are but too many of the favoured children of fortune who take care not to know; who guard their feelings as strictly as they do their game, and look on poverty as a poacher interfering with their sport.

Our hero was not the only person in the park whose attention had been excited by the contrast which the scene within and the scene without the house afforded. A tall, well-dressed man stood listening to the music and regarding the windows. Richard approached, with the intention of imploring assistance; but when the moonlight revealed the stern features of the gentleman, his heart failed him, and he walked on, determined to try the next person whom he encountered.

He had not proceeded far before he met a lad of his own age, who, after regarding him for an instant, to convince himself that he was not mistaken, called to him to stop.

It was the youth his father that very morning had warned him against—Jack Manders!

Jack was a perfect type of the thorough-bred London street boy—wiry as a terrier, agile as a squirrel, slippery as an eel, cunning as a fox, and experienced beyond his years. Yet all was not bad in him. It was the training that had twisted and distorted the plant; in a better soil, and in careful hands, it might have grown straight enough. From the time he had first known our hero, Jack had taken a great liking to him. Other lads scoffed and reproached him with his father's being a convicted felon. Richard never alluded to it. He was fond, too, of little Mary; and frequently showed his partiality by buying her fruit or cakes.

Although half a head shorter than Richard, he was much stronger, and his limbs more muscular; perhaps it was because he was better fed.

"You here!" he exclaimed, in a tone of unfeigned surprise; "vel, I never! Wot's your game?" Seeing that the youth did not understand him, he added, "What brings you here?"

"I scarcely know," replied the poor boy, dashing aside a tear. "I am half mad. My mother and sister are hungry—starving! And I came to —"

His heart was too full. He could not pronounce the word "beg."

"See if you could pick up anything," said his acquaintance, finishing the sentence for him; "and very right, too. I'd do anything rather than see my mother or sister starve, if I had 'em."

"How do you live, Jack?" demanded Richard. "You have always money; and are so warmly clothed!"

"O—I live by my work," replied the lad.

"At what work?"

Jack Manders felt rather embarrassed for an answer.

"You know," he said, after a pause, at the same time favouring our hero with an exceedingly knowing wink.

"Indeed, I do not," observed our hero, innocently.

"Well, then, I help myself to what I can."

"A thief!" exclaimed his hearer, with a shudder. "I am sorry for you—very sorry, Jack; for you have been kind to me and Mary."

"It ain't my fault," muttered the young pick-pocket, sullenly. "I asked for work—real work, I mean—often enough; no one would give it me, because my dad was a convict; they all flung that in my teeth; you never did, and that's why I like you. I wanted to go for a soldier, but was too young. I even went to the penitentiary to ask for something to get an honest living by. They could do nothing for me. They said I hadn't been convicted. It was a bad time for me," he added; "uncle used to kick me out of the house, and tell me to go and earn bread. At last he showed me how to earn it, and I have never wanted food, clothes, or money since. No more sleeping under the arches, but in a comfortable bed!—no more hunger! Why shouldn't you do the same?"

"Not whilst I can work," replied our hero.

"Work!" repeated Jack, with a laugh. "Who'd give you work? My father was a thief, and yours is a drunkard—there ain't much difference. And as for begging! only try it; and see how soon the peelers will grab you. Bless you," he added, in a confidential tone, "the beaks punishes it as bad as priggish; a month at the mill is the least they gives for it."

Richard Markham wrung his hands in despair.

"There ain't no danger," continued the speaker, in a whisper, "if you only keeps your senses about you. I'll show you how it's done. Do you see that cove a starin' at the winders? just watch me, and see how quickly I'll clean him out."

The person to whom he pointed was the old gentleman, whom his companion had previously noticed, and who, regardless alike of the cold and lateness of the hour, still remained with his eyes fixed upon the mansion, and plunged in a profound reverie.

Perhaps he was contrasting it with the home of his own childhood; or, sadder still, one from which mirth and music had long since fled.

"No, no," exclaimed our hero.

"I wouldn't let my mother and sister starve," repeated Jack, whose motive was rather the desire of securing a comrade whom he could like and trust, than a desire to degrade him to his own level.

"Neither can I," muttered the youth, with desperate resolution.

The speakers advanced slowly towards the gentleman, whose back was turned to them. Jack, all confidence, and proud of an opportunity of displaying his skill and hardihood to his companion, who began once more to hesitate, lag behind, and tremble at every step.

Suddenly he stopped.

"Come on," whispered his companion.

"Impossible!" said Richard. "I can starve, but will never become a thief!"

The mother's prayer was heard!

At first the pickpocket felt inclined to be angry; but he recollected the time when he had entertained the same scruples.

"See me, then," he whispered. "I'll do it."

A mist seemed to pass before the eyes of our hero; he never had more than a confused recollection of what followed. He heard Jack cry, "Run! run!" as a policeman, who had been watching them from behind the trunk of a tree, sprang from his place of concealment and attempted to seize him. The culprit escaped, and Richard was a prisoner.

"I've got one of the varmint, at any rate," exclaimed the officer of police.

"What's the matter?" demanded the gentleman starting from his reverie.

"You have been robbed, sir."

"I am no thief, sir," cried Richard, breaking from the strong grasp that held him, and throwing himself at the feet of the stranger, "though poverty and hunger tempted me to become one. My mother and sister are starving."

"A likely story," said his captor, who had drawn his truncheon, and once more secured him; but the poor boy clung so desperately to the gentleman whom his companion had robbed, and pleaded so eloquently, that the heart of the stranger was touched.

"His story may be true," he said. "No violence, policeman. I believe you know me."

The policeman touched his hat.

"What is your name, boy?"

"Richard Markham, sir," replied the boy, hesitatingly.

The gentleman repeated it slowly after him.

"And have you a father?" he added.

"Yes, sir."

"What is he?"

Perhaps it was eccentricity—perhaps a better feeling; but the gentleman not only determined to spare the youth the shame of being sent to a prison, but—if his tale proved true—to snatch him from the perils of poverty, by giving him a chance of living honestly.

"Did this lad actually take my pocket-book?" he said, turning to the policeman.

"Well, no, your honour; can't swear that he did. But he was with the young rascal who has got it; and —"

"Enough," interrupted the questioner; "the loss is not a very serious one. Follow me to the gate with your prisoner, and procure me a cab. Boy," he added, "I will give you one chance of redeeming yourself, and becoming an honest man, by placing you where you shall be well taken care of."

"And my mother! My poor mother!"

"If she possesses a right feeling," answered the stranger, "she will rejoice at your escape from crime."

"Never!" exclaimed Richard Markham; "the suspense, the agony, would kill her."

"Take him to prison," said the gentleman, turning to the policeman.

The threat prevailed. The prison, our hero well knew, would be worse than suspense, or even death itself to his fond parent.

"I will go with you, sir," he faltered.

Poor fellow his heart was almost broken. More than once the idea of escape presented itself as his captors conducted him from the park through the canteen into Parliament-street, but he was too closely guarded. The cab was called, and he entered it, accompanied by the man who, either for good or evil, appeared to have taken such a singular interest in his fate.

Before driving off, he noticed that he placed a sovereign in the hands of the policeman.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

No position is more responsible than that of a writer for youth. If a man should ever tremble, it should be when he essays to impress convictions upon youthful minds; for in them he will touch chords strung by the Infinite Creator, which will echo and re-echo from hill to hill down the valley of life, and reverberate along the shores of eternity. A thought struck into a young mind! Who shall tell what it will bring forth? It may overturn empires, reconstruct states, metamorphose philosophy, and remodel the fabric of society. A single seed-thought in the minds of Luther, Franklin, Gall, and Watts, led the way to the changes and victories with which the world has been startled within the last three hundred years, and which have put a new face upon, and a new heart into, human affairs. It is so with almost every mind, even those whose doings have been all within themselves. A thought has started a new life, established a new earth, and spread a new heaven in the soul. Often in minds unknown to fame there are revolutions not less wonderful and extensive in their influence than those which suddenly shock and stir the world. The deep river runs still. The silent influences of the sun are mightier far than the storm or the earthquake. Every mind passes through changes that outvie in grandeur and importance the revolutions of the whole world in any one century, and all these may be, and no doubt often are, sensibly affected by a single thought.

A good thought or a virtuous impression may redeem a whole life from sin and misery; and a bad impression may work a corresponding amount of ruin, with all their secondary and ultimate results, which no human stretch of thought can comprehend.

We stand amid mysteries momentous and grand. The nerves of the universe of intelligence are strung about us beneath the visible creation, and we touch them, turn which way we will. Every touch from every human creature produces a wide sensation, either pleasant or unpleasant, agreeable or painful, according to the wisdom or folly of the touch, or its virtuous or vicious nature. He who stands in any of the nervous centres of this universal body of intelligence, of course produces the greater sensation according to his position.

These facts cannot fail to impress us with our personal responsibilities, and ought not to fail to affect duly and deeply him who occupies any position among the instructors of youth.

Youth, impassible, ardent, earnest; full of gladness; just emerged from innocent childhood; swelling with ardour, ambition, and hopefulness; without experience, wisdom, or discretion; pressing toward manhood, eager to do its great work—who does not love it?

The youth of to-day are the children of yesterday. The sports and frolics of yesterday have lost their relish this morning. They are too childish now. They have not meaning, importance, dignity enough. With the morning sun of youth there came a new order of feelings, a new class of desires, fresh, warm, impulsive, and clamorous. They ask for something they have not yet seen, or felt, or known. The young look out into the world, and behold all fresh, fair, and beautiful. They behold a field opening before them, wide and boundless as appears the vision of the future to the gaze of untainted eyes, and full of objects of interest that dazzle and bewilder the sight. They pant for the beauties and joys of this glorious, flower-strewn field of life. Which way they look they are delighted. Pleasure's hall, ambition's camp, love's rosy bower, mammon's mansion, learning's retreat, religion's sacred temple, all glitter on their sight; and the impulse within them is to go out and enjoy the realities that appear so entrancing to their view; as though to go out was to enjoy them.

Like a young mariner at the shore of the ocean, gazing out with a panting heart to be upon its mild, beautiful bosom, little dreaming that far in the distance it is nursing the storm and the whirlwind, to toss high his frail bark, and perhaps shatter it to atoms, is youth gazing forward upon the bright sea of life, which his young and untaught imagination paints before him. Such is youth. It has great desires, but scanty means for giving them gratification; splendid visions of glory in the far-off distance, but little power to bring them within its reach; noble aspiration and glorious hopes, but little ability to attain their objects; mighty impulses for great and good achievements, but little wisdom and prudence to direct them; lofty conceptions of the attainments with which it would enrich its mind, the laurels with which it would crown its brow, and the honours with which it would mantle its shoulders, but little of that dauntless moral courage and firmness of purpose which are necessary to do battle with the ills and evils of time, and force a hard-earned victory out of the hands of life's relentless marauders. It is quick and impetuous, with little foresight; it sees every rose, but not the thorn; it is delighted with the beds of flowers about it, but knows not that the serpent is lurking below; it is in rapture with the rainbow, but dreams not that it is painted on a wreath of vapour; it has a wide-spread sail, but little ballast; a mighty force in the engine, but a pilot unused to the sea; it is rich in anticipated treasures, but poor in all that is requisite to obtain them; it is weak, while dreaming of strength; ignorant, while professing to much knowledge; pure, while unconscious that the miasmas of corruption are rising around it; innocent, confiding, and inexperienced, while not aware that smiling and deceitful tempers are lurking on every hand to lure it into the gilded walks of ruin and death. This being youth, and its beautiful but perilous situation, it appears but reasonable that every benevolent soul should endeavour to point out some of the dangers with which the young are surrounded, and suggest such courses of conduct, such principles of action, and inspirations to virtue and honour, as shall tend to render them safe, and direct their feet into the paths of peace, duty, and progress.

We are social beings, made to assist and encourage each other, as well as for mutual pleasure. If we each stood alone, apart from all others, like an isolated iceberg, and sought only our own happiness in a selfish, unamiable state of mind and course of conduct, how cheerless and forlorn would be our lives.

Little should we know of the real joys of soul, the solid bliss of life which we might possess by obedience to the dictates of our social nature. Advice, instruction, and encouragement are the best offerings of friendship to the young. And not the least of these is encouragement. With all its ambition and activity, youth is faint-hearted. It wants courage—calm, steady, moral courage—to go out in pursuit of its objects with a fearless confidence of success. Youth has energy, ambition, industry, but it lacks courage. An assurance from a valued friend, a word of cheer from a known and esteemed author, or a good-speed from the lips of experience, would be of essential service to it.

I everywhere meet with faltering youth—noble souls, but fearful. Poverty, or diffidence, or the whims of unwise friends, or some fancied defect of mind or body, keeps them from the fields they desire to occupy, and where they could be more useful and successful than anywhere else in life, because their hearts are there. They lack true bravery of soul. Or, it may be in them, but it is undeveloped. Bravery, like all other virtues, is developed by the hand of culture. The noblest bravery in the world is moral bravery, that which meets disappointment, trial, affliction, failure, misfortune, sickness, and all the varied ills of life, with a determined and vigorous composure and a stern and trained self-reliance, which enables its possessor to pursue his even course undismayed, and add to, rather than detract from, his strength.

Whoever encourages this virtue in the world, either by example or precept, does the world good. The fear that its want inspires in nearly all youths makes them often intensely miserable, subjects them to the doubt, and blackness, and torment of despondency, and all the enervation, perversion of mind, waste of time, and ultimate evils that follow. Thousands on thousands of noble-minded and generous-hearted youths are ruined, or greatly injured, by this prevailing cowardice. Scarcely any escape its scathing influence. Mere courage, determination, force of will, cheerful pursuit of known duties, or the objects of honourable desires, gladsome labour in the paths of right and usefulness, is the almost universal want among manhood, and especially among the young. Life is full of beauty, and ought to be of gladness. It has a thousand glorious joys, and as many sources of constant enjoyment. Constant cheerfulness is a duty.

A faithful, joyful pursuit of the things that will minister most to our peace, usefulness, happiness, and progress, is a moral obligation that we ought to comply with.

To encourage and enforce this duty, and strengthen its moral bearings upon the consciences of youthful readers, is the chief object of the proposed series of articles. The youth of our country have no right to be unhappy; no business to be desponding. Our institutions are designed to be the nurseries of youth, to afford it an open field and fair play for the legitimate and righteous exercise of its powers, in all the pursuits of high-minded industry. The friends of youth may, and will, encourage and advise it, through books, lectures, lessons, examples, and every known means of assistance; but depend upon it, young men and women, it is your own work, after all. Nobody else can do it for you. Fortunes are hewn out for ourselves, not made to order at a fortune shop. Characters are forged on the anvil of industry, by the well-directed strokes of the head and hand. Children are what they are made; but men and women are what they make themselves. The web of life is drawn into the loom for us; but we weave it ourselves. We throw our own shuttle and work our own treadles. The warp is given us; but the woof we make ourselves—find our own materials, and colour and figure it to our own taste.

Every man is the architect of his own house, his own temple of fame. If he builds one great, honourable, and glorious, the merit and the bliss are his. If he rears a polluted, unsightly, vice-haunted den of evil spirits, to himself the shame and misery belong. Success is the product of the sum of our years multiplied by our good actions. Life is a problem, and we solve it on the blackboard of the world. The answer we get at death, will approximate to the true one just in proportion to the correctness of our work. Every mistake, if not rectified, will carry us far from the truth. Errors in the commencement of the work are doubly dangerous, for by every succeeding step they carry us farther from the true end. Hence, we should start right in youth, that is, get a correct statement of the problem at which we must work while we live. We must not attribute our success to blind "fortune," or our failures to "bad luck." Luck and fortune are mere words without any meaning. What is called "good fortune" is the result of sound judgment supported by a stout heart and a ready hand. "Bad luck" is the reverse of this.

Says an eloquent divine, in a lecture on Idleness: "I may here, as well as anywhere, impart the secret of what is called good and bad luck. There are men who, supposing Providence to have an implacable spite against them, bemoan in the poverty of a wretched old age the misfortunes of their lives. Luck for ever ran against them and for others. One, with a good profession, lost his luck in the river, where he idled away his time a-fishing, when he should have been in the office. Another, with a good trade, perpetually burnt up his luck with his hot temper, which provoked all his employers to leave him. Another, with a lucrative business, lost his luck by amazing diligence at everything but his own business. Another, who steadily followed his trade, as steadily followed his bottle. Another, who was honest and constant to his work, erred by perpetual misjudgments—he lacked discretion. Hundreds lose their luck by endorsing; by sanguine speculations; by trusting fraudulent men; and by dishonest gains. A man never has good luck who has a bad wife. I never knew an early-rising, hard-working, prudent man, careful of his earnings, and strictly honest, who complained of bad luck. A good character, good habits, and iron industry, are impregnable to the assaults of all the ill-luck that fools ever dreamed of. But when I see a tatterdemalion, creeping out of a public-house late in the forenoon, with his hands stuck in his pockets, the rim of his hat turned up, and the crown knocked in, I know he has had bad luck; for the want of all luck is to be a sluggard, a knave, or a tippler."

There is solid good sense in this extract, which ought to be learned by every youth. What countless thousands of old people are complaining of bad luck, in a peevish, sickly, disagreeable decline of life, which really is the legitimate result of the irregular, ill-directed, selfish, or vicious lives they have lived. Every youth should live with one eye on old age. If he should die before he gets there, it will never do him any injury. The moral principles of youth laid in store for age, will be just as valuable beyond death as they are at this side.

Whatever charms we now possess, we should retain to adorn our characters through every succeeding stage of life. It is wrong to lay off the charms of youth in old age. Age should heighten every spiritual beauty; experience should subdue and soften it.

Each year should add new adornments, but lay off none. Age should be more beautiful and happy than youth. And so it will be, if life is properly lived, if health is preserved, and the character every day beautified. A fretful, ignorant, unhappy old age is a proof of youthful errors and manhood blunders and views. It is the natural result of the life that has gone before it. If we live right, enjoyments increase with increasing virtue and wisdom.

The Matron.

NO. I.

I VERY rarely smile, and certainly I am never elated, when I read the glowing eulogiums which certain "lords of the creation" are almost continually pronouncing upon women; upon their personal charms, their matchless sensibilities, and their amazing influence. Play-writers cause their young Lotharios to exclaim, as they gaze in rapture on the objects of their admiration, or, rather, adoration,—

"Angels must paint to look as fair as you!"

Novelists describe their heroines as combining in their single persons the beauty of Venus, the dignity of Juno, the wisdom of Minerva, and the perfections of I know not how many more imaginary goddesses. And the tongues and pens of even grave theologians move with wonderful rapidity when this theme inspires them. A learned D.D., a volume of whose works is now before me, after pronouncing some very glowing eulogiums on the sex, seems ready to lay down his pen, as if despairing to do justice to his subject. "WOMEN," he says, "are the real efficient that settle the great points of human existence. They exert their influence at a number of distinct epochs. They fetter us (males) alike before and after marriage; though many of them are wise enough to silence the clanking, and to conceal the iron. They rule us in infancy—in maturity—in age. No other hand knows the tender, adroit, and proper mode of binding our brows in pain and sickness. They stand by us in the last agonies with untiring and undismayed faithfulness. They soothe our dying moments. They shed the choicest tears of memory that water our turf." "They are purer, less selfish, less destitute of true moral courage, more susceptible of kind and generous impressions, and far more so of religious feeling than men."

"Surely then, everything which concerns the education of this better-half of the species must be of intrinsic importance. If this world is ever to become a better and happier world, WOMAN, well educated, disciplined, and principled, sensible of her own influence, and wise and benevolent to exert it aright, must be the original mover in this great work."

I suppose this will be considered a piece of fine writing; as to practical utility, however, I can't say that I think it worth much. Indeed, I am almost afraid that such highflown compliments may make some women think "more highly of themselves than they ought to think." It may lead them to suppose that the ability to "fetter males," to "bind brows," to "soothe dying moments," and to "water turfs" with "choicest tears," are endowments of greater value than vigorous and well cultivated intellect, prudence in marketing, skill in training children, and dexterity in domestic duties. And yet, if they have not these latter named endowments, they may, perhaps, be fine ladies, drawing-room ornaments; but they will not be very profitable companions for humble tradesmen, nor for the large class of artizans and mechanics, who, above all others, require wives that shall be, indeed, "help meets."

I do not flatter myself that I particularly excel in the grace of humility. I have a tolerably good opinion of myself. Nevertheless, I am quite satisfied to take half the praise thus bestowed upon woman. But there is one sentence in the eulogium of the eloquent doctor which has dwelt much upon my mind; I mean that which I have marked by italics. I subscribe, with my whole soul, to the intrinsic importance of everything which concerns the education of women. Yes, of "everything;" their physical, their intellectual, their moral education; their education for useful as well as ornamental purposes. But why is not more done to promote this object? The gentlemen who write in the style of which I have given a specimen, cannot but know that there are hundreds and thousands of women who do not answer to their flowery descriptions; and as they are intelligent, observant, experienced men, I wonder that they do not more frequently give us the results in a practical and useful form. Why don't they tell women how they may become the amiable and useful creatures they have pictured them; how those who are defective in these respects may improve themselves? I don't mean improvement as to personal appearance; that they had better leave to dame nature and to common sense, two invaluable agents in effecting that. Receipts for face powders, and dentifrices, and hair dyes, and cosmetics, I regard, for the most part, as wasted paper. Soft water and plain soap, and the constant and plentiful application of both, are worth the whole kit of them. Nor do I mean, just now, the moral improvement of women. We have an abundance of dry moral essays; bundles of sermons on "the duties of woman," more, by a great many, than women ever read. No; but I mean plain, practical, familiar directions as to all branches of domestic economy; as to dress—the training of children—good, and at the same time cheap cookery; advices as to the best way of sustaining the various relations of life, of making firesides attractive; of causing the behaviour as well as the home, to be such as shall foster and secure comfort and affection. We have sanitary boards, and associations for improving the dwellings, and bettering the condition of the poor; and, lately, we have had the Prince Consort, and dukes, and lords, and bishops, and baronets, holding conferences for the promotion of social science; and much credit is due to them for what they have said and done. But why don't some of these gentlemen, who have proved themselves so capable of writing in an entertaining, instructive, and forcible manner;—who publish such excellent books on science, art, theology, political economy, and on all theologies and omologies in the big dictionaries and cyclopedias;—why don't they, I say, bless the world with a few tracts and cheap volumes on domestic, or, if you please, woman's economy? I shouldn't wonder if some of their own households were the first to reap the benefit.

Owing to circumstances which I need not now detail, I have become pretty well acquainted with the habits, manners, and means of a large portion of the middling and humble classes of our community; and I am quite sure that, with rare exceptions, their dwellings might be more healthy and comfortable; they and their children more tidy and well behaved; their daily meals more savoury and nourishing; and their firesides, their homes, far more attractive, more truly deserving the name of "sweet homes," than at present. And all this not only without any additional expense, but even at a less cost than the present imperfect and, comparatively, comfortless system. Oh, how often, after visiting certain families, have I sat and wished, and wished again, that I was qualified to be such an educator! How have I wished that my early training had been such as would have fitted me for usefulness to numerous females I see rising around me! But "Wishing, of all employments, is the worst."

And then the thought has occurred, "Cannot you do something?" And then a voice seemed to whisper in my ears, "Do what you can, and do it without delay." Then came the questions, "How?" "By what means?" and "In what field?" I cannot afford to publish books; I could not muster courage to stand up on a platform, as some women in America, and in some parts of England, do. Then I recollected the profit I had derived, a few years ago, from reading the pages of John Cassell's celebrated work, "The Working Man's Friend," and how many a female writer had employed herself usefully through that medium. Then I thought of the same gentleman's ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, which is, surely, a suitable medium for such communications; and though I am no scholar, and am conscious that I possess but very moderate talents, yet, having had considerable experience, having reared a large family—some members of which, now comfortably settled, are pleased to say that they have profited by my advice—and having made pretty good use of my eyes for many years, I do fancy it possible for me to tender a few useful hints to some that are younger and less experienced than myself.

In addressing myself to females, I shall

"Nothing extenuate, nor aught set down in malice."

And if I occasionally point out what I consider to be erroneous in principle, or injurious in practice—anything that I think stands in the way of physical health, of intellectual vigour, of domestic comfort, of moral worth, or, in one word, of female excellence—I shall, I hope, write so as not to offend any, and to render service to all. Somebody, writing on behalf of women, says,

"Be to their virtues very kind.
And to their faults a little blind."

I promise to take the advice given in the first line, in all its plenitude of meaning; though I cannot promise always to abide by that in the second. As there are degrees in faults, there may be degrees in the blindness indulged in reference to them; and, as to reproving faults, a wise king said, "faithful are the wounds of a friend;" and he speaks of reproof, when administered by such a one, as "an excellent oil, that will not break the head." I am pretty sure that I shall break no heads. I only hope I may guide many minds.

One thing I wish to premise respecting my papers. They must not be looked at as literary compositions. They will be humble efforts to do good to some who may not have had the advantages with which I have been favoured. They will be founded on what has passed, or is passing, under my own observation. They may sometimes betray the garrulousness of an elderly matron (though I hate gossip), but their tone will be practical, and their aim will be to do a little good to some of the young women into whose hands the ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER will be sure to fall. Should any of these be in circumstances in which friendly advice is desirable, their communications will receive respectful attention.

THE SWORD AND BIBLE.

A CRY comes o'er the distant sea,
From England's outraged, tortured ones—
Shrieks of her daughters' agony,
Her martyred babes, her slaughtered sons.
Men stand appalled and hear the tale,
With quivering lips and pale brow;
From English hearts rings sorrow's wail,
For English homes are desert now.

Weep not! tears cannot bring relief.
Rise, England, in thine ancient might!
Deeds, not words, must speak thy grief;
Send forth thy legions to the fight.
Call from the anvil and the plough,
City and field, thy hardy race;
It is no time for dreaming now,
If thou wouldst hold thy well-won place.

Accept no aid from friends who mock—
Whose pity veils a jealous sneer;
Alone, thy strength can brave the shock—
England hath but herself to fear;
Her statesmen, bound by pedant rules
And precedents, sometimes delay;
Her office owls—blind Wisdom's fools—
Who dream a nation's power away.

Prate not of gold—of Delhi's sack;
Can India's rifled gems atone
For India's shame—for deeds that lack
The fitting term to make them known
Deeds that men mutter in their sleep,
But waking find no voice to tell;
Deeds for which sorrowing angels weep,
And the doom'd city justly fell?

Prate not of mercy till the sword
Hath punished first the Sepoy's crime,
Scattered each vile assassin horde:
Justice, like mercy, hath its time.
Atone for each outraged one,
Each form unhallowed arms have prest;
When England's Sword its work hath done,
Let England's Bible do the rest.

JOHN FREDERICK SMITH.

THE FIRE-ESCAPE MAN AND HIS DOG.

THE world has many a hero that it knows very little about, and as peace has its victories as well as war, so there is much heroism and chivalry that never heads a charge, or leads a forlorn hope, or is gazetted for its able service.

The accompanying portrait is that of a hero—nay, we have two heroes in the picture—a man who, in his capacity as fire-escape conductor, has saved no less than seventy-two human lives, with the help of "Bill," that sagacious dog of his, whose vigilance and energy have elicited, many a time, the most genuine applause.

Samuel Wood, No. 11, in the service of the Royal Society for the Preservation of Life from Fire, has rendered the most efficient aid at many disastrous fires, and for intrepid courage and cool determination is not surpassed in the force. He is a fine athletic fellow, as intelligent as he is daring, which is saying much in his praise. All kinds of rewards have been given him, and his exertions in Whitechapel have been so highly appreciated, that the inhabitants have given him £20, a Bible, and a silver watch, and the society has presented him with testimonials and pecuniary rewards, sixteen in all, marking its sense of his worth and excellence.

Wood is not a boastful man, and we are afraid does not do himself full justice in recounting his exploits. There is a becoming modesty about him, but he cannot help owning that he did save ten people one night up in Colchester-street, and five another night in the same street, and four in Somerset-street, and three others in the Whitechapel-road, and seven women and two children in Ticehurst-street, and two people in Little Halsey-street, and five more in the Whitechapel-road again, four more another time in the same place, and three more on another occasion, and four in Backchurch-lane, and two another time, and six another time. But then Wood owns all this as a man who feels that he has only done just what he had to do. He mentions that he does not stay to think, but goes right a-head when an escape has to be effected; that he pulls his helmet over his eyes, and calls out as soon as he enters. He feels interested in the work, and likes it, and considers that the society and the public generally have done handsomely by him. As to Bill, he regards him evidently in the light of a friend, he had him when he was a pup from a poor fellow who died in the service, and he and his "Bill" have been on excellent terms ever since.

The fire-escape man's dog takes after his master in courage and perseverance. He is of the terrier breed, six years old. An alarm of fire calls forth all his energy. He is the first to know that something is wrong—the first to exert himself in setting it right. He has not been trained to the work—"it is a gift," as his master says; and if we all used our gifts as efficiently as the dog Bill, it would be the better for us. On an alarm of fire Bill barks his loudest, dashes about in a frantic manner, till his master and the escape are on their way to it. He of course is there first, giving the police and the crowd to understand that Wood and his fire-escape are coming. When the escape is fixed, and Wood begins to ascend the ladder, Bill runs up the canvas; as soon as a window is opened Bill leaps in and dashes about to find the occupants, loudly barking for assistance as soon as he has accomplished his errand of mercy. His watchfulness and sagacity are never at fault, although on more than one occasion

"I am the fire-escape man's dog, my name is Bill
When 'fire' is called I am never still.
I bark for my master, all danger brave,
To bring the escape—human life to save."

Collared or collarless, Bill is always ready to lend a chapel. The engraving will be accompanied with a full account of the various exploits of this remarkable and courageous man, together with an interesting description of that ingenious and useful contrivance for preserving life—the Fire Escape.

ÆSOP IN SEARCH OF A MAN.

he has stood a fair chance of losing his life, and has sustained very severe injury. Not long ago a collar was presented to Bill as a reward for his services; unfortunately for him he has since lost this token of public regard—a misfortune much to be regretted. The following verse was engraved on the collar.—

helping bark. May his life be long and his services properly esteemed!

In our next week's number we shall publish a graphic illustration, from a drawing by Gilbert, engraved by Pearson, of the scene in which Wood, the fireman, saved the lives of five persons in White-

WANTED IMMEDIATELY—A MAN!

PHÆDRUS, the Fabulist, tells us how the genial cripple Æsop was one day seen walking basily to and fro through the public market-place at Athens, evidently searching for some one among the passers-by. The hunchback turned his clever, piercing eyes, with an inquiring leer, upon the various groups of chaffering, bustling citizens, and frequently he would shake his head with a humorous look of disappointment. He was evidently anxious that the object of his search should not escape him—for, though the mid-day sun was blazing in the sky, the cunning little man carried in his hand a lighted lantern, whose tiny flame flickered powerlessly beneath the glaring eye of the god of day. And thus, with exaggerated action and comic leer, right through the Athenian market-place went little Æsop.

"Hullo, friend, what seek you," asked a laughing citizen, "that you light your lantern at noon?" "I seek A MAN!" cried the hunchback, and the questioner was answered.

Jean Luyken, the Dutch painter and engraver, has taken this scene as the subject of one of his most successful works. He shows us the cripple, lantern in hand, as he passes through the market; and to bring the whole idea more completely before each spectator's mind, the figures standing or crouching around have been portrayed with the heads of brutes, with the low natural expression of each brought out in a masterly manner. There is the ox, with his heavy, brutish look; and beside him the tiger, with his low, retreating forehead, his baleful eye, and cruel mouth—they are to be seen over and over again, both these worthies, in the gin palace, in the prison, and at the hulks. Then there is the ass, with his look of grave, complacent stupidity; and the pig, too, with his cunning, selfish eye—these two have been found in high places of trust and emolument ere now, or report is a very liar. Then in the right fore-ground, what a goodly group they make, the quarrelsome turkey-cock, the low sensual-looking goat, the acute cat, with the perceptive organs developed, and the moral ones wanting (we fancy we've seen him about the law courts before now, with a black gown on), the ferocious lion, in the back-ground the hideous ape. Small chance had Æsop of ever finding his man among the company assembled. But from the fore-ground of the picture, with evil in all its low and bestial forms, we may turn to the back-ground and behold the mighty remedy. There, with uplifted finger, and glory-circled head, walks a gracious and a holy presence, teaching, counselling, exhorting—turning the soul of each hearer from the debasing influences of the natural man to the high and exalted calling of the spiritual, from the fetters of the earth to the freedom of heaven. They hear the gracious words and are comforted; they gaze on the benign face and rejoice; and with the uplifting of each heart from idolatry to truth comes the change from the bestial to the human countenance—from the brute being to the man.

But does this apply at all to the present day? Æsop lived so long ago. Things are changed now; and surely in the middle of this great, refined, civilised nineteenth century, there can be no difficulty in finding such a thing as a good, dependable, honest man. Why, there is respectability on every side of us—wealth hangs out his golden sign on every hand. Why, we never were in such a prosperous condition—all the papers tell us so, and all the guide books will tell you that London is the great, wealthy, magnificent metropolis of the world.

Light up the farthing candle in your lantern, oh shade of Æsop! and walk abroad with me through London streets. Let us go to and fro diligently, as you did in Athens in days of yore; and haply we may find more men than you could discover of old in Athens.

Let us hail the omnibus. It will take us for fourpence into the heart of the great, roaring, bustling city. Inconvenient, isn't it? and rather narrow and uncomfortable, particularly for the legs; but we get on quickly, and the ride is cheap, moreover. Among the great company of the owners, you think, Æsop, we shall find our man. Well, but, you see, when the great company were buying up the clumsy caravans some time ago, they made a great fuss, and promised that we should have new vehicles, and plenty of room, and light, and air, and ride happy ever afterwards; but except in a few instances, we have been stifled, and cramped, and had our tempers spoiled, and our corns crushed just as much after the vaunted purchase as before; and so—yes, Æsop, you are right, we will go on.

Let us walk through the best streets, and go in for our honest man among the great commercial establishments, the magnitude of whose transactions attests their respectability. But turn away your head, Æsop, and never look at the great house opposite, for it was the headquarters of the great bank—the scene of the most gigantic, boastful, beggarly swindle London has witnessed for years. The place opened with a lie, continued its career in recklessness and dishonesty, and ended in due course with an exposure at the Bankruptcy Court, such as that institution had never before witnessed. I would rather not, if you please, tell you the names of the gentlemen whose names and good faith were pledged to this bank, but I know that some of our legislators were among them, and that some of the directors were known as first-rate business men; but they were not your men, Æsop; you never lit your lantern in hopes of finding them.

Still, as in the days of yore, the cry is for a man, an honest man; and whenever we are in doubt and in difficulty it is raised again. The Russian war, when our heroic men were starving, with plenty within a few miles of them padlocked by routine—the wail of the widowed and the fatherless rendered destitute by the failure of those fraudulent bankers—the lying advertisements vouched for by respectable names, and parading dividends which are not earned, and profits paid out of capital—the reckless extravagance of men in office—the military nepotism that takes care of "Dowb" to the exclusion of sterling untitled merit; these and a thousand other grievances seem to lift up their voices and cry aloud for a man—an honest man—to come and remedy them. No man will get up and deny that this want is felt more and more imperatively every day; that there are Sadliers, Redpaths, and Robsons amongst us; that the fluctuations in railway stock are such as could only be brought about by underhand dealing and cooking of accounts. Why, look at the panic in America which rages at this moment, and has spread its baneful influence over our own trade and commercial prospects; the origin of this great panic was to be found in the wholesale swindling practised by railway directors and railway managers, else how could shares quoted at 76 in June, have sunk to 15 before the end of October? How could those of the Michigan Railway have been worth 88 in January and 15 in October? Show us the authority, O men of business, that empowers you to pay 10 per cent. dividend out of shareholders' paid-up capital, or worse still, out of capital borrowed by yourselves after all that paid-up capital has been lost. Unless you can do so, be assured the cry will not cease for an honest man, until that man be found!

Where shall we seek our man—for find him we must—our honest, genuine, helpful man?

Among those who penetrate into the dens of iniquity and the strongholds of vice, to snatch the victims as brands from the burning—among such men as Wright of Manchester, Montstephen of the ragged-schools, Driver of the ragged factory, and scores of other workers in similar causes. Men who, having to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, but still have time and energy to spare to succour the weak and sustain the erring, to heal the broken-hearted and to preach deliverance from sin and sorrow to their poor and suffering brethren. The men we want are those upon whom has been reflected the image of Him who scorned not to dwell among the transgressors—whose whole life was as a sermon, of which "love one another" was the text—who, with his own august mouth hath proclaimed that there is joy in heaven over each repentant sinner.

Such are the men we want, and such men, we are thankful to say, are living and labouring among us day by day.

CHAPTER I.

ON WHICH A GREAT DEAL DEPENDS.

OUR story begins, as most stories finish, with a marriage. Old Jeremiah Crutchway was the sexton of St. Crispin's church, in the city of London, a few years back.

He was just going to bed, on a certain night in the month of April, 18—, when he was rapped up by a fashionable-looking person, who presented to him at the door what seemed a note from the rector of the parish.

After reading it, old Jerry nodded his head, and nodded so vehemently, that the glowing end of his nose—a nose that became more and more out of drawing every day—bobbed up and down with a very ludicrous effect.

"All right, sir—to-morrow at eight, precisely."

By nine a.m. the next morning, it was all over; and, the doors being shut, the blue nose was beginning to bob, as usual, in the bar of "The Chequers," two streets off the church. A friend of the fashionable person had performed the ceremony, one other friend had witnessed it. But nothing could have been more private, unless it had been a funeral by night.

Which it should have been, and the bride should have been the corpse; and oftentimes she wished it had been so, and bitterly she wept while wishing. Why?

Because three months from that happy day, when the steamer landed the bridal couple from a dreamy tour in Switzerland and the Tyrol, the fashionable person had one evening laughed in her face when she called him husband, and thus renounced the bond—

"Whatever may be the case in Scotland, I believe that the law of the land in this country, my excellent wife, does not provide that medical students, in the robes of clergymen, can join people together in holy matrimony. I'm afraid there's been a little mistake. If any young gentleman should desire it, my love, you could repeat that Wednesday business without bigamy. Good-bye, for the present!"

Did the girl follow him, as he left the hotel, or shriek, or give an alarm, or cry "robbers?"

Ask if she could have done it had she been the body, in the funeral by night; for there she sat, as still and white as that body would have done. And it was an hour before she moved one inch from where he left her. No murderer—(we mean no other murderer)—ever left his victim less equal to pursuit or to revenge!

CHAPTER II.

JOYCE.

SHE had borne it—a long, long while—had poor Joyce Claymore. A few months ago, it was quite a new thing to Joyce not to hear kind voices, and to see pleasant faces. But those few months seemed to her, a long, long while; for she had not had anything gentler than a curse, nor anything brighter than a scowl, since last February, and now it is December.

Joyce had been well off once. Her father and mother were as happy, and comely, and prosperous a pair as any in Arland, down in Shropshire. Till one day, when everybody else was failing in business, because of a railway mania or a number of large firms "coming down," as they called it, of course her father failed. And Joyce had said to him one evening, as he sat and brooded between his wife and daughter—"You'll come and see me, father, some day, in London, won't you? and if mother comes, all the better. But come, cheer up, for the last night, do, dear father."

And she went, and sat herself on his knee, and put her pretty fingers (a habit of hers), between his neck and his loose black stock.

"London, my lass! Last night!" cried old Claymore, drawing himself away from her; "what does the child mean? Must the heart break in the old man, because everything else is breaking? Eh? what do'st mean, Joyce?"

And so the good girl told him all about it. How that she had quietly put an advertisement in the county paper, the very day she knew of their losses, and had been engaged, for a whole week past, to go to-morrow, to be lady's-maid, in such and such a square, all the way off in London.

Now, this and other talk in the old house at home (which talk, I take leave to say, it would have done the angels no harm to hear, and, for that matter, I believe they did hear it, and marked it down too—this talk) had taken place a year or two before the time when our story begins. And I only mentioned it here, because as Joyce was sitting, in that little wretched lodging, from which she was to be turned out to-morrow, for four months' rent, all that sad scene down in Shropshire came up, like one of the dissolving views on the white wall. And it did dissolve; for her hot tears mixed it all up for a moment, and it was gone, and instead of it, she saw—

Well, whatever it was, it made her weep faster and faster, and the tiny little babe she was nursing, fast asleep as it was, never knew any other baptism than those tears.

We do not say that the gentleman who left the hotel as we have described, never returned; for he did, again and again. But at last, the bill was paid, and Joyce was advised to seek cheaper accommodation, accommodation to which the fashionable person never followed her.

You can guess whose that baby was, and you will not be far wrong if you suppose that she had never seen its father since its birth. They were not happy meetings, as you may imagine, since the horrible disclosure had been made—the disclosure that a trick had beguiled her from her comfortable home in the square, and made her what she was; for, without a trick, hard as he tried, the fashionable person would never have decoyed her away.

And now, as we look at her on this December night, there is a terribly suspicious mark on her pale thin cheek; and when the tears come to it, that mark stops them for a moment, and they separate and run along it, and come down upon the baby in smaller, slower drops. And there is another gash inside upon her heart, which you do not see, and a gash, which feels to poor Joyce as if it sent the blood, as the other does the tears, the wrong way.

Should she go home? She had never told them, either of her love or of her marriage. He had made her promise not to tell, and now, to go home, after what he had told her (though, even now, she only half believed he had betrayed her), would be, she knew, to break those two old hearts at once, as her own was broken. She couldn't go; at least not yet.

She had called her child's father Hugh; but she, poor girl, didn't know (or it would all never have happened) that his name was the Honourable Colonel Hugh Latson. It suited his convenience (good man!) not to let out the "Honourable" in his title any more fully than he let it out in his conduct.

Well, she had neither seen nor heard a word of him for those many months. She had arrears in the little general provision shop, arrears with the kind doctor, and arrears with the unkind landlady, who, beside turning her from the door to-morrow, had found out, as she remarked, "what she was, and treated her accordingly." Poor girl! this is evening when we renew our acquaintance with her; and, excepting a roll which the baker's boy had left for "the lodger with the little un," as he called her, she had tasted nothing all day long.

You must not, from what follows, think for a moment that all at once it seemed possible to Joyce that she could ever part with that little treasure on her lap. She took it with her, wrapped up close in the only shawl she had spared from the pawnbroker, when, next day, the virtuous landlady shut the door upon her, telling her to go farther and fare better, for she wouldn't have "such like folk no longer." She had that baby with her, when she wandered out, far and wide, for many a weary day; and she clasped it very close, when she slept, through many a night, under arches, and down against workhouse-doors, when they refused to take her in. That little treasure, wheezing in the cold, wet, wintry air, was the only tie that held her on the bridge, where many a time she looked over into the dark, dull water, and longed to leap and be at rest.

One evening, a Sunday evening, a church door stood open—the same church; and she slipped into the porch, when the pew-opener's back was turned; and the drizzling rain was coming down, freezing as it fell; and Joyce thought of the old Sundays in the old church at home. She crept against the inner entrance, just when the minister was taking his text, and she caught the words, "And the water was spent in the bottle, and Hagar cast the child under one of the shrubs. And she went and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lift up her voice, and wept."

This was a new thought to the young mother. Joyce had been feeling for many a day that she could bear to lay herself down and die all alone, and turn her last thought on her infant's father. But it was a different thing to see that little thin shadow in her arms fading from her, hour by hour, its large, brown eyes turning nowhere but up into its mother's face, and every new convulsion drawing its little hands tighter round her fingers. Joyce felt like Hagar.

No one was in the streets. Across the way there was an alley, and in the alley an archway on one side, the edge of which commanded a view of the church. Oh! ye happy mothers! who lay your little ones every night in their warm cribs, and feel how secure they are, and how precious will be their awakening, and how to-morrow's embrace will recall the first moment of motherhood, sometimes think, not of Joyce Claymore, but of many another Joyce, in this great city, to whom a mother's love is turned to madness!

Quick as lightning, when the porch, the street, the alley all were empty, Joyce laid down her child against the door, and shot off across the road into the hiding-place, "over against him, as it were a bowshot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child!"

Sleeping between the fits, lay that little symbol of a world of mingled bliss, and wrong, and wretchedness, wrapped in its mother's warmest raiment, seen only by her and by another Parent, who had seen Ishmael, ages and ages back, under the shrub, and Moses "among the flags by the river's brink."

CHAPTER III. JUSTICE'S JUSTICE.

It will, no doubt, encourage the reader if we tell him that there was more stern, staunch virtue in the world beside hers who turned Joyce Claymore from the "three-pair back;" and that it was making a field-day, was that virtue, at that very time.

We have moved off now, down into a beautiful spot in Wiltshire, where there is a gentleman's seat, in the midst of a gentleman's park, surrounded by a gentleman's tenantry, and inhabited by a perfect, unexceptionable gentleman. He is not old, for he has just come of age; he is not gouty, for there never was such a delicate little boot upon any foot but a girl's; he is not ugly, if he were, the balls for twenty miles round Latson Towers (the name of his house) would have seen it, and fallen through. His father and mother are dead; and the young man is now in possession of an estate, the value of which does not matter, so long as you understand it to have been very large, very secure, and never to have been defiled (as its owner would have thought and said of it) either with iron or cotton. No doubt it came into the family "with the Conqueror," as everything old certainly came with him; and all we should like to have lived in the time of the Conqueror for, is to have seen the number of gentlemen who really did come over with him, and all their portmanteaus and carpet-bags. For we quite believe, that if one-tenth part of either men or baggage that we hear of across dinner-tables and in newspaper obituaries, really did "come over with the Conqueror," the departure of Israel out of Egypt, the armies of Alexander and of Napoleon, must have been a joke to that celebrated expedition.

Hugh Latson was the second son of the late Viscount Latson, and was already a colonel of militia, and a Justice of the Peace for the county: the bulk of his property, however, reaching him through his mother. It was in the exercise of the functions of this last dignity that the young gentleman especially rejoiced and gloried, and at the very moment when that poor girl was advised to "go farther and fare better," the Hon. Col. Hugh Latson took his seat on the Bench.

"There's only one case to-day, your worship," said the clerk.

"What is it, Mr. Glint?"

"Why, it won't take long, sir. It's a case from the Union, where a young woman turns very rom-bustious, because she accidentally meets with an old acquaintance, as she says; and the master charges her with making a disturbance, while the man charges her with an assault."

"Oh!" says the magistrate. "Absence makes the heart, &c. Put her up."

And there stepped up to the bar, dressed in work-house clothes, a girl, who, in manner, in beauty, and everything but dialect and clothing, would have graced any drawing-room, or any carriage in the land. No sooner, however, did she catch a view of the male pauper than she put down her face between her hands, and rested her elbows on the cross-bar, and sobbed out, as it seemed, her very soul in wretchedness.

"Come, come!" said Latson; "that's very well meant. But what have you to say?" (he asked, after hearing the governor and the man) "to creating a disturbance in the Workhouse? How do you defend the assault upon this man?"

Immediately she started, as if a serpent had stung her, but never ceased weeping and sobbing, and cried out—

"Assault him! Did I assault ye, Dan? Does he say assault? I'd crush the first butterfly that dared to light on him! Why, ask him, and he'll tell ye, I only took him by the hand and asked him whether he'd forgotten his old Cicely; and no wonder if I didn't let him go directly he wanted; for I hadn't seen him, your worship, this five years. And when he left me, I had—"

And here she buried her face again; and it was a long time before the court could make out that the man had left her with an infant three weeks old, of which he ought to have been, with her, joint guardian.

"Is this true?" asked the justice, turning to Dan.

"Never see her before in all my life, sir!"

(Our readers must put the poor girl's language into the Wiltshire vernacular for themselves, for there are sounds in that brogue which defy type.)

"What!" sobbed poor Cicely; "have ye forgotten this, Dan?" (and here she tore from her bosom a round piece of card-board, in a plain, black frame, bearing a portrait, rough, but sufficiently exact, of the faithless Dan.) "Oh! Dan; I wonder that poor little Cicely doesn't rise from her grave, and tell the gentleman whether you speak the truth or not. But, please sir," she gasped out, "don't trouble any more about me. Send me to prison, sir, if I've done wrong, or anywhere else; for now that Dan's come back after five years, and doesn't know me, it won't matter much where I am! Oh! my poor Cicely. Oh! cruel, cruel Dan!"

And even Mr. Glint, the clerk, found himself suddenly coughing, and raised up the lid of his desk, and diligently looked for something inside all to himself. Dan, too, scratched his head, and looked as if he half regretted his appearance in this new character.

Not so the justice, who had not condescended to ask to look at the portrait, which would have settled the question. He thus delivered himself:—

"A pretty world, indeed, this would be for everybody, if we were all to have this kind of thing done to us. And, when we've been away five years, women might run up and claim acquaintance with us, when we came back, and say they buried some children of ours! It's quite clear to me that you're a very excitable person, and have no control over your feelings. And as you've made a disturbance in the Union Workhouse, and annoyed this man, you must go to the House of Correction for seven days; and when you come out, you must enter into your own recognizances that you won't trouble him any more."

Dan looked amazed, and seemed as if he would have spoken; but it was too late.

She said nothing as she walked from the bar; but, with a countenance as white as death, and as full of agony as ever spoke in human face, she went up to the man, and held out the portrait to him with such determination, and a manner so suddenly altered, that he couldn't choose but take it. He actually did take it, and she then staggered away, her bubble bliss bursting at last, and the care and woe of the five last years being perfect.

That night Joyce Claymore slept, for the first time, in the streets, and Cicely, for the first time, in a prison. But slumbers were never sweeter, or less disturbed, than those of the Hon. Col. Hugh Latson.

CHAPTER IV.

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER.

WHILE the magistrate was down among the part-ridges at Latson Towers, cracking jokes, first about one of his prisoners, and then about one of his victims (and there was not very much difference between the two classes, excepting that he sent away his victims to seek their misery for themselves, but furnished his prisoners with theirs at his own, or the country's cost nearer home); and while Joyce Claymore was passing her days in concealment, and her nights in the street (that infant, her amulet against insult or suspicion); and while poor Cicely was asking God, in His mercy, soon to lay her down, if He pleased, beside her little girl, and out of its father's road—while all this was going on, an old woman, in very feeble health, and plenty of poverty, was sipping her private cup of trouble in the room where her daughter was a dress-maker. They had but one apartment, and they shared it together. It was in a back City street, in London.

Mrs. Wofield had buried her husband many years ago, and since his death Ruth had been all in all to her, and was so still. Ruth's figure was what fifteen years' of dressmaking were likely to make it. You thought that if you looked steadily you could almost see through it. Her cheeks were of the proper paleness, and her fingers as long, and thin, and hard at the ends, as the fine ladies whom she clothed could possibly have desired, when they asked for the work of a month to be sent home by Ruth's employers in a week. She was not pretty, but she was gentle, quiet, loving, good. In fact she lived her name, and was Ruth in everything. So that if Boaz could have seen her sometimes, when she had dropped asleep over her work, and when she woke up worse than ever for only yielding to the temptation, I am sure he would not only have said, "Let her glean among the sheaves," but he would have gleaned for her himself, and made her bread for her too, with his own hands.

Well, it was Saturday night. Three dresses had not yet gone to the shop, and it was past ten o'clock. Ruth and her mother were sitting and stitching, as hard as they could, together.

"What's the day of the month?" asked Ruth, who often lost count, and no wonder, for she may almost be said to have had two days for other people's one, and to have required an almanack nearly double the ordinary length. "What's the day of the month?"

"Why, child!" said her mother, "I never did this in all my life before!"

"Did what, mother?"

"Why, come to the eve of your poor father's birthday without remembering it! To-morrow's his birthday,—to be sure,—the 24th of December! Oh, Ruth! do ye think he sees us now, love?"

"I hope not," said Ruth.

"Ruth! Ruth!" said her mother, as if reproachfully.

"No, no," pursued the daughter; "I don't mean for any one's sake but his. For what happiness, dear mother, could father set by seeing us now?—you so old, and I so young, and yet both of us, I think, about equally near the end. Would it make father happier? If it would, I'm sure I hope he does see us." And Ruth coughed that hollow cough, which was so certain to come on in winter evenings, when the fire was gone out, and no money being in the house, there could be no coals till all the work went home,—perhaps not then.

The old woman tottered across the room, with her sewing flung over her arm, and took down an old Bible, and brought it and put it between herself and her daughter, and read these words,—"And there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away."

"Child!" she added, "it'll do him no harm to see us, and it does me good to hope we're not so far off from him."

"Bless you, dearest mother—bless you! we shall soon be nearer still."

"Well, but, girl, what do ye say to go to-morrow, as it's his birthday, and the day before Christmas-day, what do ye say to go, for this once, to Fulham, and see his dear grave—eh, Ruth? It'll put a bit of colour on those white cheeks. Will ye go, my dear?"

"Not to-morrow, mother," replied the daughter, "for I promised to take Betsy Lewis's place at church. She's not fit, poor thing, for that draughty pew-opening this weather, and now she's quite laid by."

"And you're really going, with that cough of yours, to stand in the porch, and slob about there, when you're more fit to be in bed? Oh, child, child—ye may well say we are all 'near the end,' if that's how ye go making your grave, to keep other people out."

"Mother! hush!" answered Ruth: "Betsy nursed poor father, and to be kind to her on his birthday, depend on it, will do none of us any harm, and will please him, too, if he sees it."

And this was the way in which it came to pass that, on that same Sunday evening, Ruth Wofield was the pew-opener at that city church hard by.

Her mother sat that evening in the last free seat against the door, and they both heard, side by side, the sermon about Hagar and Ishmael; that sermon of which Joyce Claymore only heard the text.

If Joyce had stopped a little longer, she might have heard what would have given her more comfort than the simple text had done. She would have known, as these two other sufferers learned, that miracles were not now to be expected, and that we must not leave our Ishmaels to the angels, but commit them to Providence, in our own arms, where God is more likely to care for them than if we exposed them under any bush.

Joyce heard the text, and deserted her babe; Ruth and her mother, from that same text, heard words of sweetest comfort, and felt fit to bear any troubles that might come. So may a little knowledge, even of the wisest of books, be, in bad hands, a dangerous thing.

Just as the preacher was saying "The peace of God which passeth all understanding," Ruth slipped out into the porch, and saw, in the glare of the gas-light, poor little Hugh just beginning to feel the difference between cold stone and his mother's knee. And how could Ruth help thinking of the angel, and of herself as doing an angel's work, when, after the congregation had all dropped out, one by one, and no one claimed the foundling, that poor girl carried the little bundle to her own poor room, and laid it down for the night on her own poor bed!

The night was pitch dark when the door of Ruth's house was closed upon them; Ruth carrying the little mummy-shaped bundle, and her astonished and bewildered mother toddling after her.

But not so dark as to be concealed from one spectator, who had kept them in view, at a proper distance, all the way from the church.

Joyce marked the house, and noted the little dirty plate on the door. She then crossed, Hagar-like again, to a distance from her child; and on the other side of the road, and round a corner, as before, she knelt down behind a high old-fashioned flight of steps, and with her fingers among her wild, matted, straggling hair, she sent up one ghastly, yet holy, look, through the deep, black night, straight into heaven!

Yet Joyce could not pray.

Not pray! Indeed she did; for that look was a prayer, and something like this was the translation of that look, as He heard it who gave to mothers the mother's love:—

"O Jesus! remember what night this is, and then pity me! To-morrow will be Thy blessed birthday—do not forget where thy mother laid Thee!

Bless my darling child!—make them kind to it! May these women do better by little Hugh than his father will—than his mother can! O God! bless his father! Never let him know what his poor Joyce is to-night, and how she loves him!"

And then, for the first time that night, after this jumble of sad, sacred thoughts, Joyce found relief. For while the freezing fingers wandered to her burning forehead, and held it tight, as if lest it should burst, as her heart long since had done, the big tears fell on the dirty pavement, and mingled with the plashing rain.

And then that look of agony went on to say—

"Bless, too, O Lord! my dear old father and mother, if I still have any. Let them forget me; and soon let me forget everything, and go and rest with Thee, blessed Jesus!"

And she was just sinking her head upon her breast, after that look of prayer—(the action meaning quite plainly in heaven, Amen.)—when some one who had approached her without noise, having on neither shoes nor stockings, ran full tilt against poor Joyce, and knocked her down, in his half drunken swagger, where she knelt.

"Drat ye!" cried the fellow; "what are ye doing there? A praying to the door-steps? P'raps you've got some brats to fix on some of us, have ye? Oh, yes! I dare say ye can show us a bit of a portrait, can't ye? and say we guv it, ye can't ye? In course! I say, get up there, won't ye? or I'll put ye where my other wench went to, or somewhere like it. Darn ye! I will!"

And so Cicely and Joyce became, though they knew it not, sisters in their deep, deep wretchedness; because Dan and the Honourable Hugh (aye, put them together, and put the better man first!) became partners in the science of torture. The beggar had the honour of trampling just where the justice had trampled; but the magistrate trod out the life of a gentle heart—the released pauper struck only a fair brow against the stone, and drew nothing but mere blood.

Let it, moreover, be mentioned, to the credit of the latter (who had just been trudging it all the way out of Wiltshire), that this was not exactly the kind of ruffianism he affected or gloried in. So, on second thoughts, he lifted Joyce up from the ground, and held her under the nearest gaslight, to assure himself that not much was the matter. It was only a stun and a skin-wound.

"Well," cried Dan, "thank your lucky star it's no worse. But what, in the name of goodness gracious, was ye doing agen them steps? And where are yer a-going to at this time of night?"

"Pray, pray," cried Joyce, "let me go! I'm better now, and I only felt a little faint, and rested against the steps. You didn't mean it, I know."

"Now," said the man, "if you've no respectable place to go to, such a night as this, I think I can put ye up to a good thing."

For Dan was a true Londoner, and had only made a settlement (as the Poor Law called it) down in Wiltshire, and had met with Cicely there.

"What do you mean?" asked Joyce, who remembered now, for the first moment, that she had nowhere to lay her head that night.

"Why, ye see," said the man, who was really sorry, as the poor girl was wiping off little drops of blood from her forehead, and making red spots all over the miserable rag she carried in her hand; "ye see, I know a bit of a crib, where you'd be quite safe, if you're what I take ye to be, not much given to be out o' nights, and want to live respectable like."

Joyce didn't quite know what to make of this proposal (though it was made with really kind intentions) but she continued walking on beside the man, in that pelting rain, and on that dark December night; now and then looking behind her, as if she could not turn her back for long together on the new home of her baby boy; or as if she thought a little, thin, white form was following her in the gleams of the gaslight, and upbraiding her with leaving him.

"I've come a long way since last Sunday," said Dan, as they slouched through the deserted streets, followed by the suspicious looks of every policeman, till he saw them safe into another beat.

"Where from?" asked the girl.

"Down away in Wiltshire."

"Wiltshire!" repeated Joyce. Some vague recognition of the word, as if she had heard something of it before, made her say it with a start and a stare.

"Aye," said Dan; "and to tell ye the truth, though ye're not a bit like her, ye really put me in mind of a pretty bothering job I had down there, when I see ye so takin' on in the dirt agen that house."

"What was that?" Joyce asked.

And in his own way, and seasoned with his own lies, Dan told the story of the justice-room.

"Aye," said Dan, "and a regular trump that young beak was, I can tell ye. If that wench's brat had been mine, and she'd ha' lived, I'd ha' called her Latson, for his sake; hang me if I wouldn't."

"Latson!" almost shrieked poor Joyce; "Latson!" "Wiltshire! Why, do you say there is a Mr. Latson, a magistrate, down in Wiltshire! a magistrate!" and the girl placed herself right in front of her companion, and dashed her two hands upon his shoulders before he knew what she was about.

"Aha!" she laughed—(not a good laugh to listen to)—"some namesake, no doubt! But, but—" and here she released Dan's shoulders, much to his satisfaction, and said in a calmer, hollow voice,—""but do ye think ye could tell me where Hugh Latson is? Do ye think he's any relation to one Hugh Latson? Eh! Speak! speak!"

"No," said Dan, with provoking calmness, "no relation whatsoever, for he's Hugh Latson himself. Would ye like to see his writing?"

And while the poor girl, half beside herself with mingled hope, and love, and sorrow, was pushing back her hair from her white gaunt cheeks, as one suddenly woke up from a horrid dream, the man pulled out a dirty piece of paper (something connected with the trial or committal of poor Cicely), and holding it up to the first lamp, showed her, plainly enough, the full signature of the worthy magistrate.

Joyce would have covered that writing with kisses in a moment; and was beginning to do so; but—"magistrate! magistrate!"—that idea stopped her. Whatever he had said of himself, he had certainly never acknowledged a rank like that.

Joyce was now fairly in a dream. And Dan could do nothing but look on, and wonder what she could have to do with it. Till at last it did occur to him that, perhaps, he had not been so far wrong in his rough language to her when they met, and that Joyce, too, might have come before the Honourable Hugh with a tale something like the workhouse girls'.

By this time, the little piece of paper (by Dan's leave), was safe down against her bosom, and then that scrap of black and white paper took little Hugh's place for that night, and for many a long night and many a long day yet to come.

THE GANGES.

We have all heard of the Ganges. Some of our readers may have visited its banks and navigated its sacred waters. To the majority, however, we suppose the Ganges is only a name. But it is a name which has by the force of recent events in India, been brought before us with more than ordinary interest. It has become something more than the holy river of the Hindoos. By them it has always been accounted the most sacred of rivers. The devotee hastens to perform his ablutions with its water, and believes himself purified from all sin; or he resolves on a sacrifice, and offers himself as the victim, by the commission of suicide in the river. The feet of the dying are immersed in it, that the departing spirit may go straight to the Hindoo paradise; and, even in British courts of justice, Hindoos are sworn upon its waters, as the Christians and Mohammedans are on their sacred books. The Ganges is an essential part of Hindooism. But the English, if they value their Indian possessions, are as much indebted to the Ganges as the Hindoos themselves. It is the great highway by which we have acquired our richest possessions, and the grand route of communication by which we now maintain our authority.

We boast of our navy, and glory in the wooden walls of old England. We build Leviathans, and launch Agamemnon and other monstrous ships; we hold grand naval reviews, and suppose that we are doing all that is to be done. But what can our naval force do up the Ganges? what are Leviathans worth, in this respect, compared with a river steamboat? Up the Ganges we must go; it is navigable for smaller boats right through the heart of Bengal, to the very foot of the mountains, but we want another kind of fleet to do the work. What would our commanders in India give for Chelsea boats?

What the Nile is to Egypt is the Ganges to India. From the central chain of the Himalaya to the Bay of Bengal, it flows through the most fertile region of Hindostan, and its course is almost entirely confined to the British presidency of Bengal and Agra.

It has two heads Bhagirathi and Alcananda. The first of these, and that which is esteemed the holiest by the Hindoos, rises near Gangoutis, about 200 miles from Delhi, and nearly 14,000 feet above the sea level. It joins the Alcananda at a place called Deoprang, where it measures about 80 yards in width. There it assumes the name of the Ganges, and entering the great plain of Hindostan at Hurdwar, flows with a smooth, navigable current to the ocean, a distance of nearly fourteen hundred miles.

The delta of the Ganges, which begins to form about two hundred miles from the sea, is twice as large as that of the Nile. The eastern arm of the river there becomes the main stream, and carries with it the sacred name; the western arm, adopting that of Hooghly, is less important, but is regarded by the natives with peculiar veneration, they having an idea that its waters are from the pure source, the true Bhagirathi. Both arms of the river, together with several tributary streams, empty themselves into the Bay of Bengal.

The course of the Ganges, after entering the plain of Hindostan, is from Hurdwar to Allahabad, and between these places its advance is tolerably straight. After passing Allahabad, its course becomes more devious, increasing in extent and attaining its greatest magnitude below Ghazipore. After this it varies in width from half a mile to three miles, its average depth for the last five hundred miles of its course being thirty feet. Its rate of descent is about nine inches to the mile. Nearly two-thirds of the fall take place before reaching Cawnpore. The mean rate of its current in dry weather is three miles an hour, but in the wet season it frequently attains more than double that speed.

Like the Nile, the Ganges is subject to annual inundations. The tropical rains are in both instances the cause—but with this difference, the Nile is affected by rains which fall in its upper regions only; the Ganges by rains which descend throughout its whole extent. The waters begin to rise in April, at first by very slow degrees, but gradually increasing from one inch to three inches in the day. The fall of rain does not begin in Bengal till the middle of June, by which time the increase of rise is five inches a day: at the beginning of August a decrease takes place, and from that month to November, the waters gradually sink to their old level.

The inundations, although fully anticipated, have sometimes occasioned great disasters. A single flood of the Ganges has destroyed fifty thousand persons. The whole of the surrounding country has been covered, and the loss of property as well as of life has been very great.

One of the most observable effects of these inundations is, the alterations which are continually taking place in the bed of the river. This is particularly noticeable in the presidency of Bengal. As the branches of the river are perpetually shifting, marshes are produced, and islands are alternately formed and destroyed. For the preservation of private property, or for other reasons, certain districts of country are saved from the inundations by the formation of dykes; but the policy of the expedient is more than doubtful, as the land has to be irrigated by artificial means.

The banks of the Ganges are ornamented and enriched by many populous cities; and thousands of villages, temples, and bungalows impart a picturesque and agreeable aspect. The accompanying engraving furnishes a better idea of the banks of the Ganges in the populated districts, than could be done by any written description.

THE KNAVE UNMASKED.

A LOVE STORY.

MR. WORTHIMAN was in love. This love is a universal passion. It enters everywhere, and captivates all classes of people, rich and poor, wise and simple. Into the cottage it creeps, and taps gently at the maiden's heart till she opens the door and lets it in. It glides among proud dames and titled notables, and lodges itself in the heart of a monarch. It lurks in the workshop and the factory, and enchains its slaves there; it touches the student, and he lays down Ovid and begins the art of love on his own account. More than this, it makes its way into the minister's closet, follows the preacher into his pulpit, and makes him feel, in the most powerful text in the Bible, "that it is not good for man to be alone."

This was the case with Mr. Worthiman; the Rev. Philip Worthiman, M.A., of Oxon. How it began was in this wise. Just opposite the pulpit in the middle aisle, on the right hand side as you entered, was the family pew of Samuel Blandford, Esq., and at the corner of the pew, next the door, sat Ellen Blandford, with her tender eyes attentively fixed on the young and handsome preacher.

Mr. Worthiman observed her, he was pleased with her constant attendance, her patient attention, her approbation and sympathy. She seemed to inspire him with fresh ardour each Sabbath; for when anything occurred to prevent her attendance at the morning or afternoon service, there seemed something gone from his heart, and he was less eloquent than usual.

Mr. Worthiman felt that this was wrong! and it was in analysing his feelings, that he made the discovery that he was—in love!

Then, forming a more intimate acquaintance with the Blandfords, and reading Ellen's heart through the pure transparency of her conversation, Mr. Worthiman loved her more deeply than before, and to his alarm he found that his heart was irretrievably hers.

Some persons may blame the clergyman for falling in love from the pulpit. Let them reflect that the best clergymen are human. Others, more charitable, may only be surprised that he, being a single man, and Ellen, a worthy girl, did not propose to marry her at once.

Let me explain. Mr. Worthiman had not foolishly resolved never to marry, but he had long since made up his mind to select for his wife some poor girl, who had nothing but a whole heart to bring her husband. A minister, he thought, of all men, should avoid the imputation of marrying for any worldly advantage, and when he was told that by the death of a rich uncle, whose favourite she was, Ellen had come into a fortune of five thousand pounds, he said to himself—

"She can never be my wife!"

So two years passed, and he still preached from his pulpit to the fair maiden, who listened with melting, upturned eyes, and who never suspected his secret love.

But an unexpected occurrence troubled the serenity of the young clergyman's heart. A stranger, named Britton, took up his residence in Springley, and became a constant attendant at church. He was for a long time a subject of much gossiping conversation, and everybody appeared to like him, except the clergyman.

And the clergyman might be prejudiced; for anybody might see that the stranger was very attentive to Ellen Blandford, and that she seemed pleased with his addresses. He and the clergyman had met on several occasions, and the latter, whose perception of human character was certainly keen, became more firmly impressed, at each meeting, with the conviction that Mr. Britton was unworthy of Ellen.

Yet he accused himself of selfishness, and endeavoured to think better of his rival. It was to no purpose; and now, seeing Ellen's happiness at stake, he was plunged into despair.

It was very natural, then, that the clergyman should regret his resolution not to marry Ellen because she happened to possess five thousand pounds, and that he should think seriously of retrieving his error.

"I may yet obtain her hand," said he to himself, "for she cannot love him."

It was one evening in the month of June—a warm, soft, quiet evening, and the dim twilight flung its sweet, melancholy influence over the young preacher's heart. He took his hat, and sauntered slowly in the direction of Mr. Blandford's house. He passed the garden, and through the luxuriant branches of the trees which fringed the road floated sounds of human voices, and fell upon his ear. Gentle and low were the words that were spoken, but they sent a sharp pang into the clergyman's heart, for he recognised the flute-like tones of Ellen, who was not alone. The other voice was Britton's. He turned hastily away; but inadvertently he had heard enough,—this man was seeking the hand of Ellen—and Ellen had bestowed it on him!

On the following morning, Mr. Worthiman was paler than usual, and there was a sadness in his smile, which his friends could not understand. That day's meditation was father to his discourse the next Sabbath, which had for its subject "Resignation," and which was so full of the touching eloquence for which he was distinguished—so warm in the outpourings of a suffering but patient spirit, that the tender, upturned eyes of Ellen Blandford were dim with glistening tears, and when, at the close of his sermon, he said, in a deep, agitated tone, "Let sorrowing souls pray God for resignation," and lifted up his voice in earnest prayer, the sympathising girl bowed down her face and sobbed.

Some three months after, Mr. Worthiman was sitting in his study, when a visitor was announced. It was Mr. John Britton.

"I have come to engage your services," said he, smiling.

The preacher turned pale.

"Our marriage," he continued—"I mean that of dear Ellen and myself—is fixed for Thursday week, and you will place us both under obligation, if you can make it convenient to attend that day."

"So soon?" murmured Mr. Worthiman, making a mighty effort to be calm.

"Why, since the marriage contract is made, the sooner it is fulfilled the better, I think," replied Mr. Britton.

"Perhaps so," said Mr. Worthiman, thoughtfully. "But," he added, fixing his searching eyes on Britton's face, "Miss Ellen has known you only a few months."

Mr. Britton changed colour, and appeared ill at ease, as he replied, with a feeble attempt at humour—"I take advantage of that; for you know she might grow weary of me, if our marriage was delayed too long."

After the aspiring bridegroom had gone, the young clergyman was plunged in deep thought. He paced his room nervously, then, to cool his fevered brow, sought the open air. Long and painful was the struggle in his heart. At length he exclaimed, fervently—

"I will forget self. I will do my duty. I will be strong. Shall my voice betray emotion when I pronounce the fatal words which shall make her his wife?"

But Mr. Worthiman was troubled with anxiety. And he was sure there was no selfishness in the fear that Britton was not worthy his intended bride. He suspected the man's sincerity, and communicated his suspicions to Mr. Blandford.

"Why, to be sure," said Mr. Blandford, "it has never entered my head that there could be any deception. Mr. Britton certainly appears respectable, and as for his property—"

"That is nothing. But is he a man of integrity? Is he a man of principle? We see nothing in him to raise a doubt touching his moral character, it is true; but what has been his past career? Do not blame me for the interest I take in your daughter's future happiness," he added, with feeling. "Where the welfare of the young and virtuous is at stake, we cannot be too cautious."

Mr. Blandford was plunged in thought. He was not convinced that he had anything to fear; but the reflection that there was a possibility of deception, startled his naturally peaceful mind. Thanking Mr. Worthiman for his suggestion, he asked his advice with regard to what he ought to do.

"If you like," replied the clergyman, "you can say to Mr. Britton it is for my satisfaction, that you propose referring to respectable persons he may name, for testimony concerning his character. Ah, here comes Mr. Britton himself. If you would rather, I will speak to him myself."

"Do, do," said Blandford, who shrank from the disagreeable duty.

Mr. Britton entered, polite and smiling. Mr. Blandford received him cordially; the minister was reserved and serious.

With all possible delicacy, and carefully shaping his phrases so as not to offend, Mr. Worthiman addressed Mr. Britton on the subject he had opened to Mr. Blandford's consideration.

"Do I understand you?" asked Mr. Britton, visibly changing countenance. "You desire reference for my character? Ah! certainly—a mere form," he added, carelessly. "I wonder I never thought of the thing before."

Mr. Britton took from his pocket a card, on which he wrote several names. This he appeared about to give to Mr. Blandford, when, seeming to change his mind, he produced another card, on which he wrote in the same manner, murmuring—

"I think I will write the names more distinctly."

He then handed the card last written upon to his intended father-in-law, and placed the other in his pocket-book.

"Here you have six of the most respectable men in the town of W—, where I was born and brought up, and where I have lived nearly all my life. You can refer to either, or all of them."

And with an air of indifference, which struck the minister and Mr. Blandford differently, he walked out of the room.

"It is as I expected," said Mr. Blandford. "If there had been anything wrong in the matter, he would have been less ready to give us these references. It will be a mere farce to make use of them, after all."

"But would it not be a satisfaction to receive from either of these men assurance of your son-in-law's integrity? I can see nothing farcical in that."

"True—true!"

"And besides, what will Mr. Britton think now if you do not write? Will he not be apt to consider me meanly suspicious, instead of honestly cautious?"

"You have decided me," said Mr. Blandford. "I will write to Sir J. F. Stone to-day. W— is in — county, is it not?"

"I believe it is: but Mr. Britton should have told us, since he knows neither of us ever visited that part of the country," said the minister, quietly.

As Mr. Worthiman left the house, he saw Ellen and her lover standing together under the porch. He spoke to them and passed on, observing, as he did so, that a slight blush suffused Ellen's cheeks, and that Britton regarded him with a triumphant smile.

Almost any other man would have entertained a doubt touching the character of Mr. Blandford's son-in-law, after witnessing the apparently frank manner in which he offered to refer for testimony in his favour to the principal men in the town where he was brought up. Yet the young clergyman was not satisfied. The happiness of her he loved was at stake, and he could not see her married to one of whose honour and integrity he had no certain proof. He returned home full of perplexity and distracting doubts.

Three days after, Mr. Blandford and the minister met again. The former produced a letter, with an air of satisfaction and triumph. It was from W—, and signed by J. F. Stone, Bart.: Worthiman read it. His hand trembled, and the colour left his cheek.

"You are satisfied now, I trust?"

"This gentleman certainly speaks in the highest terms of Mr. Britton," replied the minister; "certainly, one could expect no stronger commendation."

Mr. Blandford placed the letter in his pocket, and commenced talking on another subject, as if anxious that this should not be mentioned again.

Although Mr. Worthiman was conscious of having done nothing which he did not deem it his duty to do, he was afraid that Ellen and her father might not rightly view his motives. Even now—after seeing Sir J. F. Stone's certificate—he was not satisfied; but such was his repugnance again to give utterance to doubts, that he scrupulously held his peace.

The reader will undoubtedly pronounce Mr. Worthiman to be very unreasonable. He, himself, was afraid that such was the case. But the style of eulogy in which Sir J. F. Stone spoke of Mr. Britton, did not appear to him at all characteristic of a gentleman, and now, more than ever, did he fear that some deception was practised. So strongly, indeed, was he impressed with this idea, that he could not rest until he had written a letter to the postmaster of W—.

Two days passed. On the morning of the third, a letter, postmarked "W—," was received by Mr. Worthiman. He was at the breakfast table when it was handed him, and more than one of his friends observed the sudden change of his countenance as he tore it open. He read as follows—

"In reply to your inquiry, I have only to say that there is no such person as Sir J. F. Stone living in W—, and I never heard the name until a few days since, when a letter, superscribed with it, came to this P. O., and was taken out by another person. As for the man named Britton, I believe there was formerly such a person at the W— Hotel, but I know nothing definite concerning him."

"Your humble servant,

"THOMAS SNOW, Postmaster."

Mr. Worthiman arose from the table. His friends noticed his abrupt movement, and his agitated manner. Telling them, hurriedly, that he was called upon to leave town that morning, he ordered his chaise, adding, that he might not return within a day or two. Half an hour later he was driving rapidly through the village.

It was Tuesday morning. Mr. Worthiman had a journey of more than a hundred miles before him. All the morning he travelled in his chaise, but after dinner, leaving the horse and vehicle at a hotel, he betook himself to the railroad, and continued his journey by express.

It was about sunset when the clergyman arrived in W—. Having deposited his carpet-bag at the hotel, he proceeded without delay to the post-office—introduced himself to Mr. Snow, and told him his business.

"There is no baronet in W—, I'm sure," said Mr. Snow.

"And are any of these names familiar to you?"

Mr. Worthiman showed him a list of the names Britton had written on the card he gave Mr. Blandford.

"No, sir, there are no such men in W—. But I have heard of the names before."

"Well?"

"The person who took the letters addressed to 'Stone,' asked for letters for all these names."

Mr. Worthiman now felt sure that he saw through the whole trick.

"And who is this person?"

"His name is Hubble. He is a horse-dealer, or something of the sort."

"And where is he to be found?"

"He stops at the W— Hotel."

Having put a few more questions concerning Britton, and Hubble, the horse-dealer, Mr. Worthiman returned to the hotel. Hubble was not in; nor did he make his appearance until late in the evening. But such was the clergyman's anxiety to see him that he sat up to await his return.

It was past midnight when a showily-dressed man was introduced to him as Mr. Hubble. That he had been too freely indulging in strong drink was evident enough from his incoherent and excited manner, but this circumstance so far favoured the clergyman's purpose as to render it a perfectly easy matter to ascertain every particular of Britton's former life. These particulars showed the fellow to be a thorough knave. The letters respecting his character were all forged by Hubble; but what was of most importance was the fact that Britton was a married man. He had married, and afterwards deserted, the daughter of a Dr. Martin at L—, whose address Worthiman immediately procured.

Little did the clergyman sleep that night. The important secrets which the inebriated horse-dealer had disclosed to him, of his own accord, occupied his mind; and he formed his plans for the following day.

Mr. Worthiman arose at dawn, took an early breakfast, and set out for L— in the first morning train. He was immediately on his arrival directed to the house he sought, and learned, from the injured man himself, all the particulars of Britton's desertion of his first wife.

In the meanwhile, nobody in Springley suspected the object of the clergyman's journey, and no one knew whither he had gone. Mr. Britton, rejoicing in the fancied success of his deception, waited anxiously for the arrival of his wedding-day. The preparations for the wedding were made; the guests were invited, and, as the time drew near, the bride was dressed for the occasion.

The bridal procession started, and arrived at the church, but the clergyman was absent. He was expected every moment, so the party waited, somewhat impatiently, in the vestry.

But Ellen expressed no regrets. The truth is, she had long suspected that the minister loved her, and there was a tumult in her heart which I will not attempt to describe. I need only add—she hoped the minister would not come!

Her father withdrew, but in a few moments he returned, saying, that as Mr. Worthiman was still absent, it was thought best the ceremony should be performed by an old clergyman, a friend of the minister's, who was one of the guests, and a magistrate.

Ellen trembled violently; but she could not object. "At least," thought she, "Mr. Worthiman will not marry us—I am ready!"

The bridegroom and bride, accompanied by the bridesmaids and groomsmen, entered the church, where the guests were assembled, and took their places. Ellen was pale and agitated. She appeared to shrink from the man whose wife she was about to become. Britton, meanwhile, his lips compressed with an expression of determination to triumph, looked intently at the clergyman.

The latter hesitating to begin the ceremony, Britton manifested his impatience, and before the reverend gentleman had read a sentence, two vehicles rolled up to the door, and Mr. Worthiman made his appearance. Britton frowned at the interruption; he dreaded another lecture on wedlock. Ellen turned very pale. Mr. Worthiman advanced towards the clergyman.

"Have you married them?" he asked, in a husky voice.

"If you had come two minutes later, I should have answered yes."

"Then I have arrived in time! You will allow me, sir, to take your place."

The old clergyman bowed, and stood aside. Every eye was fixed on the haggard face and strangely gleaming eyes of the young minister.

"John Britton," said he, in a deep, earnest voice, "is it your intention to make this woman your wife?" Britton bowed his head.

"Then, it is your intention to perjure yourself before God and man."

There was a movement of surprise and wonder amongst the guests. Britton became livid with rage and apprehension. The bride clasped her hands, fixed her eyes intently on the clergyman, and stood white and motionless as a marble statue.

"Sir," said Mr. Blandford, anxiously, "do you know what you say?"

"I know I speak truth. Here are my witnesses."

Dr. Martin stepped forward. Britton recoiled with a look of rage and consternation.

"Do you know me, villain?" demanded the doctor. "I am Samuel Martin—the father of your injured wife!"

"It is false!" muttered Britton, hoarsely. "Take the madman away!"

The doctor sneered, raised his hand, and a stout man advanced through the crowd of disconcerted and amazed guests.

"Mr. Britton," said he, "we know each other, and you will not doubt my authority. It is my duty to arrest you."

"Sir!" muttered Britton, "of what am I accused?"

"Forgery!" replied the officer.

Britton's countenance fell; he made no resistance. And while the company broke up in confusion, and the bride was fainting in the arms of her maids, the officer and his assistant conveyed their prisoner to the nearest public-house, to keep him until morning.

This exciting event made quite a stir in Springley. Britton was suddenly remembered to have been a knavish-looking fellow, Ellen Blandford was pitied, and the clergyman lionised.

It was several weeks before Ellen again appeared in her accustomed place on the Sabbath, for a lingering fever had been the result of the suffering she had undergone.

At length she entered the church with her father—thin and pale, but no less beautiful than formerly. As Mr. Worthiman, having ascended the pulpit, cast his eye in the direction of Mr. Blandford's pew, and saw Ellen's sad, sweet face turned towards him, he felt a thrill of pleasure, strangely mixed with pain. Many were the sentiments in his sermon addressed to her that day; words of advice and consolation, which none could understand so well as she, and for which she felt truly grateful.

Mr. Worthiman was now a constant visitor at the house of Mr. Blandford, where he was ever a welcome guest. He had taken it upon himself to console Ellen; and, had you seen the bloom returning to her cheek, and the light of happiness to her eye, you would have said he succeeded well.

One afternoon, Mr. Worthiman received a copy of the Lancet, from which he learned that Britton had been convicted of forgery, and sentenced to seven years' transportation, and that his injured wife had ended her earthly sorrows within an hour after he had been condemned. Such was the sad intelligence the clergyman had to convey that evening to Ellen Blandford.

A few months after, the clergyman was wedded to one every way worthy to become a clergyman's wife; and if ever a person suspected that he married Ellen for her money, that person must have been speedily convinced to the contrary, by the use Mr. Worthiman made of it in doing good.

ANSWERS TO OUR CHESS CORRESPONDENTS.

W. D.—Mr. Staunton won a large majority of the games in the match which he played with his redoubtable adversary, M. St. Amant.

R. C.—Problems Nos. 2, 3, and 4, shall be reported upon next week. Problem No. 1 is rather neat, and shall appear amongst the Enigmas.

C. W. B. (Ryde).—The game to which you refer has already been published. Q to Q Kt sq at White's 19th move, certainly leads to a winning position; but Q Kt to K Kt 3 would have given White an earlier victory.

D. W. O.—Your letter of the 26th September has until now been accidentally overlooked. The solutions which accompanied it are, as usual, correct, and the various defences of Black completely exhausted.

OLD PHILLO.—The information which you ask for must be communicated through the post. Will you favour us with your address?

Our Editorial Table.

No. 1, New Series, of "CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER." The first number of our journal in its altered form, now present to our subscribers, will, we are confident, secure for us their hearty congratulation, as well as account of the improvement in the form as the sterling value of the substance. We feel certain that if they will only read it carefully through from the beginning to the end, they will agree with us, that, in the merit of the literary contributions, instructive, amusing, and poetical—in the selection of the subjects for illustration, and in the beauty of the engravings, the New Series of "CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER" far surpasses all its competitors of the cheap periodical press. We would especially direct attention to the two continuous tales, in the first of which J. F. SMITH, author of "Dick Tareyton," &c., displays all his pristine power; and in the second, FELIX STOWE will, if we may judge by the opening chapters, enlist the sympathies and keep up the interest of his readers throughout the course of his harrowing tale. The future numbers of our Paper will be in every respect equal to what we have now the pleasure of producing; and, in fact, "CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER"—New Series—challenges comparison in its literary and artistic departments with any of its illustrated contemporaries.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.—"CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER," Vol. IV., is now ready, price 7s. 6d. in cloth boards, and 5s. 6d. in paper boards. Vols. I., II., and III can also be had.

A CONSTANT READER OF CASSELL'S PAPER.—We know of no reason why a widow should be treated with more or less deference than an unmarried lady. Au reste, the man who needs another's help to put his wishes into words, does not deserve the object he seeks to win.

LUCY.—We cannot tell whether it is unlucky to break the corner, or, indeed, any part of a looking glass, as we do not believe in such a thing as luck. The question you found upon this unlucky accident is a very grave one. You ask "whether it is likely to prove a bar to your getting married." It can only prove so, we think, in the event of your intended regarding it as a sign of your being rather careless.

A YOUNG HOUSEKEEPER.—The gentleman of highest rank or consideration present always takes his hostess in to dinner. To indicate a preference for the escort of any particular person would be ill-bred as well as highly improper and indecorous.

S. G.—Ladies' maids in large establishments rank next to the housekeeper.

MORPHEUS.—The guests in such houses as are described by our correspondent, should make the first move towards retiring at night. Except in peculiar cases, illness or equally imperative circumstances, it would be impossible for the host and hostess to withdraw, leaving their circle to their own devices.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS asks us "if it is etiquette" "to offer to open the door of a car or carriage for a lady one is not acquainted with." Certainly not. Etiquette is founded upon common sense and propriety, and it being one part of a lady's education to scramble through carriage windows, it would of course be highly ungentlemanly to offer her the unnecessary attention of opening the door. The fact of the lady's being a stranger, would of course operate precisely in this case as the same circumstance did in the well-known Cantab story—when one gowmsman saw another sinking in the river, and exclaimed in agony, "Oh, if I had only been introduced, then I would save him!"

A SEEKER OF TRUTH.—We wish you a better temper and a better creed. Farewell.

OXFORD HILL DOG asks us to define flirtation as applied to young ladies. He has set us a difficult task—this vice, like so many others, being more easily felt and understood than explained. We cannot take upon ourselves to describe the exact particulars, define the limits of flirtation to a nicety; but we will give our friend some idea of what we consider it to be. An utter absence of all the retiring gentleness which is the great charm of woman; a bold desire to win the notice and admiration of men; a flippant, forward manner to attract it, or a shy seeming modesty, an appealing helplessness, which if less openly disgusting is not less dangerous and reprehensible; a seeking for, and yielding to the peculiarities, opinions, and whims, of those intended to be subjugated, solely for the purpose of thus establishing an influence over them; the reckless use of every art which can safely be employed to win men from their allegiance elsewhere, and engross it for the flirt; an intense selfishness which reckons nothing of other people's rights, griefs, or feelings, so the present moment is amused, flattered, or gratified; an utter disregard of the affection so much artifice has been used to win; and as the infallible consequence, a complete inability to return or appreciate the honest love of an honest heart.

D. B. W.—We advise you to have nothing to do with the "handicap" and "steepchase" speculation.

G. G. G.—We have not received the "pieces of prose" about which you inquire.

MORGAN.—The tale by A. Dumas commenced in No. 174.

KATHARINE M.—We regret that we know of no one likely to purchase the models you mention. An advertisement would be, we think, the most likely means of discovering a purchaser. It is not ladylike to disfigure a visiting card in the way you describe. In making a ceremonious visit, the caller should leave two or more cards, as there are two or more members of the family she wishes to distinguish.

A PRENTICE LAD.—A master has a perfect right to prohibit any conduct or practice which absorbs his apprentice's time, and withdraws him from proper attention to his business.

YOUNG INQUIRER wants to know how to attain a sufficient knowledge of the English language so as to speak and compose without the least difficulty. We cannot tell, and sincerely wish we knew. Composition is a difficult work at all times, and our best writers understand and feel it. That which is written easily, is commonly hard to read. "Write and rewrite, blot out and write again," is the secret of successful composition. We have no wish, however, to damp the ardour of a "Young Inquirer." Let him thoroughly master English grammar. Let him carefully study prosody. Let him attentively read the works of our ablest authors—the classics of English literature. Let him select for himself one of Addison's essays, for instance, and having embodied every idea in his own language, let him compare his composition with the original. Let him make it a constant practice to express himself in the best manner of which he is capable. Let the subject of any composition he may undertake be well considered before a line is written. Let him sketch the essay rapidly or leisurely, as circumstances allow, but polish laboriously. Let him spare no pains to make every sentence elegant and correct, putting the sentences into paragraphs with the utmost care, and remorselessly erasing every word, every sentence, every paragraph, that is not actually necessary.

F. J.—We cannot give any opinion as to the course likely to be adopted by the new Lord Mayor in the matter alluded to. We believe him to be a good and a clever man, and have no doubt that he will act consistently.

T. B. C. LEADER.—Twelve months after notice, instead of six months, is perfectly legal.

ROLAND DE MONTREVEL.—The parent cannot compel his son to return.

A PERPLEXED ONE is, we fear, playing a dangerous game; engaged to one man, and so far encouraging another as to induce him to make her an offer of marriage, which the fickle one would like to accept if she could make or find the slightest pretext for quarrelling with her betrothed. As all such people do sooner or later, this lady has got herself into a dilemma from which she would now fain extricate herself if she could. The advice she craves from us would not help her even if we gave it. How is it this lady, before indulging in the amusement which costs her now so dearly, did not remember the old verse we have so often repeated—

"It is good to be merry and wise,
It is good to be honest and true;
It is good to be off wi' the auld love,
Before ye are on wi' the new?"

A NOVICE.—Everything would depend on the style of paper and print, and the number of copies required. Ask for estimates from various firms.

AN INQUIRING READER.—A bill at two months dated on the fifth of the month is payable upon the eighth.

MARY RHODES.—You need not wait the gentleman's marriage before suing him for a breach of promise.

A. E. (York).—As you gave the home to your friend's family, you cannot now call upon him for payment on account thereof.

HOUSEKEEPER.—Boiling water fixes stains in German silver, Albatra plate, &c. The best way to use articles made of these materials is to wash them immediately after using in soft, cool soap and water, rubbing bright with a soft duster or chamoin leather. A little fine salt rubbed upon them when wet, will generally remove all stains that may still linger.

C. W. JANE has been answered before.

Z. A.—Repeat your question.

MULTUM IN PARVO will observe that his wish has been gratified. We are obliged to him for his kind note.

MONTBAR.—Commissions in the army have been given to those gentlemen who have raised a fixed number of men as recruits. We would not advise a young man in your position to enlist as a private soldier. Think the matter seriously over before you take so important a step, and do not act in open opposition to the wishes of your family. Family ties demand your first attention. Charity begins at home.

OSBORN MAURICE.—A series of articles on photography appeared in the fourth volume of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER.

SIR JOHN TANLAT (a very youthful baronet we judge from his epistle) wishes to know if he would be able in another year to enter a merchant's office, and what he would have to know. It is clearly impossible for us to tell. He is at liberty to enter an office, mercantile or otherwise, as soon as he pleases. If he means to obtain a situation in an office, we can hold out little hope of his receiving an engagement while he writes so badly, expresses himself so indefinitely, and begins his correspondence in the form of a note, and ends in the form of a letter. Next time he writes, let him take time and not be so much "in haste" as at present.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—See our answer to Montbar. Address your application to an army agent.

ABERFAWY.—The duties of a customs' searcher are not so "cozy" as our correspondent imagines. However, we think, from what he says, he might obtain such a berth, and test its coziness for himself.

INTELLECT.—The Caucasian is the highest form of manly beauty. Intelligence is generally marked by an expansive forehead, but it is the expression, not the form of the features, which distinguishes the clever from the stupid.

H. H. P.—We are obliged for the information, and insert it for the benefit of numerous correspondents. No appointment is attainable in the customs or excise after the age of twenty-five.

J. H. P.—Apply to a medical man, and don't read medical books, which will only make you nervous, and do no good.

J. S. G.—No. 174. You can get the numbers from the publishers. Four volumes.

JOHN FOX.—You have evidently a talent for engraving. Your specimens are good. You must get some one to show you the process. It would take too long to describe.

BROWN BETTY is very unjust in accusing us of indifference to her opinion. We have, on the contrary, given her letter our best consideration. Our reply to her first question is, about 54; to the second, no; the third question cannot be answered,—the expense incurred in printing a book will depend on so many circumstances. Printing a small number will of course lessen the expense, but the cost of composing or setting up the type remains the same. We thank "Betty" for her good opinion of us.

AMABLE.—Do nothing of the kind. Revenge is wrong under any circumstances. If your opponent be strong and powerful, to try and revenge yourself is impolitic; if he be weak and down in the world, it is mean and cruel. To forgive, if you cannot forget the injury, is by far the wisest course.

HAZLEWOOD.—A letter merely addressed, "City, London," would reach the eminent firm to whom you wish to apply.

AJAX.—You need not alarm yourself about your voice. That it should become rather harsh and unmanageable at your age is no extraordinary phenomenon. Refrain from straining it by loud shouting, and give up singing. The latter precaution we advise as much for your friends' sake as for your own.

A CONSTANT READER.—Our influence at the Horse Guards is not sufficiently strong to enable us to answer our correspondent's question.

GEORGES.—Apply to our publishers.

HENRI QUATRE.—Our publishers will supply the numbers.

ANOTHER CONSTANT READER.—Henry Cardinal York died at Rome, and was buried there. With him the direct Stuart line ceased.

VERITAS.—A single man can live very cheaply in France—but we do not think his chances of earning a living so good as they are in England.

HUNCHBACK.—We should advise you to apply for medical aid. Swellings in the throat, caused by excess of blood, are not to be trifled with.

T. R. C. W. of Glasgow writes verses of considerable promise for a youth of seventeen; but they are not up to the mark of the FAMILY PAPER.

JOHN JAMES, AND KINROSSIE.—The publishers of our "Paper," &c., Messrs. Kent and Co., Paternoster-row, will furnish what you require. Write to them.

W. H. R.—Hold a hot iron a little way above the drawing. It will draw the grease spots out.

CHARLES DE ST. HERMINE.—The "Young Pretender" was finished in the last number of our last volume. The paragraph you saw in the daily paper was correct.

GERTRUDE.—Silk was known in southern Europe, under the name of sericum, some time before the commencement of the Christian era; but it was too expensive to be brought into anything like general use. It was the Emperor Aurelian who refused his empress a silk dress, on account of the cost.

JOHANNES MONK.—The work would answer your purpose very well.

STUDENT.—The story of Michael Angelo having his nose flattened by an enraged fellow-student, is, unfortunately for the painter, no fiction.

FANNY GREY.—Lola Montes is a Spaniard.

HORACE.—The functionary you mention has four or five holidays in the course of the year.

J. E. H.—From the nature of your misfortune, we should recommend some sedentary occupation, such as watchmaking, wood engraving, &c. As a clerk, your want of a limb would place you under many disadvantages; and as times go, the salaries obtained by clerks are not of such magnitude as to justify any person who labours under a physical defect in trying to compete with them.

LITTLE LENA.—We are very sorry to disenchant "Little Lena" with regard to the prize pebble she has picked up on the seashore, but are obliged to confess that the fragment forwarded for our inspection is not a piece of "diamond," and that it has no value, except perhaps for paving roads; and for this a larger stock would be required than "Lena" probably possesses.

J. PENSON.—The invention of the telescope is not due to Galileo, the celebrated Italian astronomer; although he very greatly improved that instrument. It was really invented by Zachariah Jansen, a Dutchman, by trade a spectacle maker. He made the discovery on which his invention was based quite accidentally. The story goes, that his children were playing in his shop, and that, on placing two spectacle lenses at a certain distance from each other, they called their father's attention to the curious phenomenon which they observed—namely, that the church steeple was brought as if close to them. Taking the hint, Jansen fixed certain lenses in a tube, and in 1590 manufactured the first telescope. A student must carefully cover the interior of his plaster cast with a little olive oil, and he will then experience no difficulty in taking a clean mould.

F. F. Q.—A little bromine mixed with the iodine, hastens the coating of the plate in the daguerrotype process. We would recommend your trying photography on paper; it is much cheaper and considerably easier than the old method of taking photographs on metallic plates.

OMICRON should rub up his school Latin, and when he finds himself technically at fault, consult his employer.

J. B.—We have no recollection of the poem, but will make inquiry respecting it.

UN AMI.—Apply at Stationers' Hall for a blank form; fill it up and return it, and your song cannot be pirated with impunity.

MARIAN C.—All ladies, single as well as married, should be addressed as "Madam" by those who are not entitled to use greater familiarity.

J. H. A.—You can remove the stains from your mahogany table by the use of a little aqua fortis, or oxalic acid, and water, by rubbing the part with the liquid by means of a cork till the colour is restored, observing afterwards to well wash the wood with water, and to dry and polish as usual.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

Dear bells! how sweet the sound of village bells!
When on the undulating ear they swim;
Now loud in welcomes! faint now as farewells!
And trembling all about the breezy dells!
As fluttered by the wings of cherubim.

THOMAS HOOD.

ALTHOUGH the iron tongue of night had all but told the birth of morning, our readers will please to recollect that New Year's eve was not quite over yet. We must also request them to quit London for awhile, as many are only too happy to do at this festive season, and accompany us to a quiet out-of-the-way village in Devonshire, named St. Faith's, lying at a considerable distance from the high road, somewhere between Tiverton and Exeter.

If any curious persons should be tempted to look for St. Faith's upon the map, we fear they would be disappointed, for, being a very secluded spot, buried as it were in a deep valley from the rest of the world, it has, unfortunately, been overlooked in most topographical surveys; in fact, the route to it is so exceedingly intricate, that we should feel puzzled ourselves to point out its exact locality; and yet we are sufficiently acquainted with the place and its inhabitants to describe them both pretty accurately to our readers.

St. Faith's consists of one irregular street, if, indeed, it may be called a street, seeing that the houses are surrounded by large gardens, or orchards, and all built in a line, running parallel with the lofty wall of Meldown Park.

Owing to the industry and simple habits of the people, there is but little appearance of poverty in the place

Sir Norman Boothroyd, the present owner of Meldown, and of most of the land in the neighbourhood, inherited the title and estate from his uncle, an eccentric old bachelor, who previous to his death granted long and very advantageous leases, not only to the principal tenants, but to the poorest cotters on the property; an act of liberality very unpalatable to the heir, who disapproved of the spirit of independence which the tenantry naturally felt. The farmers would sport upon their farms; even the labourers claimed the right of shooting the rabbits on the common, and what was worse, frequently exercised it in spite of warreners and keepers, to the great annoyance of their landlord, who considered that his manorial rights were trespassed on.

The leading trait in the character of the baronet was pride—not of his talents, for they were most commonplace—Nature had been equally niggard in her gifts both of heart and brain—but of himself, his rank, and name. This weakness, to designate it by no harsher epithet, had manifested itself in his very boyhood, even his younger brother; for when Allan Boothroyd first entered into life—by life, we mean society—Norman declined to associate with him, never went to parties to which he was invited, and treated him with that supercilious coldness which finally extinguished all feeling of affection between them.

The world, as a matter of course, sided with the first-born, the heir of so many thousands a year; and poor Allan, without any fault of his own, found himself isolated, as it were, in the circle he ought to have moved in. His life, as may be supposed, was not a very happy one, for old Mr. Boothroyd invariably agreed with his eldest son, treating his youngest with unnatural severity. It was not very difficult to foresee the consequence of such a state of things. On the death of his mother, the only being who either loved or understood him, the youth quitted his home—it had never been a home to him in the proper sense of the word—and disappeared for years: no one knew what became of him, and few cared.

Shortly after the departure of Allan Boothroyd, his father married again, but did not long survive his second union. On his death-bed, it is said, he prayed to see the boy he had so cruelly treated, but his prayer was denied. Allan was in a foreign land.

Shortly after his accession to the title, Sir Norman bestowed his hand, together with his pride and vanity, upon a woman every way suited to him, for the lady not only echoed his prejudices, but kept them alive, especially those against his absent brother, by every argument an evil mind could suggest. The task was not a difficult one. Husband and wife had heard that Allan was pushing his fortune as a soldier in the Company's service in India, and the intelligence, from reasons which may hereafter appear, was gall and wormwood to both of them; had news arrived that he had fallen, it might have pleased them better.

The only issue of this well-assorted union was a daughter, now ten years old. Sir Norman and his lady would have given worlds for a son; but that blessing was denied them, and little Alice was destined to be the heiress of their vast wealth. How frequently do we see certain qualities, mental as well as personal, disappear for several generations in a race, and then shoot forth again. They did so in the present instance, for never was child more unlike its parents. Alice was not only good, but beautiful; the lessons of pride and selfishness, daily inculcated, made no impression upon her pure and innocent heart; it was incapable of receiving them. To her mother's great annoyance, when riding with her through the village, she would smile and look kindly on the children of her own age, when they paused in their play, and curtsied as the stately equipage dashed by them; not that the heiress purposely disobeyed her parent; the smiles broke forth in spite of her efforts to repress them, and were as spontaneous as the warmth of spring, or the perfume of its opening flowers.

About three years before the commencement of our story, Mr. Thornton, a wealthy manufacturer from Exeter, had purchased an estate not more than five miles distant from Meldown Park, called "The Elms," and came to reside upon it with his family.

For some time the baronet stood aloof, and declined making the acquaintance of his new neighbour; the blood of the descendant of how many Boothroyds the heralds' books alone can tell—for we have not time to sift the chinders of all Sir Norman's ancestors—revolted at the idea of contact with a man who had risen to fortune by his own unassisted energy and industry. The noble stream was too completely frozen by pride for such considerations to thaw it, although others of a less honourable character ultimately did. Mr. Thornton was put on the commission of the peace, and proved not only an active, but a judicious magistrate; for while he followed the law, and convicted in every clear case of poaching, he invariably refused to inflict more than a nominal fine for shooting the rabbits on the common. He considered the exclusive rights claimed by the lord of the manor as exceedingly doubtful; and in answer to his remonstrances on the subject of his absurd lenity, advised him to try the question.

Sir Norman Boothroyd knew better. He persuaded himself it would be much easier to flatter and cajole the upright magistrate by condescending to invite him to Meldown Park. He was deceived. Mr. Thornton accepted his attentions, and returned them, as a matter of course; but they had no influence upon his conduct on the bench: that was as impartial as ever.

As our readers may suppose, no great cordiality could exist between two such opposite characters. The baronet still continued to invite his plebeian neighbour, because it would have been an acknowledgment of his mortification and laid bare his motives, had he ceased to do so without some ostensible cause; but he had long since given up the hope of converting the independent, right-thinking man to his opinions.

Half a dozen persons were seated in the drawing-room at Meldown, without counting the son of Mr. Thornton, a fine spirited boy of thirteen, or the daughter of the owners of the mansion. The party consisted of Sir Norman and his lady; Dr. Poundtext, the rector, a high churchman, and his wife; a wealthy, well-meaning, but ignorant country squire, known throughout the shire by the name of Sporting Blundell; and the proprietor of "The Elms." The usual topics of conversation in the country were exhausted. The clergyman had been eloquent, as usual, on the growing immorality of his parishioners, not that we believe they were more so than their neighbours; the baronet ridden his favourite hobby-horse, poaching, till it was tired out; and Lady Boothroyd echoed his sentiments till she had nothing more to say.

As for the squire, he never started a subject for small talk, but invariably coincided with the last speaker, a peculiarity which, despite his prejudices on the game laws, may account for his frequently agreeing with his brother magistrate, Mr. Thornton, in his decisions.

"New Year's eve," observed Mrs. Poundtext; "no doubt but there will be the usual scenes of noise and dissipation, the bonfire, and ringing of bells."

"I have forbidden the bonfire," said Sir Norman, pompously.

"And my husband forbade the ringing of the bells," added the lady, angrily; "the church is so near the rectory there is no sleeping for them; but that wretched man, Farmer Minter, whom the parish elected churchwarden, insisted upon it as a right, and threatened to appeal to the bishop."

"Shocking!" said the baronet.

"Very shocking indeed!" echoed Lady Boothroyd.

"And ungrateful," continued Mrs. Poundtext; "for the rector actually received him in the library, and asked him to sit down whilst he explained his objections."

"I trust, my love," said her husband, mildly, "that I shall always act with Christian humility and charity, even to the most ignorant and worthless of my fellow-creatures."

"But Minter is neither ignorant nor worthless," observed Mr. Thornton, somewhat warmly; "on the contrary, I have found him a man of sound, practical sense, and unquestionable integrity."

"How can you express such very erroneous opinions?" exclaimed his host. "The fellow is a poacher! I really wonder that you do not identify yourself more with the feelings and ideas becoming the position you have acquired. Extraordinary! Very extraordinary!"

"Most extraordinary!" said her ladyship.

"Well, I think it be extraordinary," observed Squire Blundell, who, as we stated before, generally agreed with the last speaker.

"Perhaps it is because I have acquired it that I do not presume upon it," replied the gentleman, seriously; for he perfectly comprehended the covert sneer.

"Had you inherited your estate from your forefathers, you would think differently," added Sir Norman, pertinaciously following up the attack.

"Very differently, indeed," repeated his echo.

"Perhaps I should," answered Mr. Thornton, beginning to feel slightly nettled at the coarseness of his remarks; "but I purchased it with the fruits of my honest industry—the labour of my hands and head. Meldown, I am aware, was conferred upon your ancestors in an age of barbarism and bloodshed for military service. My property has been acquired by very different ones. The brain," he added, emphatically, "is as honourable a title as the sword."

"Surely you would not compare them," retorted the baronet, with difficulty repressing the anger he felt, at what he considered the presumption of the wealthy parvenu.

"Certainly not," was the emphatic reply.

"Thee beest right in the main, Thornton," said Squire Blundell; "though, as my lady says, thee hast got some queer crochets on thee brain; but I beart surprised. I suppose it do all come from thee having been so long in the worsted line. I saw one of the spinning machines once, but I could not understand it. All I do know is, that it set my poor head a wheeling and a whizzing for a week."

This was uttered with such perfect seriousness and good faith, that it was impossible for the party to whom it was addressed to feel offended. Still, he considered that the conversation had been carried quite far enough. Looking at his watch, he observed that it was late, and requested his son to ring for his carriage.

Sir Norman Boothroyd rung the bell himself.

"What, papa! are you going so soon?" demanded William.

"It is time," answered his father, seriously.

"New Year's eve, too!" added the boy.

"O do stay!" exclaimed little Alice, darting from the table, where she had been playing at some childish game with her young companion, and catching hold of Mr. Thornton's hand. "I have not won once yet," she added, poutingly; "William has beaten me every time."

"Very ungallant of him, indeed," replied the gentleman, with a smile.

In a few minutes the carriage was announced—a cold farewell taken of Sir Norman Boothroyd and his lady—a less formal one of the rector and his wife, who, with all their prejudices and peculiarities, were really very excellent people in their way—and an exceedingly cordial one of Squire Blundell, who seemed perfectly unconscious that anything unpleasant had taken place.

"Alice!" exclaimed her father, angrily, as his daughter held up her innocent face for Mr. Thornton to kiss her, "how can you be such a romp? It's highly unbecoming."

"Very shocking, indeed," repeated her mamma.

The child looked in her face with tearful eyes. She had not the slightest idea of having done anything wrong, and felt the injustice of the reproof.

Mr. Thornton just touched the forehead of his little favourite with his lips, and quitted the drawing-room, accompanied by his son William, who, in all probability, would have taken a similar adieu, had not a look from his father restrained him.

After the departure of the two guests there was a pause of several minutes in the conversation. The baronet broke it at last by observing, in a satisfied tone, "That he thought it would be some time before Mr. Thornton made his appearance again at Meldown Park."

"A very considerable time, I should think," observed her ladyship.

"Why, he beart agoin' to leave the neighbourhood, be he?" demanded Mr. Blundell.

"Not that I am aware of," answered his host, drily.

"Then, why don't thee expect to see him again?"

The rector and his wife smiled at the simplicity of the question. As a matter of course, they comprehended perfectly that a rupture had taken place. Not so the speaker, whose whole life had been passed in the country. The polished sarcasm, the covert impertinence, were lost on him; for, as our readers, doubtless, already have perceived, not only had his education been very much neglected, but his language was not the language of the fashionable world.

Finding that no one answered him, a ray of light, exceedingly faint at first, dawned gradually on the rather obtuse intellect of the squire.

"Why, no! surely 'thee hasn't quarrelled with him?" he added, in the tone of one laboriously debating a question in his own mind.

"Sir Norman Boothroyd can never quarrel with a person like Mr. Thornton," replied the baronet, drawing himself up with an air of pride.

"Of course thee can't," exclaimed his guest, faithful to his habit of coinciding with the last speaker, and, at the same time, delighted at what he mistook for a refutation of his suspicion. "A man must be as obstinate as a mule—a perfect ass—to disagree with a sensible, plain-speaking fellow like Thornton."

The perfect good faith with which this was uttered rendered the sting more poignant. His host coloured to the temples with anger, and fixed his eyes very earnestly on his guest, who, unconscious of the wound he had inflicted, secretly wondered what he was staring at. All present, with the exception of the squire, felt embarrassed; the mistress of the mansion waited, as usual, to take her cue from her husband; whilst Dr. Poundtext and his lady suddenly became deeply interested in the drawings of a magnificent album lying on one of the tables.

"Oh, but papa has quarrelled with Mr. Thornton!" sobbed Alice.

"Has he?" said Mr. Blundell, mechanically.

"He always quarrels with him," continued the child; "and neither he nor William will come to see me again."

As a punishment for these embarrassing observations, the bell was rung twice for the nurse to convey the little offender to bed.

As he gradually comprehended the true state of the case, that he had indirectly compared his stately neighbour both to a mule and a jackass, the broad features of the jovial fox-hunter expanded with mirth, for he possessed a keen relish for the ridiculous when made to see it.

"It be thee own fault, Sir Norman," he cried; "why doesn't thee speak so as a plain man can understand thee. It be mortal droll," he added, bursting into a hearty laugh, "only to think that I should have called thee—but never mind that. There be no offence, I hope?"

The baronet bowed with his most stately air. "Didn't mean it. Thee beant a bit like—wouldn't have called thee such names on any account."

"I—I presume not, Mr. Blundell," answered the deeply mortified owner of Meldown Park. "In fact, I believe not."

These words cost the speaker a violent effort, but, for various reasons, he magnanimously made it. In the first place, like all vain, proud men, he was dreadfully sensitive on the score of ridicule, and did not wish so capital a joke to circulate in the neighbourhood. In the next, the Blundells were as old in the country as the Boothroyds, and far more popular, especially the squire, who, in addition to his reputation as a sporting character, had also that of being a crack shot.

"Pray, do not allude to it again," added the baronet; "it is really too ridiculous."

"I won't," replied his guest, shaking him by the hand most cordially; "though, hang me, if ever I shall see a mule or ass—"

A violent fit of coughing from the mistress of the mansion, who felt alarmed lest her husband's temper should give way, interrupted him. Mr. Blundell thought it was real, and gravely recommended Mrs. Poundtext to pat her on the back.

"You really have caught a dreadful cold, Lady Boothroyd," observed the rector's wife, willing to change the conversation.

"Try nettle tea," said the squire, kindly; "it always does me good, my lady."

There was no mistaking the look which Sir Norman and his better half both gave him. Their visitor began to feel exceedingly uncomfortable. He looked at his huge watch, muttered something about its being late, and took his leave, to the great relief of all parties.

"How dreadful! a man of his family to be so exceedingly coarse and ignorant," observed the baronet. "You forget whom he associates with, my love," charitably remarked her ladyship; "the man dines at 'The Elms' twice a week, at least."

The Poundtexts looked as if dining twice a week at 'The Elms' was something very wicked,—a sort of eighth deadly sin; but they said nothing, for they did not wish to be quoted. The squire had more than one living in his gift, and the rectory of St. Faith's was an exceedingly poor one, the great tithes going to the lord of the manor.

"My dear lady Boothroyd, you really are exceedingly unwell," said the reverend gentleman, who felt that their absence was desirable. "It is time we left you to repose."

The invitation to remain was so faintly given, there was but little difficulty in declining it, and the owners of Meldown Park were left to their own amiable society. No sooner did he find himself alone, than Sir Norman gave vent to his long smothered indignation. "It was entirely on account of that fellow Thornton he had been insulted; not one of his family should ever set foot at the hall again! he would never rest till he had got him removed from the bench! he was in league with poachers!"

"Ridiculous," said her ladyship, whose manner since the departure of the last of her guests had entirely changed, for she now spoke in a decided, commanding tone; "he is neither in league with the poachers, nor can you drive him from the bench; he will be gazetted a deputy-lieutenant within a week."

"A deputy-lieutenant!" repeated the horror-stricken baronet, for it appeared little short of profanation to confer such an honour on a mere parvenu, a fellow without blood in his veins like Mr. Thornton. "I shall resign my commission."

"You will do nothing of the kind," coolly observed his wife. "The step would only draw increased ridicule upon you; but, on the contrary, when the event takes place, call at 'The Elms' and congratulate him; it will be an excellent opportunity for healing the breach between you."

"Lady Boothroyd, do you imagine I have no pride?" demanded her husband.

"Too much, Sir Norman, too much! would you could exchange some portion of it for a little more resolution."

"No self-respect?"

"Too little," replied the lady, drily. "But that has nothing to do with the question. You detest this upstart Thornton—now, I dislike him too; in fact, look upon him as an enemy to our just influence in the shire. But to strike surely," she added, lowering her voice to a most unpleasant whisper, "we must keep him within reach! Now do you comprehend me?"

"Not exactly," faltered the baronet, beginning to feel alarmed at the evil spirit he had invoked.

"I thought not," said the female Machiavelli, in a tone of contempt; "but you will in time."

The gentleman yielded, as he invariably did, to the strong will of the speaker; in fact, there existed a kind of tacit compact between them, the wife being allowed to rule in secret, provided she paid submissive deference to the opinions of her husband in public; that was a homage his pride and vanity alike demanded, and, possibly, might have contended for. Like most men, he paid a fearful penalty for the gratification of his weakness.

By most persons the mistress of Meldown Park was looked upon as a poor, spiritless creature, a mere non-entity in her family. They did not know her; few really did.

From first to last the evening had proved a most unpleasant one, and Sir Norman felt considerably irritated—dissatisfied with himself, and consequently with every one else, not excepting her ladyship. After taking several turns up and down the drawing-room, he stopped suddenly short, and bade her good night.

"Where are you going?" she inquired.

"Round the park, and perhaps to the common, to see that my keepers are on the alert, and do their duty," he answered.

"Absurd! to lose your night's rest, and make yourself unpopular in the neighbourhood, for a few paltry hares and rabbits."

"Lady Boothroyd," said her husband, with more firmness than he generally ventured to show when they were alone, "that is my affair, strictly my affair. I consider it a point of honour to maintain my manorial rights intact as I received them from my ancestors, who, in the reign of the Plantagenets, would have hanged the rascally poachers."

"But we are not living in the time of the Plantagenets now," observed the lady.

"More the pity," replied the baronet; "more the pity."

And, so saying, he quitted the room. His wife saw him depart with a feeling nearly allied to contempt, for, as our readers may imagine, there was not much real affection between them; the bond of mutual respect—the strongest as well as the most lasting tie—had long been broken between them.

Little imagining what important events would arise from the sudden caprice of her husband to perambulate his domain, the mistress of Meldown Park retired to rest.

It was a bright moonlight night, and the snow was lying crisply on the ground, when Mr. Thornton and his son drove through the village of St. Faith's, on their return to "The Elms." As his father did not seem inclined for conversation, William amused himself by looking through the window of the carriage and noticing every object as they passed it on the road.

Hitherto, he had seen but little to attract his attention: One or two sturdy-looking yeomen and several labourers, the former well wrapped up in comfortable greatcoats, the latter in smock-frocks, hastening to the only inn in the place, to drink prosperity to the coming year; and a group of young men who were singing in front of the house of Farmer Minter.

"They must be very fond of music," thought the boy, "to stand singing there on a cold frosty night like this. How very absurd!"

He forgot that the farmer had three pretty daughters! Had he recollected that, and been a year or two older, the probability is, he would have come to a different conclusion.

"There goes Old Simon!" he exclaimed aloud, as they passed a small but neat cottage. "It must be nearly twelve o'clock, papa."

The person thus familiarly designated, is too important a personage not to merit a particular introduction to our readers.

Simon Gee, or, as every one familiarly called him, Old Simon, was the only hand-loom weaver and the principal bell-ringer in the village. The first was his calling, the means whereby he lived; and being not only an expert artisan, but an exceedingly honest man, he naturally stood high in the confidence of the farmers' wives, whose home-spun thread he converted into good strong household cloth, for none of the inhabitants, unless those at the hall or rectory, ever thought of purchasing linen; such an extravagance was unheard of at St. Faith's. The second was his hobby, the engrossing pleasure of his life, his relaxation from toil; never did he feel so happy or important as in the belfry, with his brother ringers, ready to commence a triple bob-major, the honest execution of which he looked upon as a sort of moral duty, a thing too serious to be trifled with.

Simon was not learned, unless in bells. He could tell to an ounce the weight of the great Ivan at Moscow; had a profound veneration for the far-famed Tom of Lincoln; and kept a regular register of the achievements of the celebrated St. Peter's Mancroft Ringers, Norwich, and indeed throughout the kingdom.

For years it had been his intention to make a pilgrimage to the famous capital of the East Angles to hear them, but, somehow or other, something always occurred to prevent his carrying it into execution. Formerly it was want of money, now it was want of time, to say nothing of the remonstrances of his wife, an industrious, active little woman, whom, on the death of his father, he had married; perhaps it would have been more correct to say, who had married him.

Simon Gee entertained a kind of hereditary respect for his better half. She was the daughter of the tenor bell—the man to whose rope he had succeeded—and they lived very happily together; in fact, he had never known but one great sorrow, occasioned by the wild conduct of a younger brother, whom he had reared. Barney Gee detested bell-ringing and weaving; but, to make amends, had a decided taste for poaching, a weakness which had frequently brought him in contact not only with the keepers of Sir Norman Boothroyd, but with the judicial bench. Many a fine had Simon paid for him out of his hard earnings, and, in all probability, would have continued to pay, for he loved the scapegrace dearly, had not a threat of prosecution from the baronet compelled the offender to compromise it by consenting to enlist in one of the Company's regiments.

It was years since he had been heard of.

In person Simon was exceedingly thin, and under the average height; his countenance open, fresh-coloured, and honest; his mind a singular mixture of shrewdness and simplicity. Even the rector liked him, for he was a regular attendant at church; in fact, he would have been a positive favourite but for his passionate love of bell-ringing.

Although his wife previous to their marriage had invariably called her husband Old Simon, she now frequently wondered why people should so obstinately persist in applying that epithet to him; he was but little over fifty, as hale and hearty a man as any in the parish. At first she tried to break them of the habit by telling them his real age. It was all of no use; custom was too strong even for a woman's perseverance to shake.

On the eve of all the great festivals of the year, Simon was the first to repair to the belfry and see that everything was in readiness for his brother ringers; it was a labour of love to him, and his peculiarity in this respect so well known, that it explains William Thornton's exclamation, when he recognised him, of, "There goes Old Simon. It must be nearly twelve o'clock."

CHAPTER IV.

My boyish days are nearly gone,
My heart is not unsullied now,
And worldly cares and woes will soon
Cut their deep furrows on my brow.
And life will take a darker hue
From ills my brother never knew;
And I have made me bosom friends,
And bound and linked my heart with others:
But who with mine his spirit blends
As mine was blended with my brother's?

MOUTRIE.

HAVING lit the candles in the iron sconces fixed in the walls of the belfry, and seen the ropes all in order, Simon descended from the tower of the church—a building in the early Tudor style, erected before the excess of ornamentation had disfigured the chaste severity of its proportions. The old man—we are falling into the error so general amongst those who knew him of calling him old—seated himself upon a stone near the entrance of the edifice to await the arrival of his companions. Once or twice he regarded his watch and cast anxious looks towards the village; it was nearly time they made their appearance. Evidently he felt uneasy. Carter, the great bell, had a decided weakness for ale—this gave him serious misgivings; the others he knew he might rely upon.

"His hand will be unsteady," he thought, "even if he comes in time." That any one could think of ale with such a serious duty as the one before them to perform, was more than he could comprehend.

"Here comes the first one," he exclaimed, joyously, as he descried the tall figure of a man walking rapidly up the path leading to the churchyard. "No," he added, after a pause, "he wears a cloak, and no one but the rector or Sir Norman has such a thing in St. Faith's."

Presently the stranger shouted out his name.

"Who can it be?" muttered Simon.

The cry was repeated.

"Here!" answered the bell-ringer.

The person who had called to him marched with a military step through the churchyard, his figure so completely enveloped in the cloak that it was impossible to recognise him by that. He wore heavy musaches and beard; the rest of his features were partially hid by a foraging cap.

For several moments these two persons, so widely different in appearance, regarded each other in silence. The bell-ringer was the first to speak.

"Were you seeking me?" he demanded, with surprise.

"Whom else should I seek?" replied the stranger, joyously.

The sound of his voice caused Simon to tremble, as if it had awakened some long silent echo in his heart; he peered at him earnestly from under the peak of his cap; but the features seemed totally unknown to him.

"What a fool I am," he muttered; "always fancying strange things."

"Is there anything strange," said the man in the cloak, "that the absent should return?"

"It can't be," exclaimed the old man, in the tone of one who felt bewildered between the conflicting evidence of his eyes and ears, "and yet I can almost swear to the voice."

"And whose voice do you take it for?"

"My brother's."

"Right!"

"Barney!" almost shrieked the weaver, at the same time opening his arms and tottering, rather than walking towards him.

The soldier pronounced the name of Simon, and the long separated brothers folded each other in a cordial embrace.

"It's New Year's eve," added the wanderer, "and I knew that I should find you here."

"Yes, yes," murmured Simon, "sure to be here; but bless me, how you are altered; why you have quite a beard!"

"I have been ten years in India," observed Barney, laughingly.

"India! have you been in India!" exclaimed the weaver, still more and more astonished; "what kind of bells have they there?"

"Curious looking things, enough," replied the returned soldier, "carved all over with images."

"And the ringers?"

"They have no ringers there; the bells are struck with hammers, or gingle on the ankle of the Nautch girls."

"No ringers!" repeated the old man. "Well! well!"

He asked no more questions on the subject of India; his curiosity was satisfied. Apparently he had no desire to hear more of a land in which his favourite art was unknown.

"Bless me," he continued, startled by a plaintive cry, which came from beneath the large military cloak worn by his brother; "what have you got there?"

Barney Gee threw back the folds of his garment, and discovered a child, between seven and eight years old, whom he had held, all the while their conversation lasted, closely covered up and guarded from the night air. It was a girl.

He said something to it in Hindostani, and the helpless little creature looked up in his face and smiled.

"Why, I declare it is a child!" exclaimed Simon. "You didn't suppose it was a tiger, did you?" demanded his brother.

"Pretty creature! pretty creature!" continued the bell-ringer, without heeding the question; "but what are you going to do with it?"

"What do you mean by do with it?"

"Where did you get it? Find it?"

"Find it!" repeated Barney, with a hearty laugh at his brother's simplicity; "do you imagine that babies spring up like mushrooms after a night's rain? But you don't understand these things," he added; "how should you? an old bachelor."

"But I am not an old bachelor," interrupted Simon, with great dignity. "I have been married these six years."

His brother did not look over delighted at the intelligence: perhaps he had calculated on obtaining a home after all his wanderings in the snug cottage of the weaver, and doubted how far such an arrangement might be agreeable to his wife.

"And who in the name of goodness did you get to have you?"

"Hester," replied the old man, meekly, for the words "get to have you" had brought him back to the humble opinion he entertained of himself.

"Hester who?" demanded Barney, sharply.

"Crotchet! you recollect her father; you must recollect him,—the tenor bell when you were a boy; a good man, and a conscientious ringer; rather weak in a triple bob-major as he grew old."

"And what sort of wife does the tenor bell's daughter make you?"

"The best in the world; never was so happy in my life."

"Then heaven bless her!" exclaimed the soldier, "and you!" he added, stretching out his disengaged hand to him. "I thought of troubling you for a night's shelter, but will find one at—"

"Trouble, Barney!" interrupted his brother, deeply hurt. "Trouble! what have I done that you should talk to me in that way? isn't there your own room, and the bed you used to sleep in when a boy? with the strings of bird's eggs, the wasp's nest, and the old gun hanging at the head of it, just as you left them; not a thing has been disturbed, for Hester always said you would return some day."

"Did she?" said Barney, deeply moved.

"Of course she did," continued the bell-ringer, "and I prayed for it. The hearth will look so cheerful now; come along!"

"But the bells?"

"Ah!" said the ringer, with a sigh, "they must do without me to-night."

"Nothing of the kind," replied the former, who knew how painful the sacrifice would be to him. "I can find my way to the cottage alone."

"But Hester is out at a neighbour's, and, besides—"

Here the speaker stopped short.

It is hardly worth while to speculate on what might have followed. Perhaps he wished to prepare his wife for the reception of the wanderer, soften the surprise, tell her that he had brought a child with him, or—in fact, there are little conjugal mysteries in all families, over which it is always wisest to drop the veil.

"I have it," he resumed. "It still wants ten minutes to twelve. Give me the baby. I'll take it to Hester, and tell her you are coming. Wait here, and when the ringers arrive, say I shall be back directly."

"If that's all, I'll put the clock back," replied Barney.

"Well, if you think it would not be very wrong," observed his brother, doubtfully.

"It's only giving ten minutes more to the old year to draw its last breath; there can be no great harm in that."

"Not much," said Simon Gee, taking the child and the cloak in which it was wrapped carefully from his brother; "that will give me plenty of time."

With these words he quitted the spot, running rather than walking towards the village with his novel burden.

"There's the old tower, and yonder lies St. Faith's," exclaimed the wanderer, "the home of my infancy,—of as good a brother, of as honest, though simple a man, as ever broke the bread of life. I wonder what Sir Norman will say when he hears of my return? Pshaw! let him say what he likes. I have served my time, and received an honourable discharge from the service, and can defy him, great as he is—and rascal as he is," he added, slowly.

The speaker drew from a pocket contrived in the lining of his vest a small packet, which he contemplated with an air of satisfaction for several seconds, and was about to return it, when some idea suddenly struck him.

"It will be safer there," he muttered; "safer there."

With these enigmatical words, he entered the belfry, a place he was evidently well acquainted with, and put back the hands of the clock.

As he descended he heard the voices of the ringers calling for his brother; they had arrived during his absence, and were evidently much astonished at not finding him at his post.

"Simon will be back in an instant," he said.

Several of the men stared at him, wondering what a stranger had been doing in the tower, and still more at the non-appearance of the tenor bell, or "Old Punctuality" as they facetiously called him.

"Why it is just on the strike of twelve," observed one of the men.

"No, it wants nine minutes at least," replied the soldier, with difficulty repressing a laugh at the trick he had played them.

Watches were looked at and compared. The ringers could not make it out.

"Nine minutes!" repeated the base; "we might have stayed another pot."

"That you might, Peter," observed the stranger.

Astonished at hearing himself addressed by name, the man walked up to him and peered curiously into his face.

"It's Barney!" he exclaimed, with a joyous shout of recognition. "Barney Gee himself!"

"His own self," replied the long absent man.

There was a general shaking of hands; questions were asked and answers given, but in so hurried and confused a manner, that had not the speakers been well acquainted with the persons and habits of those they were speaking of, they must have been mutually unintelligible.

"And Stephen?" asked the soldier.

"Sir Norman drove him from this part of the country for poaching, Black Ben enlisted, Mary married her cousin, and Jack Squires took service with Lord Tramore."

"Willie of the Hutch?"

"I saw him just now," answered one of his informants, "with the rest of the boys, walking towards the common; they had their guns."

"And dogs," added a second.

The words guns and dogs seemed to excite some not unpleasant recollections in the mind of Barney Gee, for he declared his intention of joining them. At this moment his brother arrived, quite out of breath with the exertion he had made to be back in time.

"It's quite right," he said; "Hester will be so happy to see you. She has taken care of the child."

"Thank you, Simon," replied his brother, turning to walk towards the village.

"Won't you wait for me?"

"Not now."

"But—"

"Come, old fellow," interrupted the big bell, "it's you who are delaying us now."

"Yes! yes! I know," replied the bewildered man. "But where is Barney going to?"

At this moment the clock struck the first note of midnight.

Barney is quite old enough to take care of himself," shouted the ringers, pushing him towards the belfry; "not an instant to lose."

Simon suffered himself to be driven as it were into the tower. They were but just in time to save their reputation; but they did save it, for as the last stroke of the clock sounded the knell of the parting year, the bells of St. Faith's church struck up a merry peal to welcome the birth of the new one.

We can conceive no feeling more grateful to the heart than the meeting of long absent friends: the warm shaking of the hand, the renewal of old ties, the recital of old tales and recollections. Memory is a rich treasury, despite the funeral crape which dims the brightness of some of its most precious gems.

It is not to be supposed that when Barney Gee started from the belfry in search of his old companions, he had the slightest idea of joining in their dangerous sport. On the contrary, on setting out for his native place, he had fully made up his mind to abstain from all disputes with the lord of the manor for the future, and live quietly, that is to say, quietly for a bachelor, and let the rabbits live in peace. Vain resolve! inclinations are almost as difficult to control as destiny. We deem that we have suppressed them, when, in point of fact, they only slumber for want of opportunity, or are absorbed in the strong passions of the heart. We hug ourselves on our philosophy at the moment it is weakest.

The first greeting and recognition over, the conversation naturally turned upon the projected expedition to the common, and the lord of the manor.

"He is as tyrannical as ever," observed one.

"A purse proud fool," added a second.

"But he shan't deprive us of our rights!" exclaimed several. "We have an honest magistrate and a good man settled in the neighbourhood since you were here—Mr. Thornton: he never inflicts more than a few shillings by way of fine when we are caught. He says openly, that Sir Norman ought to prove his right."

"I wish he had been here when I was taken," observed the returned soldier; "it would have saved me many a day's march under a burning sun in India, many a heart-ache," he added, with a sigh, "when I thought of home and the friends I never expected to see again."

By this time they had reached the skirts of the common, and the good resolutions of the speaker began to waver. The conversation had excited him. More than one old companion offered him the loan of his gun; in short, he was but human, and found it impossible to resist the temptation cast suddenly in his way.

"Mind, only for the rabbits!" he said.

Of course, no one thought at that moment of venturing into the well-guarded park, and for some time the party kept to their resolution. Unfortunately a pheasant crossed the path of one of them, a shot was fired, and the bird fell.

This occurred close to a part of the estate called the Hutch, where the preserves were separated from the common only by a deep dry ditch, in which a posse of keepers were lying concealed, with Sir Norman Boothroyd at their head.

He sprang forward and called upon them to give up their guns.

"Come and take them," shouted several of the young men.

"Loose the dogs!" exclaimed the baronet.

Two noble bloodhounds were released by those who held them in leash. As they advanced with their deep, loud baying, the poachers fired a general volley. Considering the ferocity of their assailants it was a matter of self-preservation.

Unfortunately not only the dogs but one of the keepers fell.

Maddened by the sight of the dying animals and their wounded companion, conscious also that now they had the law upon their side, the keepers returned the fire, which added another victim to the list.

Barney Gee lay stretched upon the heath never to rise again; the rest of his party fled.

"The hounds are quite dead, I suppose," exclaimed Sir Norman, regarding the two dogs, whose loss seemed to affect him more than the blood which had been shed.

"Quite," answered Fletcher, the head warren, touching his hat.

"You had better look to Springthorp, then," said his master.

This was the name of the keeper who had been unintentionally hit by the discharge of the poachers in defending themselves against the bloodhounds. The man was desperately wounded. One charge had lodged in his chest; another shattered the right side of his face. He groaned deeply as his companions raised him in their arms, and fell back senseless.

"He is dying, Sir Norman," whispered the warren.

The owner of Meldown Park heard the intelligence without any great pain. Perhaps, if his feelings could have been really read, he was rather satisfied than not. He knew that the occurrence would greatly add to his unpopularity in the neighbourhood; and thought that the death of one of his keepers by the hand of a poacher might partially justify him in public opinion.

"We had better take him to the hall."

"To the hall!" repeated his master; "and have an inquest and all kinds of annoyances there! Nothing of the kind; take him to the lodge, it's not much more than a mile further."

As a matter of course his orders were obeyed, and he remained with only two of his attendants on the field of his exploits; the rest were carrying off their wounded and dying companion.

"Well, Parker," he said, after a pause, "we have peppered one of the rascals."

"Yes, Sir Norman," answered the man, in a tone which indicated he did not share in the satisfaction of the speaker.

"You saw him shoot the pheasant?"

"I saw the pheasant shot, but I could not swear by whom the shot was fired."

The baronet bit his lips, and secretly cursed him for an over precise fellow.

"I wonder who it is?" added the speaker, advancing towards Barney, from whose side the life-stream was ebbing fast; "don't know the face; and yet I think I must have seen it before."

"You have indeed, both of you," observed a voice near them.

Sir Norman started, and half-raised his gun.

"Be under no alarm; you know me too well to suppose me capable either of violence or of poaching."

"Ah, Minter, is it you?" answered the lord of the manor. "Sad affair! But you see what the obstinate conduct of my misguided tenantry has ended in. One of my keepers, Springthorp, murdered, and this fellow shot!"

"I should rather say they were both murdered," replied the farmer.

"But you hinted that I knew the poaching rascal," added the baronet.

"As well as I do."

"And his name?"

"In an instant, Sir Norman; in an instant. He was a happy, light-hearted boy, when you first came to settle amongst us, with your new-fangled notions about your rights on the common. You took a particular dislike to him; hunted him up for every offence; and, to rid yourself of him, got up a case— which he could not meet, or you prove—of poaching against him. So he enlisted, and went abroad, to avoid all further persecution, and only returned to St. Faith's this very night."

"Barney Gee!" ejaculated the keeper and his master.

"I told you that you both knew him," added the speaker, in a tone of indignation. "But you have finished your task. It's all over with him, poor fellow! And New Year's eve, too! It will be long remembered."

"The fellow was a poacher," remarked his landlord, determined to keep up a show of confidence, although he began to fear the affair looked worse than he expected; "he shot one of my pheasants. My keeper can prove it."

"No, I can't," said the man, struck with deep remorse for the part he had formerly acted against the victim. "I must speak the truth, if I lose my place for it. The bird was shot; but we were all crouching in the dry ditch, and not one of us could tell who fired."

"Pheasant! Talk of the blood of a pheasant," exclaimed Minter, "with that of a fellow-creature on your hands! Poor Barney!"

This was the second or third time the name of the dying man had been pronounced. Although bleeding fast to death, he was perfectly sensible, and heard everything that passed. With a supreme effort, he raised his head from the heath, and moved his hands. On witnessing the action, all the speakers drew closer to him.

The farmer knelt down, and supported him on his knee.

"Simon! Simon!" he murmured, faintly.

"He is thinking of his brother," observed Minter.

"The owl's nest!" he added, and fell back.

"What does he say?" demanded the baronet.

The keeper offered his hand to Barney, who had just sufficient strength to touch it, to show that he bore him no ill feeling.

"Thank heaven," said the man. "I wouldn't like a dog to die at enmity with me, if I thought I had given it reason."

"You grow quite sentimental," observed Sir Norman Boothroyd, with a sneer. "I dare say the fellow is a deserter. The shot has only spared him the lash."

On hearing this brutal supposition, pride gave the insulted soldier strength; he started to his feet, and, drawing from his bosom his discharge, which was deeply stained with blood, shook it in the face of the speaker, then fell back with a groan, and expired.

Cries were now heard, and a crowd seen approaching the spot from the other side of the common. The baronet, whose principal virtue most certainly was not courage, seeing that he had no longer his band of keepers to protect him, gradually beat a retreat; and it was well perhaps that he did so, or in the heat of passion and contempt for his heartless conduct, another ill deed might have been committed.

The first of the crowd to approach the spot was the bell-ringer. He had heard of the fatal affray just as he was leaving the church. The old man knelt down, and kissed the corpse as tenderly as if it had been a sleeping infant.

"It is a hard blow," he murmured; "but His will be done! Poor brother! To live only to see his native village; and then to—to—rest for ever in the churchyard!"

Tears choked his utterance. He could add no more.

"What will become of Barney's child?" observed one of the ringers, whom Simon had informed of the fact of his bringing one all the way from India with him.

"We will all help it!" exclaimed a dozen voices.

"Thank you!" faltered the bereaved brother, rising from his knees; "but that is my duty. It shall drink of my cup and eat of my bread. The means, it is true, are scanty," he added; "but heaven will bless them."

A deep "Amen!" broke from the lips of those who heard him.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

DESIRABLE and proper as it is to excite the ambition of the young by pointing out to them the responsibilities which rest upon them, it is equally desirable to render them that practical help without which the brightest hope must end in disappointment.

And in helping the young, a writer should not content himself with generalising on great questions. They want practical help. It is worse than useless to exhort them to do this or do that, without telling them how these things are to be done. I propose, therefore, to furnish my youthful readers with some instructions on common things capable of immediate application.

There is not any subject on which the editor of this journal—so I am given to understand—is more frequently consulted than that of the handwriting. All the letters in the alphabet—all the deities of the heathen mythology—all the characters in Mr. Smith's novels—all the leading celebrities of all time, are requesting to know in the next number what the editor thinks of their handwriting, and whether their epistles are well or ill expressed.

Now, I do not want, on any account, to take the editor's work out of his hands. I leave him in his seat of honour and onerous responsibility, the editorial chair, to thunder forth his opinions to his correspondents; still, judging from the number who write on this one topic, I think I may be rendering some service, both to him and to them, in furnishing some hints respecting handwriting and correspondence.

HANDWRITING.

Lord Chesterfield says that every man who has the use of his eyes and his right hand, can write whatever hand he pleases. This is hardly true. Handwriting indicates character, and corresponds with it; and however great our powers of imitation, we must always possess more or less strongly marked individual traits. It is no more to be expected or desired that we all shall write alike, than that we all shall look alike or act alike. But it is true that every one, with the use of eyes and hand, may write well—write a free, regular, and graceful hand—write legibly, at all events.

If you write a cramped, irregular, and illegible hand, the sooner you set about reforming it the better. Go to some good teacher of penmanship, if one can be found in your neighbourhood, and take a few lessons, with the strong resolution to improve; but if no teacher is at hand, never mind, set about the task without one. All difficulties will vanish before resolute effort. Try it and see. Form your letters clearly, distinctly, symmetrically, and with a uniform slope or angle, and make your lines straight and even, and your manuscript will look well and be easily read. The more graceful the curves, and the smoother the lines, the better; but these last qualities are not essential.

POSITION.

A bad position in writing is as destructive to beauty of form, as it is to health. Persons who write much in the crooked and ungraceful position so common among the "slaves of the desk," become permanently bent and round-shouldered, and are particularly liable to diseases of the lungs. Bad habits are easily acquired, so are good habits. If you do not acquire the latter, you will the former. Which will you choose?

Sit erect, rest both arms equally on the desk or table, lay your paper on your open portfolio, or on the table, slightly to the right, and at right angles with the side at which you sit. Dip your pen carefully, so as to make no slovenly blots; carry your hand steadily and firmly, but as lightly as may be, and you will give clear, beautiful, happy thoughts, if you have them, a fitting chirographic expression.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Now, with respect to correspondence. The first grand point in writing is, to have something to say; and the second is, to know how to say it; and the third is, when you have said it to stop.

SPELLING.

To begin with spelling. Everybody who aspires to write, should know how to spell. The best handwriting is often disfigured by misspelt words. Spelling is word making. Perhaps you are a good speller; if so, be thankful. But there are more than a hundred thousand words in the English language, and there are few young people—or old people either—who know the orthography of them all. Various rules have been recommended for the acquisition of good spelling. The best is to study the dictionary. We sometimes hear the vulgar expression, that a man or woman has "swallowed" a dictionary. Mentally and figuratively, this may be true, and yet the individual in question receives no benefit. We must digest the dictionary before we are really benefited by its intellectual pabulum.

CAPITAL LETTERS

The misuse of capital letters is almost as great a blemish in written words as bad spelling. Fortunately, the rules for their proper use are few and plain, and may easily be remembered. To leave my readers no excuse on this point, I insert them here.

The first word of every distinct sentence must begin with a capital letter.

All proper names, and titles of office or honour, and all appellations of the deity, must begin with capital letters.

Adjectives derived from proper names, must begin with capital letters.

The names of the month and of the days of the week, must begin with capital letters.

The principal words in the titles of books, magazines, and newspapers, must begin with capital letters.

The first word of an example, a direct quotation, or a direct speech, must begin with capital letters. The name of an object permitting and conveying a specially individual idea, should begin with a capital letter.

Every line in poetry must begin with a capital letter.

The words I and O must always be capital letters. Other words of particular importance, and such as denote the principal subject of discourse, may begin with capital letters.

CHOICE OF WORDS.

Use simple, familiar Anglo-Saxon words, in preference to those of Latin and French origin. The latter may seem finer and more high-sounding, but the former are stronger and more expressive, and you will be able to set forth more clearly in them what you have to say. If your thought is a great one, simple words will well befit it; and if it is trifling or commonplace, your grand phrases will only make it seem ridiculous. Father, mother, brother, sister, home, happiness, heaven; sun, moon, stars, light, heat; to sit, to stand, to go, to run, to stagger, are Anglo-Saxon words, as are most of those used to express habitual actions, and designate persons and objects familiar and dear to us. We may say in Latin-English, "Felicity attends virtue," but "Well-being arises from well-doing"—Saxon-English—is a far better wording of the same idea. The French and Latin elements of our language, of course, have their place and use, and cannot be left out; but the Anglo-Saxon should furnish the staple of our common writing and talk. Avoid equivocal and ambiguous words, technical terms, unless absolutely necessary, and, above all, low expressions, or vulgarisms. A man is known almost as well by the words he uses, as by the company he keeps. Choose both from among the best.

SENTENCES.

Words, rightly arranged, form phrases, clauses, and sentences, and become the vehicle of thought. It is important to know how to arrange them rightly. Sentence-making is taught in works on grammar, rhetoric, and composition. I recommend to those who have time for study, Professor Fowler's book on the English Language in its Elements and Forms. Its price places it within the reach of all, and its contents can be easily mastered.

CLEARNESS.

The first requisite of a good sentence is clearness. Aim, then, first of all, to put your words together so that they may truly represent your idea, and nothing more. Make yourself understood, if you do nothing else; and let there be no vagueness about your statements. Every sentence should not only convey a meaning, but a distinct and definite meaning. You may fail in this point, either through a bad choice of words, or a wrong arrangement of them. Be careful, then, to select words which, used in their proper sense, will express exactly the idea you intend; and not use the same word in different senses in the same connection.

STRENGTH.

Next in importance to clearness is strength. It is not enough that we are understood. We wish to make an impression, to influence, to move the reader. So we must make our sentences not only clear, but strong.

To make a strong wagon, the wheelwright takes hard, tough-fibred timber, and puts it together with firm, well-fitting mortise and tenon. In a like manner, strong sentences are made of strong words, strongly put together. We have said something of strong words in speaking of the Anglo-Saxon element of our language. A strong construction implies such an arrangement of words as will exhibit the sense to the best advantage. To be strong, a sentence must be clear, compact, and symmetrical. Unpractised writers fall into a variety of errors, which tend to loosen the force of their composition. The following rules, judiciously applied, will enable you to avoid most of them.

RULES OF CONSTRUCTION.

Place the principal words in your sentence where they will make the most striking impression. Never allow a weaker assertion or argument to follow a stronger one. Avoid the separation of the preposition from the noun which it governs.

Avoid concluding your sentence with an adverb, preposition, or other insignificant word. Strike out all words which add nothing to the sense. The last rule is by no means the least in importance. The young writer's sentences, like young trees, generally admit of a good deal of pruning. Words abstractedly are no ornament of style. If they convey no decisive meaning, they are mere excrescences and incumbrances, and should be unsparingly cut off, in revising, wherever they have unfortunately been permitted to attach themselves.

UNITY.

A sentence, though, like the human body, composed of parts having distinct functions in the general economy, should, like the latter, make upon the mind the impressions of a single object.

Lack of unity arises oftener than otherwise from crowding together in a sentence ideas so slightly connected, that they admit of being divided into two or more sentences. Shun this fault, even at the risk of making too many short sentences. Use as few parenthetical expressions as possible.

HARMONY.

Sense should never be sacrificed to sound; yet harmony is by no means an unimportant quality in literary composition. To promote it, avoid harsh-sounding words and discordant combinations; blend as little as possible long and short syllables; and pay particular attention to the closing cadence. Whatever is easy to the organ of speech is pleasing to the ear.

PARAGRAPHS.

One or more sentences form a paragraph. Paragraphs are not mere arbitrary divisions of a sentence, as some seem to suppose, but, like sentences, mark natural pauses or breaks in the discourse. Still it is not easy to lay down rules for their formation. Some writers make fewer and larger ones than others. It is safer, as a general rule, to make them short.

I shall take occasion to return to this subject. It is exceedingly important. All that is required is a little method—and method overcomes all difficulties.

THE TWO HOMES;

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADOW.

A MORE striking contrast could scarcely exist than between the homes of William and Henry Camden. United by the tie of brotherhood, and in many respects of similar dispositions and feelings, both blessed with worldly prosperity, with affectionate wives and dutiful children, one could scarcely account for the difference which we have mentioned; for, from like causes, we generally expect like results.

But the more observing of those around them, particularly the old inhabitants, who remembered the brothers when they were lads, knew that there was one point of character in which they were very dissimilar, and this they maintained gave a colouring to every event of their lives. William was a bright, cheerful temperament, always disposed to make the best of everything, and never discouraged, even when fortune seemed to frown; while Henry, on the contrary, seemed constantly anticipating evil, and embittered his days of prosperity by looking forward to some possible evil shrouded in futurity.

They used to be called Sunshine and Shadow; and that the name applied to each had certainly been happily chosen, was acknowledged every day by all who visited at the house of the brothers William and Henry Camden.

With these few words by way of explanation, we will at once introduce our readers into the homes of the two brothers. And first, let us take a peep into the pleasant little room where Mrs. William Camden was at that very time awaiting her husband's return. He was somewhat later than usual, and the little ones around her were clamorous for dear father, and indignant that Alice, the nursery maid, should have made her appearance with the usual summons to bed.

"What, go to bed without kissing father! No, indeed. Kind mamma would let them sit up a little longer, would she not?" and one coaxing little cherub climbed upon her knee and enforced the request with a kiss; while another hung round her, and looked pleadingly in her face.

"A few minutes longer, Alice," was the reply. "Mr. Camden will soon be here, I think; and if not, darlings, mamma will kiss you twice, and tell you a pretty story to comfort you."

The little group were gay and glad again; and ere many minutes had elapsed a joyful shout from those stationed at the window told that the husband and father was in sight. In a few moments he was among them, enjoying and returning their caresses, and in no way disturbed by the clamour of their happy little voices; while the mother stood by gazing with delight upon the innocent happiness of her loved ones.

And soon all was hushed. The fond good-night had been said; each little head was upon its pillow, and the parents were left to the quiet enjoyment of the evening meal.

Ever alive to the slightest variation in her husband's feelings, Mrs. Camden had perceived a cloud upon his brow, even while he sported joyfully with his children. But with a woman's tact, she took no notice of it, but cheered him with pleasing anecdotes on the passing events of the day—evidences of the improvement of the elder children, and funny little sayings and doings of the younger ones—trifling details, but amusing and interesting to the father's heart.

But when, after the evening meal, the sleeping children had been visited, and the parents were seated once more by their fireside, the wife affectionately inquired the reason of the cloud that still hung on her husband's brow, Mr. Camden replied at once, with perfect frankness—

"Our business affairs look rather dark at present, dear Ellen; but I trust the cloud will soon pass away. We have, however, good reason to fear a heavy loss, owing to the failure of a house with which our firm is connected. It will put us to much present inconvenience, and some retrenchment will be necessary in all our expenses; but I think all will ultimately go well again."

"I have no doubt of it," was the cheerful though sympathising reply; "and there are many ways in which we can live economically, if it should be desirable, for a time. A little more exertion on my part would enable us to dispense with at least one servant; our proposed summer excursion can be given up; it is always expensive, and not necessary, for we have an abundance of fresh country air in our own pleasant home. Indeed, I have no doubt that we can retrench in a hundred ways, without the least inconvenience."

"If all women were like you, my sweet wife," replied the husband, affectionately, "we poor men should not so often be driven to distraction by trouble in our business affairs. A cheerful home is the greatest blessing a man can possess. Poor Henry has returned to his family this evening, completely bowed down with fear of approaching calamity. He can see no bright side to the affair. He is confident that ruin is inevitable. My most powerful arguments failed to convince him that a heavy loss, occasioning temporary inconvenience, is all we have to apprehend. His tender-hearted wife will sympathise with him most truly, but no cheering word will escape her lips; she, too, will take the same gloomy view of affairs. The poor children will go to rest with sad hearts to-night."

Mrs. Camden sighed as she replied—
"I will step over and see Clara in the morning, and endeavour to make her look at things in a more cheerful light."

"That will pass even your power, I fear; but come, Ellen, let us resume the book which we commenced last evening. My mind is wearied by close attention to business through the day; and it will be a relief to read a few pages from our favourite author."

An hour or two passed pleasantly away; and then, comforted and calmed, the husband and wife sought repose. They could, indeed, realise the cloud which, for a time, might obscure their sky. But in their evening devotions, they thought of the many blessings which surrounded them, and prayed for willing hearts to impart those blessings to those who were suffering and needy. Trouble passed slightly over them; for within their own hearts they carried what the poet appropriately calls the stoutest of all armour. The keenest and surest weapon is a bold and cheerful spirit.

Leaving the sunny abode, we must beg the reader to return with us to the twilight hour, and accompany Henry Camden to his home. Here, too, the little ones were impatiently awaiting their father's return.

"Something must have happened to father," remarked Mary, the eldest of the children, with a wise shake of the head.

The child but echoed the anxious expression of the mother's countenance, as she gazed uneasily from the window.

"He never stays so late," she murmured. "There must have been some accident on their return from the city," and visions of fractured skulls and broken bones passed rapidly before her.

The children appealed to her for leave to remain up beyond their usual hour; but they were unheeded. Her whole soul was absorbed in the thought of approaching misfortune.

Judging from the appearance of her mistress, that the little ones would be better off out of the way, the nursemaid endeavoured to enforce her demands, when fortunately the father entered.

The children sprang to his arms. He stooped to embrace them, saying, sadly—

"Good night, my darlings; go with Betty. Father cannot talk with you to-night."

They obeyed quietly, but an expression of sorrow was visible in their innocent faces.

"Poor father is ill," whispered the youngest darling, as she pressed her lips to his cheek. "Lizzy will take care of him to-morrow."

The mother scarcely waited until the door was closed ere she approached her husband, and with a tender pressure of the hand, exclaimed—

"I felt sure that something had befallen us, dear Henry; but I feared a personal accident to yourself. Tell me at once what is the matter."

"Our business affairs are in a most critical and alarming condition, Clara. I fear that utter ruin is impending."

Tears fell fast from Mrs. Camden's eyes.

"It will be hard to bear poverty," she murmured. "I do not think of myself, dear Henry, but I grieve for you, my poor husband, who have toiled for years to place us in possession of comforts, of which we must now be deprived:—and our children, how sadly they will feel the change!"

"It is indeed hard," exclaimed the husband, as he hurriedly paced the apartment; "but there is no remedy, and we must endeavour to submit. William wanted to persuade me that the case is not so desperate as I imagine; but it is useless to deceive myself with hopes which can never be realised. Better to look our troubles full in the face at once."

"Far better," rejoined his wife. "William always talks to us about looking on the bright side; but for my part I think it better to be prepared for the worst."

They seated themselves at the table; but the husband partook of the food which was placed before him without relish, and Clara felt a choking sensation in her throat which prevented her from swallowing one mouthful.

The evening passed in mournful silence; and at an early hour, with sad hearts, they sought repose.

Morning found the brothers again at their post—the one invigorated and strengthened for whatever might befall; the other depressed, harassed, and anxious.

Next morning, after despatching her rosy children to school as usual, cheerful little Ellen set out on her visit of condolence to her sister-in-law.

A short and pleasant walk brought her to the house of Henry Camden.

Four sweet children were playing in the yard, and they joyfully flew to welcome "Aunt Ellen."

"How comes it that you are not at school, dear Mary?" she asked, as she affectionately returned their greeting.

A shade passed over the child's countenance as she replied—

"Mother did not get us ready as usual. I asked her once if it was not school time, but she said that it made little difference now, for we should not be able to go to school long. Something is the matter with poor mother. She has cried all the morning, and father was very sad, too. I am glad you have come, Aunt Ellen."

"This is worse than I anticipated," thought Mrs. Camden. "I fear Clara has some affliction of which I am ignorant;" and with ready sympathy she entered at once.

"Mrs. Camden is in her own room, ma'am," said the servant. "I presume you can see her, although she desired me to tell any one who called that she was not well, and did not feel able to see company."

"I will go up to her room," was the reply; and the gentle tap at the door was answered by a request to walk in.

"Good morning, Clara. I am grieved to hear that you are not well this morning," was the salutation of the visitor, to which greeting a pressure of the hand and a shower of tears were the only response. "You alarm me, Clara. Has anything occurred of which I am uninformed? Your husband, is he well?"

"Alas, my poor husband! It is for him that I grieve most deeply," sobbed Clara. "Surely, Ellen, William has told you of our mutual misfortunes?"

"He has told me that there is danger of a heavy loss in their business, which will, for a while, embarrass them, and render economy on our part necessary; but I do assure you, my dear sister, there is no cause for this extreme anxiety and alarm. If your husband is desponding, there is more need that you should be calm and cheerful."

"Surely I should sympathise with his griefs," was the almost indignant reply. "Would you have me smile when Henry is sad? My heart must be cold indeed."

"Yes—but if we would give consolation, we must endeavour to keep our own minds in a quiet, cheerful state; and, if possible, present a brighter side of the picture to him whom we are endeavouring to console."

"But there can be no brighter side, Ellen. The prospect is, that we are penniless."

"O no, no, Clara! not so bad as that; but even if we were, we should be thankful that our husbands are still comparatively young men, with good health and undiminished energies; and we have talents and accomplishments which might add materially to our diminished incomes. So cheer up, my dear sister, and above all, remember that our afflictions, as well as our blessings, are from a Father's hand, and are designed for the same great end. The loss of worldly riches cannot dim our hopes of eternal happiness; and while these hopes remain, is not the future bright before us?"

The better feelings and deeper principles of Clara responded to this appeal, and for a time she made some effort to rise above the grief which she had allowed to overwhelm her.

With her husband's return, however, the dark shadow returned also. There was no vigorous effort to raise him from the slough of despond into which he had fallen. A slight attempt at a smiling welcome was instantly checked by the despairing expression of his countenance.

A week passed before matters were decided; and then Henry Camden was forced to acknowledge the superiority of his brother's judgment. There was indeed a heavy loss, and some retrenchment was necessary;—but they were still in possession of every comfort.

This removal of their worst fears did not, however, in Henry Camden's family, produce the relief which might have been expected. Every economical arrangement was viewed as a calamity, and trifling acts of self-denial, which, to the more cheerful Ellen, seemed scarcely worth noticing, were to Clara subjects of mournful regret and constant annoyance.

Three years had passed, the cloud which had obscured their worldly prospects had disappeared, and the brothers were more prosperous than ever.

It was the birthday of the eldest daughter of William Camden, a lovely girl of twelve years, and a happy party were assembled to celebrate the joyful day.

"Is it not delightful to look at the children?" said the fond mother, as, wearied with her exertions for the entertainment of her young guests, she seated herself by the side of her sister-in-law, who had been invited to accompany her own little ones on the occasion. "There is so much innocence in their joy, that it seems to bring us nearer to our heavenly home when we join them in their sports. I know no better cure for the heart-ache than to mingle with a group of merry children."

"But do not fears for the future ever disturb your mind while contemplating their joy?" asked Mrs. Henry Camden, as she stooped to kiss one of the joyful little ones who, at that moment, ran up to them for a caress.

"True," was the reply; "but who would instil a dread of the future in their young hearts? Confiding in the love of their heavenly Father, we would teach them to receive, day by day, their daily bread, rejoicing in the sunshine, and regarding the storms with humble gratitude as messengers of their Father's love, purifying their souls from earthly dross. Surely we may rejoice with them, my dear sister, unchecked by the fear of evils shrouded in futurity."

Their conversation was interrupted by the approach of little Ellen Camden, Clara's youngest daughter, a lovely child of four years, leading her little cousin, a bright, manly little fellow, nearly a year younger.

"Look, mamma," exclaimed Ellen, "cousin Henry and I have come to sit by you and aunt Ellen. We are tired now, and want to rest, and I have some nice sugar-plums in my pocket, and Henry shall have half."

They seated themselves at their mothers' feet, and laughed and chatted with innocent glee, as they divided the sweetmeats, and watched the sports of the elder children.

The two mothers bent over them with delight; but even then, a half-defined fear checked Clara's joy, and she whispered to her sister—

"There is one grief that we have never yet known, dear Ellen. Could we bear a separation from these precious ones?"

"Should our Father call them to himself, we will endeavour cheerfully to yield him his own," she replied; but a tear glistened in her eye as she pressed her boy to her heart, and bestowed an almost equally affectionate embrace upon the little Ellen.

One short week had elapsed since the birthday party, and the voice of mourning was heard in the home of Henry Camden. The loved one, the pet and darling of the whole house, sweet little Ellen, lay upon the bed of death.

Every means had been tried to abate the raging fever which scorched her life-blood, but it was in vain; no mortal power could save her. In her delirium, she called wildly upon her parents for comfort and aid, but alas! they responded not to the appeal.

Overwhelmed with anguish, even their bodily pains seemed almost paralysed with grief, and they appeared incapable of thought or action.

It was then that the more exalted faith and submission of the scarcely less afflicted aunt shone brightly in the chamber of death. It was her kind voice which soothed the little sufferer, her hand which quieted the restlessness of delirium, upon her bosom the last sigh was breathed. The little one had gone home.

Gladly would Ellen have spoken words of consolation to the bereaved parents. Gladly would she have led them to turn from the mournful contemplation of their own loss, and think of that joyous little spirit freed from the fetters of earth, and now to be admitted to the heavenly mansion of light and love.

But she felt that it would be vain. Clara could but shake her head, and reply in a voice broken by sobs—

"You know not the feelings of a mother's heart when the cherished one is taken from her. May God spare you the affliction!"

Alas! even while she spoke, the trial came. A hasty summons from the home of William Camden called the mother to the side of her little Henry, who was violently attacked with symptoms of the same disorder which had ended the life of his cousin.

A fear of this had crossed Ellen's mind; for she well remembered how lovingly the two darlings had sat together at their feet, and even then the fearful disease must have filled the veins of the little girl.

With a sad heart she took the sweet boy in her arms, and gazed upon his altered countenance; but an earnest prayer for strength was not unanswered. Even amid the dark clouds which now encompassed her, she could see light beyond, and her heart was filled with a heavenly peace which earthly afflictions could not take away.

The father also, although deeply tried, bowed his soul in submission to the will of his Creator; and while watching unweariedly by the side of his boy, suffered not himself to endeavour to draw him back to earth, while the angel band were quietly withdrawing him to heaven. All human means were tried, and when these failed, the cherished little spirit was yielded without a murmur.

Our simple sketch is ended. May the lesson which we have endeavoured to convey sink deeply into our hearts, and encourage us, amid the vicissitudes of life, to maintain a calm and cheerful spirit, never dwelling on the dark side which earth may sometimes present to our view, but looking up to the Source of constant and unfailing light. Then shall the sunshine of the soul illumine the external objects which surround us, and the dark shadows which too often obscure the happiness of our homes, will disappear like the mist of a summer's morning, giving place to peace, contentment, and joy.

H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE,
COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE BRITISH FORCES.

At a period when the military resources of Great Britain have been called into requisition, and the ranks of the army have to be supplied with so many recruits, the position of commander-in-chief becomes exceedingly responsible.

In the "piping times of peace," the public are not much interested in the affairs of the Horse Guards; but those affairs become most important under circumstances like the present. Our Indian dependencies have called for prompt and vigorous interference.

The native army, on whose loyalty and valour we placed so much reliance, has turned its strength against us, and has crumbled away before English pluck and energy. Our troops have been hastily collected from home and colonial service, and the plains of Hindostan have trembled beneath the triumphal march of our legions. In expending our force where it was most required, and in sending forth in so large a number our best troops, we have trusted, and not trusted in vain, to the chivalry of our people in supplying the deficiency which the embarkation of these troops occasioned. There has been a cry for more soldiers, and while newspaper writers have been calling on the country to enlist, to leave common occupations for the business of a soldier, men have come forward willingly, without any pressing at all, in such numbers per diem as are unprecedented in the annals of the British army.

The position of commander-in-chief of the army in so terrible a crisis, as we have remarked already, most responsible, and it is a matter of satisfaction to the nation at large, that this command is the hands of His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, on whose activity and discretion, energy and zeal, the utmost reliance may be confidently placed.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

The first requisite in the character of a prince is that he should have the national traits of his country in a most prominent degree. He should be the very type and model of the people. An English prince should not only be the grace of the court and the pride of the field, but should possess a solid understanding and an undaunted heart. England looks for high qualifications, and the popular prince must possess the characteristics of his age, its feelings, thoughts, and aspirations. The Duke of Cambridge is in this sense a popular man. He has full sympathy with the movements of the age; is alive to the responsibilities of his position; has himself seen active service; and is by his princely dignity so elevated above all family influence as to be beyond the suspicion of nepotism or the venal exercise of power.

In early life, George III. resolved to devote his sons to the service of their country, alternately intending them for the army and navy, so that England should possess royal defenders in the children of her sovereign, and that on her shores and on her waters her champions of blood-royal should be found. The Duke of York chose the army, the Duke of Clarence (William IV.) the navy, and the late Duke of Cambridge was trained to the military profession. He, in his turn, devoted his son, Prince George, to the army, who has inherited from his sire not only a love of arms, but that habit of ready obedience and prompt decision of mind which are essential to an efficient commander.

He was born at Hanover on the 26th of March, 1819, and is therefore in the very prime of life. He took the rank of colonel in 1837, that of major-general in 1845, succeeded his father July 8, 1850, and was appointed lieutenant-general in 1854. That was the year of the Crimean campaign; and the duke shared its dangers and disasters, and behaved right well throughout, winning the confidence of the men and the respect of the officers. He led a division of troops up the heights of Alma in the face of the Russian artillery, and saw the guns deserted and the enemy retreat. At Inkermann, he again took an active part, and had his horse killed under him. In consequence of ill health he was subsequently obliged to return to Pera, and after a short stay in Turkey was ordered home. Naturally enough, he was received with enthusiasm. He had seen real warfare; he had done good service, and was lionised accordingly. It was evident that the true metal was in him; he spoke out like a man and a soldier; and when our army stood in need of a commander-in-chief, the country pointed to him as its chosen servant, and with him at the Horse Guards were satisfied that the right man was in the right place.

The activity, and energy, and common sense of the Duke of Cambridge, during the disastrous mutiny in India, could not fail to call forth public approval. It was clear the duke was a working man, and that he felt the responsibility of his position. The City of London has recently presented to him a splendid sword, as a token of the esteem in which he is held, and of the high value placed upon his services. The freedom of the city was presented to the duke together with the sword, and to this circumstance Sir John Key alluded in the course of his address. England's types of patriotism are the soldier and the philanthropist—the defender of her liberties, the benefactor of her homes. The badge of citizenship and the emblem of war were accordingly presented together to a prince so popular in both capacities, accompanied by the earnest desire that however great might be his services in reforming the discipline of the army, they might be eclipsed by yet nobler services in the cause of charity and in promoting the arts of peace.

PRESERVATION OF LIFE FROM FIRE.

LAST week we drew the attention of our readers to a class of heroes little known—namely, fire-escape conductors. In returning to that subject we notice first of all the society by which they are employed.

The Royal Society for the Preservation of Life from Fire has been doing good service for more than fourteen years. It was first established in the year 1836, but did not carry out its operations till 1843. The necessity for such an institution is obvious now, but it was not clearly seen when the society first started. Houses took fire and the inmates were burned alive, and the public were satisfied to regard it as an unavoidable accident. But the formation of this society brought out the fact that such fatal accidents might be avoided if proper care were taken. It required an apparatus by which persons whose lives were endangered by fire should be able to escape. An ordinary ladder would not answer the purpose, but an apparatus was soon placed at the disposal of the society by the invention of the fire-escape. These are now so common (there are fifty-five in London) that their general appearance is no doubt familiar to the reader. Each of these fire-escape stations is established at an outlay of £70, and an annual cost of £80.

But something more was required beside an escape. This was a band of men well instructed in its use, and provided with all necessary implements. It was also necessary that these men should be in regular attendance at appointed stations, so that at any moment they might be able to render active assistance in cases of necessity. One man was intrusted with each fire-escape, properly instructed in the work to be done; and it was his duty to attend any fire in the neighbourhood, upon the first alarm being communicated.

The fire-escape stations are situated at a distance of about half a mile from each other, extending over all parts of London, and under the superintendence of district inspectors. Numerous as this may appear, it is not sufficient. A station should be established within a quarter of a mile of every residence, and there are some districts in London where even the half-mile arrangement has not been efficiently carried out. The committee of the society hope that they will soon be able to supply this deficiency, and the necessity for such operations must be evident to any one who cares at all to think about the matter. Within the course of the fourteen years during which the society has been in active operation 3,285 fires were attended by the escapes, and 402 human beings preserved from death.

The fire-escape employed by the society was originally invented by the late Mr. Abraham Wivell; but has been considerably improved since by the adoption of various suggestions offered by scientific men. It is adapted for every emergency, and can be used with very little preparatory arrangement.

The escape consists of a main ladder, about five-and-thirty feet in length—long enough to reach an ordinary second-floor window. It is applied by means of the carriage lever. A second folds over the first, and can readily be elevated by ropes attached to the lever-irons on either side of the main ladder, or, by the adoption of a very recent improvement, can be raised by pulleys in lieu of the lever-irons. Under the escape carriage a short ladder, for first-floors, is fitted in, and is often of the greatest service.

The unshipping of the ladders, which is effected by a very simple arrangement, is of considerable value, as it not unfrequently occurs that a fire takes place up a narrow court, and the fire-escape itself cannot be used. On such occasions the ladders are unshipped, and immediate assistance rendered.

A canvas bag, or trough of sail-cloth, protected by a copper wire net, extends the whole length of the main ladder. By this contrivance individuals can, with facility and safety, be lowered from upper windows, and thereby many lives have already been preserved. The addition of the copper is obviously a great improvement on the ordinary canvas bag; as, although not affording an entire protection against the liability of the sail-cloth taking fire, it prevents the possibility of any one falling through. The canvas is thoroughly soaked in alum and other solutions; but although this prevents any chance of its bursting into flame, it cannot preclude the risk of accident by charring.

The escape, with its double ladder, attains an elevation of more than fifty feet. Another ladder, six or seven feet high, can, on an emergency, be fitted to the upper ladder, so as to reach the garret windows of a house the height of sixty feet.

The weight of one of these improved fire-escapes is about 8½ cwt., and the cost of building £50.

The Balconian fire-escape—the joint production of several inventors—consists of sliding ladders, and is fitted with a large but light balcony, capable of holding four persons, and travelling on an iron tramway let into the ladder. The weight of this description of escape is 9½ cwt., and the cost of building £55. Its chief advantage when originally invented was the height at which it enabled assistance to be rendered—namely, fifty feet; but that, as we have shown, is now attainable by the improved escape commonly adopted by the society.

Plain and practical directions are issued for aiding persons to escape from a house on fire.

In the first place, they suggest to bystanders that on the discovery of a fire, instant notice should be given to the nearest fire-escape conductor, and that no time should be lost in ascertaining whether there is real danger. They have established the practice of giving rewards to those who furnish such intelligence to the conductors as leads to the saving of life.

Secondly, they suggest that persons qualified for the work (constables or others) should ascend to the roof through the neighbouring house. This is an excellent plan, as very efficient aid can thus easily be rendered to the inmates of the burning dwelling.

Thirdly, that when the fire occurs in a narrow street or court, assistance can be given most effectually from the windows of the opposite houses, particularly by means of a ladder placed across the street from window to window.

Fourthly, that when no other means present themselves, the bystanders be advised to collect ropes and ladders, bedding, &c., and that in case the inmates throw themselves from the windows, a blanket or carpet, stretched out by several persons, be held to receive them.

Fifthly, that jumping-sheets, as they are called, in use on such emergencies, be carried by the escape conductors, and be kept at all of the city and many of the surrounding police-stations.

Their suggestions to inmates of premises on fire are equally valuable. Nothing can be more important than for every inmate to be well acquainted with every means of escape which the house affords; nor that, in cases of fire, they should open neither windows nor doors more than necessary, and that in moving from one part of the premises to another, they should shut every door after them. In hundreds of cases, fires which might have been readily extinguished, are promoted by the consternation of the inmates, and their utter disregard of every proper precaution. Smoke naturally ascends; therefore, better progress can be made in case of fire on the hands and knees, than by maintaining an erect posture. A wet silk handkerchief, worsted stocking, or other woollen substance, excludes the smoke from the lungs, and allows of freer breathing. The roof or the street presents, of course, the readiest means of escape, but the fire may hold possession of the staircase, and prevent any descent from the upper storeys, or there may be no outlet on the roof. Under such circumstances, the persons in danger should immediately make their way to a front-room window, "taking care to close the door after them;" in such a position they stand the best chance of escape. They are "earnestly entreated not to precipitate themselves from the window, while there remains the least probability of assistance; and even in the last extremity, recourse may generally be had to joining sheets or blankets together, fastening one end round a bedpost or other furniture—this will enable one person to lower all the rest separately, and the last may let himself down with comparatively little risk."

The accompanying illustration represents one of the most intrepid exploits of Wood, the fire-escape conductor, whose portrait we gave last week. The circumstances of the case were as follows:—

About half-past one o'clock on the morning of the 29th of April, 1854, Wood—with his dog Bill—was on duty at the fire-escape station, when an alarm of fire was given, and Bill and his master were at once on the alert. A few moments sufficed to make all necessary preparations, and then away went the gigantic fire-escape to the scene of disaster. It was at a lodging-house, chiefly frequented by foreigners, who had put up for the night, in Colchester-street, Whitechapel; and so promptly was the escape brought, that not more than ten or twelve persons had assembled. The fire was raging at the back of the house, and dense clouds of smoke poured out of every window. The alarm was very great, for no less than sixty-one persons had slept in the house on the previous night, and nobody knew how many were still in it, or how great the loss of human life might be. The cry of "fire" was ringing through the neighbourhood, and accessories to the few stragglers who were first on the ground were rapidly forming a crowd. The fire had firm hold of the building, and an effort to rescue the inmates was made at once. Wood placed his ladder against one of the windows of the first floor, and immediately ascended. On entering by the window, he found the room filled with dense smoke, and that the flames had already seized on the door, and were fiercely burning their way in. The heat was excessive, and the obscurity so great, that at first he could see nothing but the red fire peering in through every chink in the door. His attention was attracted, however, by something resembling human forms, and he discovered five persons, insensible from the smoke and heat. The case was desperate. Here was he alone with five helpless people, the hissing, roaring fire seizing on the room, and, as none knew better than he, raging so fiercely that no human power could prevent its destruction. He had not time for reflection; prompt exertion, determined courage, were called for. He lifted the insensible woman, placed her on his shoulder, caught up a child, and, holding it by its night-clothes between his teeth, came again before the crowd, which was swelled in number, and safely made the perilous descent. There was a great shout raised as he reached the street in safety and committed his burden to other charge. With the rapidity of thought he again ascended. Three more persons were to be saved from that one room, and now the flames had conquered, and had seized on it, sweeping from the door by which they entered round to one of the windows, out of which they came with a roar of triumph, and made the upturned faces crimson with their light. As the flames poured out from one window, the fire-escape hero came from the other, bearing a child under each arm, and assisting the father also to escape. Another shout followed, another and another after that, and then the awful drama of a fire by night began. The whole building became one mass of flame; engines were dashing madly up, and sturdy men were working at the pumps, and watery cascades shot up into the pyramid of fire. Nothing more could be done for those inside. There were others there, but they must die. The fire held the mastery, and, subdued by the floods of water for a moment, leaped up with renewed life—a funeral pyre.

It is not necessary to describe that fire. Several lives were lost; but had it not been for the exertions and courage of this man, all within the house must have perished. To save five human lives is something to be proud of; to rescue, at the risk of one's own life, a whole family from destruction, is a higher and better kind of heroism than that which takes its stand on human life's destruction.

And this case of Samuel Wood is only one of many. He has saved seventy-two lives. Other conductors in the service of the society have also rendered most essential service in the various districts to which they belong. We can only allude to these cases, but it is not for the want of interest which attaches to others; it is not that Wood is the only man in the force whose services are worthy of record. We have selected him only as an instance of what has been accomplished by these brave fellows in their hardy and adventurous life.

One other instance may be given:—

Frederick Chapman, No. 3 in the society's service, has distinguished himself on several occasions by his vigilance and intrepidity. One December morning he was called to a fire in Drury-lane. When he arrived, the lower part of the house was enveloped in flames, and there appeared no possibility of using the escape: but there were persons on the third floor—persons whose lives it seemed must be sacrificed. Many a man would have given up the case as utterly hopeless; but so far from this, Chapman ran his escape right into the flames, dashed up the ladder—not to a first floor, but to a third—and succeeded in getting out two men and a woman—and himself—for his life seemed in as much peril as theirs, and he had to save himself by sliding down the guide-ropes.

Surely such brave fellows deserve well of their country. There are hundreds in London who owe their lives to the exertions of these men; and we all sleep the more securely by knowing that between fifty and sixty of them are keeping watch and ward over London, and are ready to render help at a moment's notice. They are a band of heroes who deserve to be better known and better rewarded; and the society in whose service they are employed is one which—for our own sakes, if for nothing else—deserves to be well supported.

In 306 cases silver medallions, testimonials, and money have been bestowed. These rewards are not confined to the officers of the society; they are given to any one who preserves the life of a human being from fire. Thus, a silver medallion was awarded two or three weeks ago to a sub-constable, who with great gallantry saved the life of a young lady from fire at Waterford.

CHAPTER V.

ETHEL.

COME back, good reader, a few steps in the order of time; and upwards a few grades in the ranks of this world's society.

It is the day after the "excitable person" has been sent to learn more self-control, and sent also to learn never again to presume upon recognition, if she meets him, of her child's father; and there, leaving half her prison allowances untouched, Cicely is bitterly rueing her momentary pride in giving back the portrait, and is wondering whether Dan will be in the house when she goes back—not knowing, as we know, that, fearing what she is hoping, Dan has "given notice," and is away on the tramp.

Seven miles from Latson Towers we will take up our standing, if you please, somewhere not out of hearing, while a conversation goes on between two ladies in a small room, quite as elegantly furnished, and quite as oblivious, in all respects, of gaol or of workhouse, as any apartment in the magistrate's abode.

Some historians would tell you of the soft ottomans, and the gilded tables or chairs, and the rich curtains of this little room. But you are here left to suppose what the private withdrawing-room of two young ladies of title in the present century would probably be; and if you recollect a few descriptions of such places, and take away from them some particulars which are absurd, and add a few particulars from your own memory of rich country seats, you will be ready to realise the scene of the following conversation.

"Begging everybody's pardon, Maude," said the Lady Ethel Blance to her sister, "mamma knows no more upon these questions than you do; or, rather, what she did know she has forgotten. How can a girl play the spy upon a poor fellow as you want me to do? And if she could, what would she gain by her information? Would it make her happier to be sure that her future husband was what you describe? Although, by the way, I have heard very good judges affirm that your sleek innocents never turn out much better in marriage than ordinary mortals,—and the young lady laughed herself at this point into a somewhat better humour.

Maude Blance had been taking it upon her to give her elder sister a little gossip touching a matter of peculiar interest at that time, and had fortified her own opinions by reporting the substance of her mother's remarks, the Countess Blance, a permanent invalid up stairs, who took no active interest in the affairs of the world in general, or her family in particular.

Having listened to Ethel's very fashionable doctrine (fashionable, unhappily, in other ranks than hers), the young moralist rejoined:—

"You've said so many and such different things in one sentence, that I hardly know, Ethel, which to answer first. As to mamma's acquaintance with these matters, you must really settle that with her yourself; only, excuse my saying that this is your first insurrection against her superior wisdom in her younger daughter's presence."

And Maude laughed too, as she remembered how Ethel had schooled her for the last ten or fifteen years at least, into reverence for the countess's authority, the mother's name having been "a tower of strength" down stairs, in all matters of dispute between the sisters.

"As to the 'playing the spy,'" pursued the young mentor, "that scarcely is the proper account to give of listening to ascertained matters of fact. As to your not being happier, if you knew something beforehand of a character soon to have some little influence on your own welfare, why, really, it is not for me to say anything. I had fancied that a husband's character before marriage, was a reasonable matter for inquiry or observation. I am glad to be corrected. You mean, of course, that nothing you hear can alter your own conduct. But really—"

"I never said so, Maude! Upon my word, your zeal is running away with your memory, little parson."

"You implied it," she answered, "for if you did hear a bad account of a suitor, and did give him up in consequence, lest you should have a miserable life, the chances are, you would be the happier, Ethel. Isn't it so?"

"As you will," sighed the other, who was in no humour for an argument. Who ever was, in her condition?

"But at all events," she went on, walking towards the window, "pause, my little Miss Whately, and give us your logic on this question, when your heart is in a better posture for seeing both sides of it."

"Neither men nor women," replied Maude, "see the true sides of a question of right and wrong with their hearts. Now, at all events, I have you. For, in trying to be cutting at my expense, you have said what I dared not have said, for my very life, viz., that you are going into this marriage against your conscience, because only it has won your heart. Oh! Ethel! Ethel!"

And Maude went up and put her loving arm round her sister, and bent down slightly (for Ethel was a little her inferior in stature, as well as in some other things, though a few years her senior), and tenderly kissed her, as they opened the glass door and walked out upon the covered terrace; one of them, at least, anxious to walk away also from the subject.

"But now, really, dearest Letty," cried the young counsellor, stopping short in their promenade, and standing directly in front of her, "really I have missed the worst thing you said just now, the very worst."

"Which was that?" asked the other.

"Which was (at least you meant that), that the wilder the youth, the better the man; and the worse the reputation of the lover, the more faithful the husband. Do you go to that length? Are you as far gone as to believe that, my former governess?"

"I think, perhaps, my little moralist will be left happier if we don't pursue that branch of the inquiry?"

"Not a bit of it," cried Maude. "Pursue away, for nothing you can add will meet with a flatter contradiction, in my heart or my common sense, than what you've implied already."

"Let's try," said her sister. "Are there any good and faithful husbands in the world, in your judgment, Maude? I beg your pardon—I mean, in your heart or your common sense," she put in, rather tartly.

"Certainly," pronounced the other.

"And they were all the very perfection of virtue and piety when they were younger?" inquired Ethel, with a look between a sneer and a triumph.

"That is not the question. Your position was, that virtue did not make a better husband than vice; a perfectly horrible maxim, that one has read in the dialogues of some French novels, but that I never thought to have direct from the lips of Ethel Blance. To admit, as I do at once, that all the good husbands now living were not patterns of propriety in their youth (though, by the way, it is a singular question, on which either of us can admit or deny anything), is merely asserting the possibility of reformation, and of a steady settling down after a wild beginning. Heaven forbid I should deny that possibility! But is that possibility any reason why I should go and link my future happiness to a known reprobate, and trust to his improvement rewarding my courage, after I cannot escape from him? More—is that possibility any reason why I should actually exalt a reformed rascal over his better neighbours, and sneer, as you did, Ethel; yes, I say you did—sneer at those better men, as 'sleek innocents!'"

"Didn't I tell you, Maude, that you would be left happier if we dropped that part of the subject?"

"Yes; but why happier? Not because you had any secret to let out which it would make one sad to learn, but because I did not certainly know, as I do now, that my sister, my elder sister, holds such opinions, and can pursue such courses."

"Opinions! courses!"

"Yes; begin by holding the opinion, that virtue does not promise more happiness in a married life than horrid profligacy, and then finish" (here Maude fairly lost her self-command, and only sobbed out the rest into her handkerchief), "finish, by throwing yourself away on just such a character, with your eyes wide open!"

It was, perhaps, better for both sisters that, just at this moment, they were interrupted. For Ethel was beginning to let loose a little emotion of her own, quite as sincere as Maude's grief, but not quite so subdued. She was beginning to ask herself whether this was quite the tone for a junior sister, however much loved—and she did love Maude very dearly. So that probably, her next words would have made one poor little heart wretched for many a long day, and afflicted her own with poignant remorse.

Those words were prevented, by the announcement by the servant, just in the midst of poor Maude's distress, that the Lady Ethel was awaited in the drawing-room by Colonel Latson.

Oh, Joyce! happy was it for thee, at that moment, that, as yonder menial, in his powder and his tassels, delivered his message, and made his obeisance, no such outcast as thyself lay near his walk, for he would have taken thee by the shoulder, and led thee into the highroad, perhaps with cruel words for thee to recollect!—

But oh, Joyce, Joyce! happier, thrice happier was it for thee, that, as the rich robe swept past, one ell of which could have bought thy baby a twelve-month's food, thou wast far off among the rough mercies of Seven Dials or Safron Hill! For hadst thou crouched down there in that lady's way, that lady's little foot would have tossed thy broken heart from her, as it had been a toad, and that same foot would have waltzed at night with the Honourable Colonel Hugh!

CHAPTER VI.

A FOUNDLING HOSPITAL.

"Yes, yes, child, but even the angel didn't carry off the baby, and do for it himself, though heaven knows he could afford it better than you can. He found out the mother, which is what we must do."

"The mother!" cried the young dressmaker; "who could have put it there but the mother? Suppose we did find her, next time it would be the river instead of the church, that's all. No, mother; put down in that place, and just after that sermon, I take it the poor little thing was sent to no one but us, and though I've no objection to let them know at the proper place, that we've got it, keep it for the present we must. Another hour's work a week will give the poor mortal all it wants just now; and, mother, there is another text somewhere, besides that one in Genesis, about whoso receives one such little child in Jesus' name, receiving Him. And remember, dear, what day to-morrow is! Would you send the little motherless thing to a workhouse on a Christmas day?"

And Ruth got up, and kissed the old woman (always one of her strongest arguments), and then went to the side of the bed, where the foundling lay, and whispered, among some more kisses, that she was, and would be, its mother now, and no workhouse nurse should ever touch it, if she only lived.

But Mrs. Wofield was one of the smallest of Ruth's difficulties. The old lady knew that all the inconveniences would be for a little while only. For, if Ruth didn't live long, as she greatly feared, it would be but one more pleasant thing to remember over her grave, that the dear girl did this good action among the last things she did; and besides, the little thing would be another keepsake to love, when her daughter was gone. Or, if Ruth survived her, the child would serve the same purpose, and keep the dear girl from fretting; and perhaps (who could tell?) he might live to do for Ruth, in her old age, what Ruth had done for her.

But it was a different thing to satisfy all the neighbours that little Hugh had any business there.

(His name,—simply "Hugh," nothing more,—had been written on a piece of paper in Joyce's own hand, and was pinned among his poor clothing.)

"Lawk-a-mercy!" said the charwoman who lived next door, when she heard the child crying early on that Christmas morning, "what's happened at Wofield's? There's never no good comes o' this millinary work. Why the mischief poor folks can't be poor folks, I don't know for sure. The papers talks of these gals sitting up late o' nights,—and all the worse for 'em, says I." And a fine story the good, charitable creature made of it, on the Tuesday, when she went to one of her work-places; and a pleasant whistle her husband sounded, the next time he encountered Ruth as she was taking home her sewing,—and gentle words, too, he spoke, one Saturday night, when he reeled along past the house, in a state of stricter vocabulary virtue than common,—a state which drunkenness, you must have observed, sometimes assumes.

"I say," said a young rascal to a policeman, one day, close by the house, when the officer pulled his ear for making slides,—"I say, now jist you let me be, can't ye! Let a feller alone; and go and lag old Mother Wofield, at number nineteen, as prigs the kidlings. She's got a young un there o' somebody's worth your while to look arter. Ye're afraid o' swells like her, I suppose."

And other little wretches came and flattened their noses against the window, and called out, at the top of their voices, as Ruth was nursing and stitching—

"Hush, my babe, lie still, an' slumber."

And, one day, a quieter youngster than the rest, cut a little oblong piece of white paper, and wrote on it, in large text, the word "Master," and stuck it on the doorplate across the "Ruth;" so the inscription read, "Master Wofield, Dressmaker;" while another of them borrowed his sister's bonnet, and having rung the bell, and brought the old woman to the door, made a low bobbing curtsy, and said, "Please 'm, do yer want such a thing as a nursery maid?"

But the good girl laughed equally at sneers and jokes, and lived on, with her little sickly burden, herself sicker and thinner every day.

It was two or three weeks after little Hugh had thus been found and adopted by another, and a true, King's Daughter,—exchanging, like Moses, the bulrushes for the arms of a real princess,—that, on a certain night, as dark and as wet and wintry as the eventful Christmas eve, a knock was heard at the door, and (as was singular in the evening) no one was heard to run away.

They had been so often called into the cold for nothing, that they waited for another rap; and then Ruth took up the candlestick, which was a wine bottle, holding the narrowest diameter of tallow perhaps you ever saw.

A figure stood outside, wrapped up about the throat with a red woollen comforter, and over that, with the collar of an old, worn, camelot cloak, that reached to the ground. There was an umbrella, but the shelter it gave was little worth the carriage; for all it did was to collect the pelting rain into rather larger streams, and send it down over the bending shoulders of the old man, somewhat blacker with the dye than it would have been with simple London soot.

"I beg your pardon," quavered a very low voice at the top of the comforter. "This isn't a night to keep you standing at the door,—but if you'd trust an old man inside a few minutes, I've a word to say to you that, mayhap, will be some excuse for disturbing ye."

And Ruth let him in, and she helped him to put off his old wet cloak, and when his hat was removed, there was a smooth, shiny, very bald pate, skirted by straggling gray hairs over the ears, that went at once to Ruth's heart, for she perceived a very strong resemblance to the dear old man whom Betsy Lewis had nursed.

"You have a little baby here?" said the stranger, when he was seated by the fire, or what served for a fire: "a little baby that wasn't born here, I believe?"

"Yes, we have," said Mrs. Wofield, "and we should like it, if you could tell us who put it in our road, poor little creature!"

"I can't do that," said the old man, "but I saw the notice in an old newspaper this morning, and I just thought it might help me in a little business that's brought me up to London."

"Indeed!" said both the women together.

"Aye," said the stranger, as he tried to bring his shivering fingers within reach of the few red coals in the grate. "If you'll allow me, I'll tell you my short story, and then you can see why I came and troubled ye."

"Put a dust o' coal on the fire, Ruth," said the elder woman, as she got up to look at the little fellow, that was again fast asleep on the bed.

"I had a daughter, young woman," said the old man, not all at once, but in jerking syllables, that bespoke his errand before he had said another word.

"I had a daughter, who came up, now many months ago, to this big city of yours, and where she is, God only knows. The best and dearest girl that ever stepped."

She went to live with a gentle family at the West-end, and all of a sudden she stopped writing. We heard not a sound from her. And when we wrote to her place, all they could say was, that she was gone, and they thought she was married, but they couldn't say.

Well, I've been there, since I came to town, and all I can tell is, that after she was gone, they found a bit of a letter in her room, with the same name at the bottom, as you put into your newspaper. Hugh! Hugh! that's the name. A bit of a sort of love-letter signed 'Hugh;' and nothing on earth has brought me here, but putting together that word and your word in the notice about the child that was found at the church door. Very poor hopes, I fear, of making anything out of it."

And the old man looked towards the bed which the woman had watched just before, and added—

"Might I go and just look—that is, if yonder is what you wrote about?"

Old Claymore stood at the bedside, while the younger woman drew down the coarse clean sheet, uncovering part of the infant's face; part, but not enough for the old man, who shook from head to foot—shook, but neither with cold nor wet. He gently lowered the coverlet another inch, and then stood and gazed.

The Wofields heard nothing, but they saw the big tears come up into the deep-sunk eyes, and then drop heavily on the bed. They respected the old man's misery, and waited for him to speak.

Presently he stooped down, and most gently kissed the little pale cheek, and left it glistening with his tears; and again touching the sheet to expose the mouth, said, as if he were all alone—

"I could have marked him with that short top lip, right away in foreign parts,—and so I could." Then turning to them, "That's my Joyce's own lip, young woman, Joyce Claymore's. You don't know his real name, my dear, but you know his mother's name now. And bless you both a thousand times for saving him! But first, how came he here, my good soul?" he said to Ruth. "And when did you see his mother? Or did you ever see her?"

And, once more stooping down, and this time kissing the little short upper lip, as if he were the tenderest of nurses, the old man tottered back to the seat against the fire-place, and fell heavily into the chair.

Between them, the two women told him all that they knew about the infant; and as they told, the grandfather took their hands by turns, and blessed them both from his full heart over and over. But how sadly his joy was dashed with grief at his daughter's loss, and with wretchedness at his daughter's shame, who shall tell?

If, on that miserable night, there was some subtle, mysterious power (some say magnetic), that irresistibly held him to that sleeping child, and, more certainly than any outward mark, pointed out his daughter's son, amongst ten thousand other infants in the great city; there was also, be you very sure, another link fastened, on that self-same winter's night—a link of vengeance between the old man in the widow's hovel, and a younger one far away. A new Nemesis was born that night, and in the grandfather's woe there was another account to be taken in eternity, if not earlier, of the Honourable Colonel Hugh.

They sat on far into the night, Ruth stitching away as fast as she could, and her mother slowly helping her. They talked of the past, and the happy days in Shropshire, the misfortunes in business, and the sudden, self-denying advertisement, and the leaving home. And then they talked of what was to be done now, of other advertisements, and of journeys seeking the lost, and of the chances of discovering what manner of man this Hugh could be, and of the old woman left at Arland, who waited, in deep sorrow, her husband and his report.

The chief practical result of the interview, was the arrangement that, for the present at least, the domicile of the foundling should be Ruth's house, in consequence of the infirmities of the Claymores, the poor old couple to join their narrow resources to the still narrower ones of the Wofields, for little Hugh's maintenance in his humble home.

And so, at last, they let out the heavy-hearted traveller into the bleak night.

And one more groan ascended from that huge "body of death" which every night struggles and heaves in this great city,—while scholars are forgetting it over their books, and fine ladies are ignoring it in carriages, flying from rout to rout, and legislators can make nothing of it in their busy struggling for the right-hand side of the Speaker's chair.

CHAPTER VII.

MR. DANIEL STUGGS.

MR. DANIEL STUGGS was not called upon for his services in providing a home for his companion, on that eventful evening when he overtook Joyce near Ruth's house.

Joyce was out of his sight, holding her hands against the precious paper in her poor wet dress, before her muddled partner missed her. As for Dan, it is difficult to understand how he would have found a lodging for Joyce, according to the promise he had hiccuped out, considering that he possessed very slender means of providing a home for himself.

In fact, at this particular time, Stuggs had no home. He was living in that Arabian and rather questionable manner, wherein he had passed the five years during which, with all deference to his friend the magistrate, he had been deserting Cicely. Nevertheless, he was under no particular concern about the future, for his vocation was not of a character that rendered a little temporary tightness in the money market a cause of serious embarrassment. He had only been in the workhouse because he had been too ill to follow his calling, and found few friends for the emergency anywhere else.

If Mr. Daniel Stuggs had had armorial bearings, they would have mounted the old border motto: "Thou shalt want ere I want."

This man, however, to do him justice, was not addicted to anything like violent dishonesty. He lived by his wits, not by his fists. He would never have taken your purse, until he had persuaded you in one way or another, that he was doing you a kindness in accepting it. But he had never been so sorely tempted, as he was now, to risk an "overt act," and make short work for a living. To be without shoe or stocking was quite a new thing for Dan. So, the fact came about, that when he ran against the young mother in the way we have recorded, he was going to keep a sort of half engagement with a certain rather dangerous acquaintance.

There is a very decided caste in criminal society. There are your gentlemen, and your low characters, even among thieves. You do not suppose that Messieurs the Directors of the Royal Metropolitan Eel and Crab Association, who made themselves a present last week (and will make themselves another this week) out of the little earnings of poor old Minnow, the retired schoolmaster, and out of the poor savings of the lonely Miss Gentle, who began to save fifty-five years back—I hope you do not suppose that these eminent men, who crack their walnuts at the — club, and their jokes with prima donnas behind the scenes, would hesitate to transport the pickpocket whom lord mayors only commit for a month, or to hang the burglar whom the chief justice is content to transport?

Accordingly, there is a rising and a falling in the status of scoundrelism, as well as in any other status. It does not, perhaps, occur very frequently that successful footpads mount into cashiers of the Little Southern Railway, but there is every reason to believe that many a Mr. Dobson, of the Transparent Summer-house Company, dies, reduced, a regular crackman, in the county "Jug."

Now, this veritable Sunday night was the night on which Daniel had almost promised to meet a new friend of his, by whom he would most assuredly have been led a little lower in the scale of roguery, and thus have "lost caste" among respectable rascals.

The short interview, however, that had just now ended with Joyce Claymore, partly obfuscated with drink though he was, suddenly turned the current of Dan's thoughts.

He knew exactly what was the matter with him, so that, according to the rule of a certain north-country toper, he was not drunk at all. This philosopher maintained, as our readers are no doubt aware—

"If I'm drunk, and I know that I'm drunk, then I'm not drunk; but if I'm drunk, and I don't know that I'm drunk, then I am drunk."

The rain had ceased, and the moon was coming out brightly, and a sharp frost promised to set in before the morning.

Dan went up to a pump, and began to souse the water well over his head with both his hands, to help his memory and his meditations.

"Mind your boots!" cried a cabman, from the neighbouring stand. "Mind your boots, man alive! I say, Fiddler, twig that gent a gettin' ready for the party! Cab, sir, cab?"

"Party! yer fool. He's a washin' out his wickedness arter the evenin' sarmin at Saint What's-his-name's; that's what he's a doin' of."

"Dash it!" said a third; "but I'm a nigger if he won't be glued to the spout presently, with this yere frost! I say, old fellow, have a drop of summut short, to take the chill off? Come, Bill, we'll stand a drain for the drowned hindividual, won't us?"

"Go along!" said the first driver, under his breath. "He'll have yer werry skid off yer, if yer go near him. He's no good lot, I can see!"

"Hi! have a lookin'-glass, guv'nor?" shouted the fellow whose hospitality was thus nipped in the bud.

"Or a walley-de-sharm?" cried another, amidst the roar of the whole stand, while they all twirled round on one leg, or poked their horses' sides with their foreheads for laughter.

"Aye, aye," said Dan, as he was wiping his neck with a very dingy pocket-handkerchief, and walking towards them, "glad to see you all in better spirits than when the beak fined ye twenty shillings for chis'lling, last week. My head I may wash, thank goodness, for it isn't let out to no master at fourteen shillin' a day. I should like to see you fellows dare to give your heads a ducking. Why, they'd all go to sop—they're so soft a'ready!"

And the cabmen stood about, with arms akimbo or snapping their whips, and laughing, as they found, what always pleases a London joker, that the jest was taken well—that is, returned.

Walking gentleman in London streets!—reader of the Times newspaper!—county magistrate at the Middlesex sessions!—jurymen at the Old Bailey!—is it to you, all and every, a sad thing that poor people are so discontented, and therefore so dishonest, and therefore so wicked, and therefore ought to be so severely punished?

If there is one thing more wonderful in the world than another, in our own eyes, we frankly tell you, it is the patient, sober, honest, hardworking lives of so many tens of thousands of the world's poor people. To walk, only for one day, through the streets, large and little, of this enormous London, and to watch the crowds of human beings, with ragged jackets and unshaven beards, selling fruit or buying bones; leaping, singing, driving, carrying, polishing, digging, joking, laughing, crying,—and all that they may live without hurt to their neighbours—(I say all, not meaning that "all" live without hurting, but that so many do these things "all" for that fair and honest and holy purpose),—and that your myriads of poor are doing these difficult and miserable things, surrounded by so much glaring wealth and power, possessed by fellow-mortals, all of whom the poor know to be, in God's sight, their equals; some of whom oppress them, and more of whom neglect them;—aye, gentleman! reader! magistrate! jurymen! we are no physical-force Chartists, no Levellers, we are but thankful Christians, when we say, that this spectacle amazes and delights us; for the world, though (God knows it!) bad enough, is not so bad as it would have been without the Providence which balances human livelihoods, and without the religion that counsels contentment, and without the universal, though vague, belief in another and a better state of things. Down with the cruel slander, that roguers are the majority amongst the poor! Governments, and parliaments, and newspapers used to say so; and if they had gone on saying so, and treating the poor as if they believed it, London would hardly have lived long enough to see April the tenth, eighteen hundred and forty-eight,—or if she had, she would have been in flames and in blood on the evening of that day. England's poor are England's glory. If you think otherwise, go abroad and find us another lower class for which you would like us to exchange our own; or—which would be better still—come down, dear gentleman and the rest, and spend six months in London on the proceeds of a little fishbasket, with millions of pounds shut up in the Lombard-street where you call "oysters," and we'll believe you!—

Half a score of poor men stood in the middle of that London street, on that moonlit Sunday, when the world was going to bed. They were not all honest men; but, if they paid little to society, those ten men owed less to society than society often thought. One of them was a downright rogue. Let him answer, as he will, to his country and to his God! But his God gave him a conscience, and therefore deserves the answer—his country has given him nothing, and yet claims the most of all! So much for Dan.

One of those cabmen drove to the church this morning an old lady, who, with marked cards, won five pounds of an old friend at two A.M. on this same Sunday.

He charged her at the church-door sixpence beyond the fare.

She will summon him to-morrow, and gain the day, at the police-court.

"Let him that is without sin among you, cast the first stone!"

CALCUTTA.

As the seat of British authority in India, Calcutta occupies a distinguished and important position, and throughout the late disastrous mutiny, has been watched with more than common interest. What are they doing in Calcutta? what measures have been adopted at Calcutta to suppress the revolt? what means have been taken at Calcutta to prevent the spread of the insurrection? These are the questions which have been continually asked since we first received the news that the Bengal army was in revolt.

At Calcutta the panic has been very great, but from late advices seems to be over. The native troops have at their own request been disarmed; the Shannon, the Belleisle, the Sanspareil, and the Pearl, with four armed steamers, were anchored off the town. The religious festival of the Hindoos has passed off without disturbance, and a feeling of confidence is being restored.

Much popular indignation has been excited by too conciliatory measures emanating from the Government House, Calcutta. Strong accusations have been brought, and bitter have been the invectives hurled against the Calcutta authorities. But it should be borne in mind—before we join in these denunciations—that the Bengal mutiny has been suppressed to a great extent, Lucknow relieved, and Delhi taken, by the vigorous efforts of the governor and council at Calcutta; and that this has been done, without a single man despatched from England, simply by the concentration of the forces already in the East.

It is unnecessary, however, for us to enter on the question, our purpose being rather to furnish information about the town itself.

Calcutta, the capital of British India, stands on the east side of the Hooghly river, about a hundred miles north of the Bay of Bengal.

The entrance to the Hooghly from the bay is wide and open, but the shores are low and swampy. Saugur Island, at the mouth, stretches off for many miles into the district called the Sunderbund, which was said at one time to have had a population of fifty thousand souls, who were all destroyed by a fearful irruption of the sea during a hurricane. At present, like the rest of the district, for hundreds of miles it is a jungle filled by serpents and wild beasts. The navigation of the river is easy, although it is sometimes rendered disagreeable by having to anchor off Marypore, five-and-twenty miles from Calcutta, where myriads of mosquitos board the ship, and are more trying and prying than custom-house officers. From Marypore to Calcutta the banks of the Hooghly are exceedingly picturesque. The plantain waves its vast green leaves, and the graceful stems of the bamboo contrast with the thick foliage of the mango. Innumerable blossoms of shrubs, giant creepers, and forest trees fill the air with perfume.

The nearer we approach Calcutta the more imposing becomes the aspect of the scene. On the right, for the distance of three miles, are the country houses of the aristocracy of the place. Many of these buildings are almost entitled to the name of palaces. The gardens are filled with splendid flowers and shrubs, which are singularly brilliant. On the left are the botanical gardens of the East India Company, and the bishop's cottage. A fleet of magnificent vessels is moored in the river, and above them in the distance towers the vast fortress of Fort William.

Including Fort William, which occupies the centre of a plain greater in extent than Hyde Park, Calcutta extends along the banks of the river for a distance of six miles, with an average breadth of a mile and a half. A handsome quay, called the Strand, stretches for nearly a league along the shore; it is raised forty feet above low water mark, and is furnished with between thirty and forty flights of landing steps called Ghauts.

On a near approach to Calcutta the Hooghly is crowded with shipping, and the forest of masts puts one in mind of the Thames below London-bridge.

Fort William is one of the strongest fortresses in the British dominions. It is built in the octagon form, three sides facing the river, and the remaining five commanding the land. It was built by Lord Clive, shortly after his victory at Plassey, and has cost the company about £2,000,000. The esplanade of the fortress is the fashionable resort for riding and driving.

The first impression which a visitor receives from the appearance of Calcutta is, that it is one of the most elegant and picturesque cities he ever beheld. But on closer intimacy he discovers that Calcutta, like most other great cities, has its miserable quarters, all the more wretched and dingy by contrast with the splendid villas and suburban palaces of European residents. This miserable quarter is called the Black Town.

The Black Town has been described as a collection of huts of earth baked in the sun, or of twisted bamboos interspersed here and there with ruinous brick bazaars, pools of dirty water, cocoa-trees and little gardens, and a few very large, very fine, and generally very dirty houses. The town is filled with crowds of people dressed in tawdry silks and brocades, more in white cotton garments, and most of all with scarcely any garments at all. Tradesmen are sitting on the ground in the midst of their merchandise; and carts drawn by wild-looking oxen are driven by still wilder-looking men; no women to be seen except of the lowest class; "a constant creaking of cart-wheels—which are never greased in India—a constant clamour of voices, and an almost constant thumping and jingling of drums and cymbals in honour of some of their deities; and add to all this a villainous smell of garlic, rancid cocoa-nut oil, sour butter, and stagnant ditches, and you will understand the sounds, sights, and smells of what is called the 'Black Town' of Calcutta."

The Government House is the most remarkable building in Calcutta. The architecture is chiefly of the Ionic order. It was built by the Marquis of Wellesley. The town also contains several noble edifices, amongst which may be counted the Custom House, the Mint, the Cathedral of St. John, the Courts of Justice, &c.

The northern and central parts of Calcutta are very densely inhabited. The southern parts are more scantily peopled, in consequence of the detached villas of the Europeans occupying so extensive a range. The population is estimated at about two millions.

THE COST OF A HOBBY-HORSE.

THOSE who possess strength of mind are doubly blessed; and none appreciate its advantages more than the vacillating victim whose mind is continually balancing between hope and fear.

We once knew an old lady—Miss Lucretia Holdfast—who was playfully vacillating indeed; the weakness amounting to eccentricity. Being a spinster, it is needless to say her mind was exceedingly active; and would have been, but for her malady, a very serviceable one.

Lucretia had been much struck with the prizes awarded at the poultry show, for speckled cocks, silver bantams, and Cochin China hens.

The idea suggested a profitable opening to her genius, and employment of her limited finances. She would supply the market on a more free-trade scale; and she felt as most ladies do—confident of success.

Her brother endeavoured to dissuade her from the idea, as being unfitted for a woman.

But the lady frowned him down.

"Then the expense," he urged.

This was fully met by the word "Profit."

He was silenced.

On the following morning orders were despatched for the purchase of some eggs.

Those of our readers who have never indulged in the mania for fancy poultry, or fancy things of any kind, cannot imagine the exorbitant price which the eggs of certain breeds fetch.

We would not venture to name a sum, for those ladies whose ideas of price are properly bounded by housewife experience—namely, sixteen a shilling—would smile at our credulity.

After a considerable outlay and much vexation and loss of time, eggs of different breeds were procured, also a fine Dorking hen, whose cluck betrayed a maternal tendency; and business was commenced.

Lucretia also procured the closing prices of each day's sale after the great poultry show, but this proved her ruin. It excited her ambition and gave the rein to the weak point of her character. When speckled cocks closed well, the nest stood six speckled cocks, four silver bantams, and three Cochin China hens.

The second day bantams ran high: the numbers were altered to six bantams, four speckled cocks, and three Cochin China hens.

The third and last one, Cochin China triumphed; and the result was, six Cochin China hens, four silver bantams, and three speckled cocks.

These frequent alterations proved a source of great annoyance to the unfortunate hen, who at last repaid any little friendly visit with demonstrations of anger.

The number being definitely settled, nature was allowed to take its course, when, within a few days of hatching, the old lady again became nervously unsettled. First she wished the result to be, ten cocks and three hens; the following day, ten hens and three cocks—the unhappy hen, on each occasion, being unceremoniously removed, and the eggs examined to ascertain the sex.

Till at last the Dorking, feeling disgusted on a point always a delicate one to mothers, indignantly stepped out of the butter firkin, which had been converted into a nest, and could not be prevailed upon to return.

In vain Lucretia paved the way to the deserted eggs, with all the delicacy she could think of.

The Dorking remained firm; every feeling of delicacy had been outraged, and she resented it, though her progeny were the price of her wrath.

Thus perished Lucretia's hobby, time, and money.

Nathaniel Holdfast was the very opposite of his sister. Having once furlled the topsail, as he termed it, nothing would induce the old gentleman to tell it out again.

He had, by dint of careful examination and inquiry, come to the strange conclusion that asses might be made equal to horses in speed, and promised by all the stone in Jerusalem to accomplish the task.

This strange hypothesis owed its origin to the fact of the celebrated Surrey Donkey being able to trot at the rate of sixteen miles an hour, a pace considerably beyond that of ordinary horses. "Now," argued Nathaniel, "if one can be found so far to excel its kind in trotting, surely another exists equally gifted in galloping."

"These two once procured, and the breed crossed, the result is certain indeed. It is by no other means we have obtained our swift racers."

The fact was no longer disputed. Holdfast visited all the donkey emporiums, far and near; the gathering of half a dozen asses, however far off, was sufficient inducement to visit the spot; but none with any particular propensities could be found.

At last he hit upon another expedient,—to visit all those places mostly attended by youth, arguing that youth being naturally quick and impetuous, would be the more likely to develop such propensities in the animal, provided nature had been so very bountiful. Blackheath was immediately selected for the next campaign. Holdfast took up a secure position, and soon had the gratification of seeing a lively boy mount an animal whose points for an ass were exceedingly good.

The donkey no sooner felt its rider mounted, than, by a strange contrariety of nature, it galloped off in a very respectable manner, thereby proving to Nathaniel that it more nearly resembled the racer than any he had seen, as race-horses always gallop off suddenly.

Armed with this and a Jenny, which a servant-girl averred had run away with a child upon its back, he set up his stables.

The natural result of this singular whim was a number of young donkeys, whose playfulness was the admiration of all the children in the neighbourhood.

These animals having arrived at a proper degree of bone and muscle, were instantly put into training.

A number of smart boys in becoming jockey costumes being enlisted for that purpose, and a field rented for the scene of their donkey exploits, great were the feats accomplished on the training-grounds by these novel aspirants to race-course celebrity; but whether it arose from an abundant supply of corn—very unusual food for such animals—or an actual improvement of the breed, is a matter of conjecture to the uninitiated.

Perhaps the greatest hit of all was the unqualified centralisation of all the surrounding idle and curious, who clambered up every imaginable place to witness the canter of these high bred donkeys, and for a long time Holdfast was in dread of being indicted as a common nuisance.

Great attention was paid to the warmth of the stables, the inmates frequently suffering as much from the extreme heat they endured as their less fortunate brethren from the opposite element.

Nathaniel argued, as was his wont, that it was impossible for them to attain that elasticity of limb with so thick a hide—the latter particularly, he felt sure, was the result of exposure to cold.

It may be remarked that Nathaniel's pet ass, Lucinda, is the first on record that could be truly called the thin skinned.

However, like all enthusiasts, the infatuated man overlooked the main-spring of the establishment. The idea of elevating the breed obscured every other consideration, and his business, from sheer neglect, fell to the ground, and with the crash placed Nathaniel on a sick-bed.

It is always a grievous sight to see a helpless man kicked or cuffed; and there are few, however peaceable their disposition, whose indignation would not overwhelm the cowardly offender—and very properly too.

Yet there are ways of hurting, without proceeding to open violence. Lucretia still remembered the jeer at the failure of her speckled cocks. Now her brother's hobby had harmlessly exploded; yet not harmlessly, either, for she regarded their altered position with dismay—'twas ruin. Her folly was but a bubble,—her brother's a whirlpool.

"I tell you what it is, Nathaniel," proceeded the lady, "none but a greater — than the best in your stable would have pursued such a mad scheme. It is not only ridiculous, but wicked to attempt to pervert the course of nature."

"Silence!" feebly ejaculated the unhappy man. "I tell thee, next year's foals would have returned me a fortune; and I glory in being able to say that by this time twelvemonth I could have changed the very nature of asses!"

"Impossible! they were ordained to be sure of foot."

"And fleet of limb!" gasped Holdfast.

"Fiddlesticks!"

"Have I not," continued Nathaniel, much excited, "already accomplished wonders, shortened their ears by an inch,—and the tail, that object of humps and reproach to common donkeys. I say, did you ever see an abject donkey playfully wag its tail? No. Only mine, in the full enjoyment of liberty, are capable of that act."

"And I have remarked," added the extraordinary man, musingly, "the movement of this member more nearly resembles that of the most spirited racer. I tell you, sister, animals are not fools, though they are dumb!"

"Perhaps not, brother, though men often are."

The wretched man groaned.

The climax of Nathaniel's misfortune arrived; the stud was in the market.

Catalogues were printed, setting forth the pedigrees of the Floras, Lucindas, Samsons, and many others.

But the aristocracy of this singular stable not being of ancient date, the details were by no means intricate; the whole to be viewed three days previous to sale.

The eventful morning at last arrived, each ass being led out, haltered and ribboned, in the most Tattersall-like style, and never was before seen such a capering and frisky lot of donkeys. Old gentlemen who had come with the avowed intention of purchasing one for some timid child, appeared truly alarmed at their behaviour, and flatly shook their heads when the auctioneer looked towards them for a bid.

Several men had already received sundry kicks and injuries from the vivacious creatures.

Costermongers from more than one county were present, the notice of the sale being so widely spread. Those whose ill-used beasts had dragged them to the spot, were found the largest bidders, for truly there was a terrible difference between their own half-fed brutes and the objects of the sale.

Exactly at half-past three Lucinda, the last and great favourite, exchanged her snug quarters for the tail-board of an ill-looking cart, but as if conscious of her degradation, revenged her fall by kicking at every one that approached her.

This terminated this novel scene; the trappings, saddles, and stable utensils were disposed of in one lot to a man who let out donkeys at Gravesend.

It is a curious fact, that to these famous creatures may be attributed the gaily decorated spring barrows—the pride of costermongers—which came out in imitation of those aerial-looking machines used by the celebrated American trotters.

And our readers have doubtless observed this peculiar vehicle, dragged by a donkey at a most unusual pace, often bidding bold defiance to omnibuses, hansom cabs, and pony phaetons.

These valuable animals all owe their origin to the stock of the once renowned Nathaniel's stables. As to that unfortunate individual himself, he could not even contemplate an ass without shedding a tear; to discover the ears shorter or the tail a little longer, would wring a profound sigh from his lacerated bosom.

Mr. Holdfast attributed the failure to the want of sufficient means to carry out his philanthropic and scientific idea, respecting the amelioration of the race of jackasses; whereas it was really occasioned by the over-riding his hobby.

Receipts.

TO CLEAN BLACK LACE.—Pass the lace through a warm liquor of bullocks' gall and water; afterwards rinse in cold water; then take a small piece of glue, pour boiling water on it, and again pass the lace through it; clap it with your hands, and then frame it to dry.

TO CLEAN BLACK SILKS.—To bullock's gall add boiling water sufficient to make it warm, and with a clean sponge rub the silk well on both sides; squeeze it well out, and proceed in like manner. Rinse it in spring water, and change the water until perfectly clean. Dry it in the air, and pin it out on a table; but first dip the sponge in glue-water, and rub it on the wrong side; then dry before a fire.

HOW TO KEEP BUTTER SWEET FOR YEARS.—The butter must be well churned and worked, and packed hard and tight in kegs of seasoned white oak; the head is then put in, leaving a small hole in which brine is poured to fill the vacant space; and of so much importance is it deemed to prevent any bad taste, that the plug for the hole must not be made of cedar or pines, but of cypress or bass-wood; as otherwise it would be injured. After which, these kegs are placed in hogheads well filled with brine of full solution, that will bear an egg, which is then headed up tight and close. By adopting this process, butter may be made to keep in any climate.

RANCID BUTTER can be restored to its original flavour by washing it first with lime-water, and afterwards with spring-water. Lime-water is easily prepared by beating up about a quarter of a pound of good fresh lime in a pail of water; after standing about an hour, the impurities subside, from which the lime-water can (with care) be poured off.

HOW TO KNOW GOOD FLOUR.—When flour is genuine, or of the best kind, it holds together in a mass when squeezed by the hand, and shows the impressions of the fingers, and even of the marks of the skin, much longer than when it is bad or adulterated; and the dough made with it is very gluey, ductile, and elastic.

OUR WIVES.

I'm a clerk in the office of Plutus Pilpay;
He's thirty—I'm fifty, or near;
His income, at least, is one hundred a day,
While mine's but a hundred a year.
Fine broadcloth his coat, while coarse home-spun I wear;
He's booted, while I am but shod;
All's one! with us both, back and feet must go bare
When we travel the highway of God!

His house is a wonder; in fact, I've been told
That 'twas shown at a shilling a peep!
There are gardens and aviaries, velvet and gold—
In short, everything that's not cheap.
There's a chapel, in which 'tis a pleasure to pray;
Religion made easy for lust;
And here, every Sabbath, my master, Pilpay,
Rehearses the sleep of the Just.

His table is splendid with crystal and plate,
His cellar is daintily stored;
And there's no tedious Lazarus begs at his gate
For the morsels that fall from his board.
Seven horses he keeps, though I know that he rides
In a stage every day of his life;
But of all his live stock—and he's others besides—
The most costly, I hear, is his wife.

Mrs. Pilpay's the fashion, as far as the art
Of Madame Le Marabout goes;
Her bonnets break many a feminine heart,
And the neighbours cabal o'er her clothes.
How she rustles along to her pew in Grace Church,
Most smilingly marshalled by Brown!
While poor I for some corner laboriously search,
To escape that great autocrat's frown.

Mrs. Pilpay kneels close to the altar, while I
Can scarce catch a glimpse of the shrine;
I wonder if He, for whose mercy we cry,
Hears her prayers any better than mine!
Does she pray? That's the question. For sometimes
I've seen
In her hands books suspiciously bound—
Strange volumes got up in unorthodox green,
And heathenish gilding all round!

Mrs. Pilpay is every Wednesday "at home"
To all of her friends, save her spouse;
He, on such state occasions, is bound not to come
Within ten rifle-shots of his house.
For a husband is all very well in his place—
Which means, in his office down town;
But his presence would carry uxorial disgrace
Were he seen in the circles of Brown.

Mrs. Pilpay a very fine woman is thought—
Tall, dashing, and haughtily bred;
A splendid complexion—I know where 'tis bought!
Raven hair—but no more on that head!
I've heard people say she was gay, indiscreet,
And point with a smile at the "boss";
But, bless you, he's too much engaged in "the street"
With his profit, to think of his loss!

Many times at my desk, when the checks I fill out
For the thousands we daily disburse,
And I've lunched upon crackers and apples, and doubt
If I've got still a groat in my purse,
I think, spite of Pilpay's magnificent life,
Splendid wife, splendid house, and the rest,
I've got a home too, and a dear little wife
That I would not exchange for his best.

My home's but a chamber; a back one, what's more;
Our carpet was bought second-hand;
Wife makes up the bed, cooks the meals, sweeps the floor,
Nor e'en to mend shirts is too grand.
And in one of the cosiest ends of the room,
Snuggly nestled 'mid curtains of white,
Lies a blest little angel, of heavenly bloom,
Familiarly called "Heart's Delight!"

My home's rather poor, as you see; but I swear
There is sunshine all over the place—
A sunshine that breaks from my wife's golden hair,
And baby's miraculous face!
It gilds the bare wall with a magical tone;
It turns our plain platters to gold;
Yet we have not got that alchemical stone
So sought by the sages of old.

My wife does not purchase her dresses up-town,
And seldom gets anything new;
But she makes better show with a dimity gown
Than I think Mrs. Pilpay could do.
Her bonnet needs no finer roses than those
That ruddily glow in her cheeks;
Nor has Mrs. Pilpay such pearls as the rows
That glisten whenever she speaks.

So though I'm a small clerk with Plutus Pilpay,
And am shabbily coated, I fear—
And although he is worth a full hundred a day,
And I but one hundred a year—
I'm richer than he in the treasures of life,
In spite of his horses and house;
For when I was wedded I married a wife,
While he was fobbed off with a spouse!

Varieties.

A CERTAIN cockney Bluebeard, overcome by his sensibilities, fainted at the grave of his fourth spouse. "What shall we do with him?" asked a perplexed friend of his. "Let him alone," said a waggish bystander; "he'll soon re-wive."

DEFINITION.—A dandy is a chap that would be a lady if he could; but, as he can't, does all he can to show all the world that he is not a man.

At one of the customary school examinations an urchin was asked, "What is the use of bread?" to which he replied, with an archness which implied what a simpleton you must be to ask such a question, "To spread butter upon."

A CONTEMPORARY inquires if the young ladies of the present day are fitted for wives. We think it a much more important inquiry whether they are fitted for husbands.

A CELEBRATED physician boasting at dinner that he cured his own hams, one of his guests observed, "Doctor, I would a great deal sooner be your ham than your patient."

THE author who was discovered in the act of robbing a bank has been released on the plea—"he was only taking notes!"

"WHAT is light?" asked a schoolmaster of the booby of a class. "A sovereign that isn't full weight is light," was the prompt reply.

YOUNG Jones complained to his father-in-law of the temper and waywardness of his wife. "I'll cure her," said her father. "I'll cut her off with a shilling if she don't behave." Young Jones always told his father-in-law, after that, "She's a model of a wife."

THEY tell a story about a tailor dunning a man for the amount of his bill. The man said, "I am sorry, very sorry indeed, that I can't pay it."—"Well," said the tailor, "I took you for a man that would be sorry; but if you are sorer than I am, I'll quit."

"Ah," exclaimed one of a young lawyer's friends, "he's got the law at his fingers' ends."—"Yes; and he needs it there," responded another, "he's got but little of it in his head!"

"WE have a span of horses," said an economist the other day, "on our farm, that support themselves without any cost." "Why, how is that?" exclaimed a listener. "Why, you see," remarked the questioner, "one is a saw horse, the other a clothes horse."

WHEW! HERE'S ANOTHER!—A traveller was recounting with an air of truth several incredible things, when a 'cute Vermont present exclaimed: "Dew tell! But 'tain't much after all. Why, a sarkemstance happened up there in our village, that takes me down all holler." "What was it, Seth?" asked one of the company. "Our organ," replied Seth, with a face so sober that every one knew something rich was coming; "our organ, the organ of our meetin'-house, it imitated thunder so natural on Sunday, that it curdled all the milk for five miles."

AN EXCELLENT BEAU.—Three or four times a couple appeared before a clergyman for marriage; but the bridegroom was drunk, and the reverend gentleman refused to tie the knot. On the last occasion he expressed his surprise that so respectable a looking girl was not ashamed to appear on the altar with a man in such a such state. The poor girl broke into tears, and said she could not help it. "And why, pray?" "Because, sir, he won't come when he is sober!"

THE art of economy is drawing in as much as one can, but unfortunately young ladies will apply this "drawing in" to their own bodies, when they wish to avoid anything like a waist.

READER, did you ever enjoy the ecstatic bliss of courting? You didn't! then you had better get a little Gal-an-try.

A FELLOW slipped down on an icy pavement, and in a sitting posture, muttered, "I have no desire to see the town burnt down, but I do wish the streets were in ashes."

ANSWERS TO OUR CHESS CORRESPONDENTS.

D. G. R.—In Problem No. 1, the Black King is absent from the board. Problem No. 2 is correct, but scarcely of sufficient merit for publication. No. 3 is neat, and shall appear among the Enigmas. No. 4 can be solved in two moves by commencing with Kt to Q 7; R mates next move.

M. A. R.—If the game which accompanied your letter is a fair example of the play of both parties, we have no hesitation in saying that Mr. G. could easily give his adversary the Kt. The game possesses no feature of interest.

A. LEARNER (Penrith).—1. We think that your first question must be answered in the affirmative. 2. The Manchester, Reading, Clapham, Vauxhall, and many other chess clubs. 3. Messrs. Staunton, Horwitz, Harrwitz, Buckle, Lowenthal, and many others. 4. Highly favourable. We shall be glad to learn that the attempt to establish a chess club in your neighbourhood has been successful.

Our Editorial Table.

A READER OF SOME YEARS' STANDING.—If the wife wishes to claim her thirds immediately upon her husband's death, she can do so by taking the proper means. A husband can will his own property away from his wife and to any one he pleases, subject to her claim to dower in the real estate, if that has not been barred according to law.

AN ISRAELITE. We think, ought not to object to deliver goods in a wheelbarrow during his apprenticeship. He should not be compelled to work on the Jewish Sabbath, but if he claims exemption on religious grounds on that day, he certainly ought to work on the Christian Sunday if required to do so, except so far as is contrary to law. In this case, as in every other, we earnestly advise the cultivation of a kindly and obliging spirit: it answers best. None love and few care to deal with the man who, like Shylock, stands upon the letter of his rights, as set forth in "his bond."

ONE THAT WISHES TO GET ON.—We counsel you to bring your grievances before a bench of magistrates; it is impossible for us to advise upon the construction of a legal document, unless we saw it.

W. H. L.—Your landlord can claim rent up to Lady Day, but if you had gone out of the house when he ordered you by word of mouth to do so, he would have had no further claim upon you. Yearly tenants must give and receive six months' notice previous to the end of any current year of their tenancy.

ENGINEER.—Wooden rails were first laid down by Mr. Beaumont for the use of his coal-pits in 1602. The earliest iron rails are supposed to have been employed at Whitehaven, in the year 1738, or thereabouts. The expression "tram roads," so regularly used in coal and iron districts, is derived from the name of the man Benjamin Outram, who first used stone props instead of timber, to support the ends and joinings of the rails.

HERALDUS.—Arms of dominion are those annexed to certain territories, and borne by sovereigns in token of their authority and power, belonging not to the reigning family, but to the royal offices; such, for instance, as the arms of Great Britain, the Eagle of Austria, &c.

INDIAN.—To accuse Warren Hastings, the Governor-General of India, of reckless and selfish mal-administration, is to take a very prejudiced view of his character and career. The case, impartially stated, just amounts to this: Hastings was placed at the head of affairs in India when the British power was far from being on a safe foundation. He worked night and day to extend and consolidate British rule in India, and brilliant success attended his efforts. He was not rapacious for his own sake; nor can we find, in the very moderate fortune with which he returned to England, any evidence of the craving after wealth of which his enemies accused him. But he was unscrupulous in his administration. If, for the public service, a sum of money was suddenly required, he would extort it legally or illegally from a native prince. When it became necessary, in his opinion, to overawe the natives, he committed acts of unjustifiable severity; witness the slaughter of the Rohillas, or hill tribes, and the judicial murder of Brahmin Nuncomer. His impeachment, on his return to England, was entirely a party measure. The furious speeches delivered by Burke, Sheridan, and others, on the occasion of his impeachment, are full of inaccuracies and misconceptions, and his acquittal, after a tedious trial of seven years, gave universal satisfaction. He died, a very old man, in England.

ROSE NOTTINGHAM.—Air, exercise, temperance, and good-temper are the best cosmetics we know. The face embellished and purified by the use and practice of these, is sure to be attractive, even if its skin is freckled and hue ruddy.

Z. A.—We have told all we know about rings over and over again. If this correspondent is the constant reader she signs herself, how is it she has not seen our frequent replies upon this subject?

A YOUNG GALLANT.—The right arm (not "harm") is quite as good as the left, for anything we ever heard to the contrary.

VIOLA WINTAP.—Honey and vinegar mixed together, or raw eggs, are said to be good for the voice. The two first we have taken with much effect; but if the voice is strained from over-work, perfect rest is the only cure.

IGNORANCE is not more ignorant than ourselves upon the matter of her inquiries. We know nothing of omens, and can give no idea why the dove flew in at the window just when she was about to change her position in life, unless, indeed, it was hungry, and there were crumbs on the window-ledge!

F. C.—A wedding breakfast consists of all the good things the parties giving it can muster and afford. The style, materials, and "serving up," vary of course with the rank and means of the host and happy pair in whose honour it is given. A confectioner accustomed to provide such affairs would be the best person to consult on the matter.

W. A. P.—Under the peculiar circumstances you mention we think you might, without much hesitation, marry the young woman. But do not act in this way if you have lost your love for her. There must be something stronger than pity on your side to make the union happy.

MARY B.—Nothing can be prettier, or contribute more to an evening's amusement, than a Christmas tree, the decorations of which afford so much scope for the exercise of taste and ingenuity even for weeks beforehand, that we wonder any young lady should be tired of it. Of ornamental cakes we are not surprised "Mary" should weary. They are pretty things to look at, and if one does not mind unwholesomeness, nice things to eat; but, unless our fair correspondent's friends come together for no other purpose than eating, we think she could scarcely provide anything less complimentary in the way of amusement. Let "Mary," therefore, stick to the tree.

CELT.—Yours is a very important question; the responsibility of answering which we shrink from taking upon ourselves. Many men marry and live honourably and happily upon the income you name; but quite as many bring themselves, their wives, and families into misery and penury upon it. Much depends upon past habits, and future economy; also upon health, and the necessary expenses induced by the social position of the parties. Extravagances no man need enter upon; but such things as are needful for respectability he must have; and not himself alone, but his wife and his children. However, your letter is so temperate and rational, —the pros and cons so justly and dispassionately set forth, that we think the case may be safely left to your own determination, after the expiration of the next twelvemonths, before which we certainly would not advise you to marry.

BELLA.—Auburn is a pretty colour; and the verb in the sentence should be in the plural.

AN EARNEST INQUIRER.—If a man dies intestate, leaving a wife and children, one third of his personal property goes to his widow, the rest between his children.

MARIE.—We never heard of any law on the subject of cards. In most of the weddings we have known, the lady chose the pattern she preferred. The articles were then sent to the gentleman, by whom they were presented to her.

DORENO has "fallen in love with a very nice girl," who, he dares to say, is in love with him, but who, nevertheless, will have nothing to do with him unless he discards his mustache and beard, which she considers are of a dirty colour. Now, as "Doreno" neither wants to lose the girl nor yet his mustache and beard, he applies to us to know what to do in the difficulty. We wonder he should be puzzled; the matter is very simple. Which does the youth love best, girl or beard?

H. L. D.—Your brother is entitled to the suit of clothes his master gave him.

CAMBRIDGE (not the Duke) wants to know whether it would be inconsistent for him to marry a woman (whom he dearly loves) eight years older than himself. Where real love exists we do not see any impropriety in the case. We think, as a general rule, disparity of age is a decided objection to a marriage union; but if pure affection dictate such a union, the parties are perfectly justified in entering the bonds of wedlock. Marry by all means, and send us a bit of bridecake.

AN ENGLISHMAN is angry with us about speaking, in our recently-printed romance, too highly of the Young Pretender. We assure our correspondent we are not Jacobites. We have—Heaven forbid!—no desire to promote a rebellion against the house of Brunswick; we value too much the advantages and privileges enjoyed by England under the dynasty to wish anything of the sort. That Prince Charles was a chivalrous, dashing young hero, nobody can doubt; that he possessed the solid qualities which are requisite to make a good king, nobody, or a very small party, believe. We are not aware that we have sacrificed "truth and honour" to "blacken or elevate" character. We certainly had no such intention. 2. The Queen of Oude is the Queen Mother, not the Queen Consort.

CEPHAS.—Apply to the publisher.

OLD SHIP.—It must be a matter of personal choice whether you enter the royal navy or the merchant service; and as to the pay of a purser's clerk it is variable, and chiefly depends on the purser.

R. W. M.—The following is a receipt for dyeing the hair black. Take equal parts of litharge and lime; mix well, and form into a paste with water. Clean the head with a small-tooth comb, and wash the hair with soda and water to free it from grease; then lay on the paste pretty thick, and cover the hair with oil-skin, after which go to bed. Next morning the powder should be carefully brushed away, and the hair oiled.

MOSS-ROSE BUD.—It is not our province to select suitable brides for young gentlemen, to furnish the addresses of such, or to assist in corresponding with them.

EDWARD DE MONTREVEL.—We have never heard of "any article by which the growth of eyelashes may be promoted." R. G. NELSON, D. D. K., and M. THOMASON will find every particular as to the size, price, and contents of our New Series fully answered in the number now before them.

R. D. G. may obtain the four volumes of the ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER at 7s. 6d. each, bound in cloth, at our publishers', or of any bookseller.

MINOR.—The population of the United States amounts at present to about 25,000,000.

M. N. O.—We have repeatedly stated that we cannot undertake to recommend particular works, especially where there are so many rival claims. Should we speak highly of A, all the other letters in the alphabet would accuse us of undue partiality, and in some cases, perhaps, of injustice.

ANXIOUS had better allow the young lady to choose for herself.

A SCHOOL-GIRL.—Shortening the hair by having it repeatedly and regularly cut is the best way of preventing it from falling off. As to the question of whether or not persons are apt to take cold from sleeping with their bedroom windows open, we can only say that we have for years adopted the plan of sleeping with an open window (save only when rain or snow beats directly in) and never experienced any ill effects from it.

ALICK CAMPBELL.—Your letter is very flippant. The term "governor," as applied to a parent, is highly disrespectful, and, however common in certain society, very ill bred. For this last reason, if not for a better, discard the word at once; it gives a stamp you would not like to bear. As to your query, we fear it is of little use giving advice to a man who means to take his own; but if you have not quite decided upon the step you mention, we earnestly recommend you to pause and reflect what happiness is likely to follow a marriage entered into against the express command of parents. For our own part, we think no woman worthy of being a wife, or likely to be a good one, who would marry any man, however much she loved him, in defiance of his father's will, unless under such peculiar circumstances as do not, we conceive, exist in your case.

BUSINESS.—Good blacking-paste may be made with half a pound of ivory-black, half a pound of treacle, half an ounce of powdered alum, one drachm of turpentine, one ounce of sulphuric acid, and two ounces of raw linseed oil. The ivory-black and treacle must first be thoroughly mixed together, and the other ingredients subsequently added. The method of obtaining an excellent and brilliant polish on furniture is by saturating the surface with olive oil, and then applying a solution of gum arabic in boiling alcohol. This serves as a sort of varnish, and is employed with great success. Recipes for ink-making are plentiful enough. Dr. Ure's is the best we know of. "For twelve gallons of ink, take twelve pounds of bruised galls, five pounds of gum, five pounds of green sulphate of iron, and twelve gallons of rain-water. Boil the galls with nine gallons of the water for three hours, adding fresh water as required. Let the decoction settle; draw off the clear liquid. Add to it the gum, previously dissolved in one and a half gallon of water; dissolve the green vitriol separately in the remaining quantity of water; mix the whole." The ink is good, and has the additional recommendation of cheapness.

IGNORAMUS.—Etiquette is defined by the lexicographers as the ceremonial of good manners. It has been incorporated into the English language for some years, and is pronounced et-e-ke-t. Of course it is not in "Johnson's Dictionary," for the word was not at that time used in England; "Walker" includes it, as he considers it "more specific than 'ceremonial.'"

INNOCENCE wants to know upon what finger it is proper for a disengaged lady to wear a ring! How very innocent (does the lady know what sort of folks our Irish neighbours call "innocents?") this correspondent must be! Any finger but the fourth finger or the thumb.

A YOUNG POTTER.—The Corinthia, about whom you are so anxious to obtain information, was the daughter of Dibutas, a potter, of Sicyon, or Corinth. She is said to have sketched the profile of her lover on a wall, by lamplight, while he slept, and afterwards made a model of clay, which her father baked in his furnace. This incident, which is given as the origin of the art of design among the Grecians, is beautifully alluded to by Montgomery, in one of his minor poems:—

"Trembling with ecstasy of thought,
Behold the Grecian maid,
Whom Love's enchanting impulse taught
To trace a slumberer's shade.
Sweet are the thefts of love; she stole
His image while he lay,
Kindled the shadow to a soul,
And breathed that soul through clay."

It is supposed that she lived about six centuries before the Christian era.

W. BARLOW.—The following is the literal translation of "Legibus antiquis castrorum, et more Camilli."—By ancient camp laws, and the custom of Camillus.

FISSEE.—We do not think you need lay the lady's torn dress very deeply to heart; she has doubtless long since forgiven it. Nevertheless, if you choose to seize upon the opportunity offered by the accident to make an apology, there can be no objection. The blushing fair one may possibly smile an acceptance of your contrition, which, judiciously "improved, may lead to the happiest results."

BANDOLINE.—We fear that at present there are few openings for "educated gentlemen" in the colonies. Governesses abound there, unfortunately, as at home. The best chance of obtaining a situation would be to advertise, stating the advertiser's wish to go abroad, and willingness to remain with the family in which she engages.

YOUNG PRETENDER.—Pray don't read such books as the one you mention. It is like feeding on tainted meat when abundance of wholesome food is within your reach. Many of the works of the writers of the last century make us wonder how their books could have been admitted into the libraries of men with wives and daughters, and how the writers escaped public execration. Read pure books, or none at all.

GIOVANNI DE GONZAGA.—Sir Walter Raleigh introduced tobacco into England, but the custom of smoking is mentioned by earlier travellers in America. The word "telegram" may decidedly be considered as belonging to the English language. We greatly approve of it, as shorter than "telegraphic despatch" by three good syllables.

K. O.—Camphorated chalk used occasionally will answer your purpose.

ELVIRA RAMSAY.—The emphasis on the word Le-vi-a-than is on the second syllable.

No. 16 is probably not aware that he must "serve his time" before he can become a mate in the merchant service.

MONTBAE.—Without some natural talent for music, the attempt to learn the piano-forte without the assistance of a master becomes hopelessly tedious; but after a few lessons have been taken, a learner may easily improve himself with the help of a book of easy pieces.

S. T. B.—The higher branches of English education, as taught in schools, include a knowledge of ancient and modern history, physical, mathematical, and political geography, and the elementary portions of the various sciences.

A SPECULATOR can scarcely expect us to take the responsibility of recommending investments. With regard, however, to the printed paper he has sent us, we should distrust any prospectus of an invention "promising speedily to become enormously lucrative." The appearance of the document you have sent us scarcely leaves room for a question as to its character.

CIVIS.—In the military executions in India blank cartridges have been used. In blowing a man from a cannon, a ball is quite unnecessary. That these executions, without torturing the criminals, have struck terror into the hearts of the natives there is no doubt, and that is the end they were intended to answer.

PERFECTION has formed a very imperfect idea of our mission, if he supposes that we can undertake the correspondence to which he refers.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TABLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

What numbers, once on fortune's lap high fed,
Solicit the cold hand of charity.
To shock us more, solicit it in vain.—YOUNG.

BEARING her now insensible burden in her arms, Rachel staggered rather than walked on her way towards home, till she reached the foot of Westminster-bridge, when the bitter recollection suddenly struck her that neither food, fire, nor even light was to be found there; and what was still worse, that she was penniless, for George had taken the last shilling. In her despair and utter helplessness, she determined to beg, to implore the assistance of the passers by; and it is extraordinary how slight was the additional pang the resolution cost her, for pride, womanly shame, and fear yielded at once to the strong instinct of maternal love.

"All are not of iron," she murmured; "some will listen to me."

Despite her effort to repress them, the tears which had gathered in her eyes fell on her pale cheek, where the keen frost soon fixed them, nature's gems wrung from a mother's breaking heart.

The first person to whom the suppliant addressed herself was a stout, well-dressed man, about sixty years of age, who was buttoned up to the chin in a greatcoat, and wore a warm comfortable shawl carefully tied around his neck to guard against the cold—the hand of his wife or daughter in all probability had arranged it for him. There was no mistaking his appearance; respectability was stamped in his very walk, and the consciousness of being well-to-do in the world, in the confident air with which he struck his gold-headed cane upon the slippery flagstones.

Rachel faltered a few scarcely intelligible words about her child. She had not yet learnt the beggar's lesson—importunity.

"What did you say?" demanded the gentleman, releasing his nose and chin from the folds of the shawl.

The friendless woman repeated her prayer.

"Begging!" exclaimed the old man, angry at having been detained, though only for an instant, on the bridge, where the east wind was blowing so piercingly. "At this hour of the night, too! You ought to be ashamed of yourself! Isn't there a workhouse?"

With this reproof, which was uttered in no gentle tone, well clad respectability passed on, whilst poor Rachel, whose strength began to fail her, leant against the parapet for support.

"Isn't there a workhouse?" How often has the same question been heartlessly asked by those who, having paid the poor-rate, consider that they have fulfilled every Christian duty for the next six months, or, in other words, till the collector comes round again; that charity has no right to make any further call upon their well-filled purses, or hungry poverty to annoy them with its tale of suffering? Unfortunately, there are many such persons in the world, men whose sympathies with humanity cease the instant they cross the thresholds of their own comfortable homes, whose hearts are as systematically sealed as their pockets.

Not that we advocate indiscriminate charity—far from it; but a mother appealing for assistance for her child! Oh, better, a hundred times, be the victim of some well acted deception, than leave that prayer unanswered once.

The next person to whom the mendicant addressed herself was a tall, gentlemanly-looking man, enveloped in a large cloak. In all probability she would not have found courage to speak, had he not paused directly opposite the spot where she was standing to regard her.

"My child is dying!" she exclaimed, imploringly.

"Well?"

"Well!" repeated Rachel, in a tone of despair.

"Well! I ask your pardon, sir. It was a foolish thought, a very foolish one, to suppose that a mother and her starving child could, on a night like this, excite a stranger's pity. I will not offend again."

"What is it you require?"

With a desperate effort the unhappy wife, and still more unhappy mother, faltered forth the word "charity."

The appeal was answered by an insulting, triumphant laugh.

There was something so wild, so unnatural in the mirth which could sport with distress like hers, that Rachel looked up, fearing she had encountered a madman. A pair of dark, fiend-like eyes were glaring upon her with an expression of savage exultation. She recognised them in an instant, for they were the same that had haunted her girlhood's dreams, inspiring her with terror and aversion.

Mechanically she pronounced the name of "Carus."

"Aye, Carus," repeated her cousin, with a bitter sneer. "I am glad you know me. I am not changed. Carus, the man whose love you scorned and rejected, whose charity you are reduced to solicit. Well, it is some satisfaction to see the wife of George Markham a beggar. Let me look upon you," he added; "it is not often that I taste so keen a pleasure."

Overwhelmed with shame and fear, the trembling creature attempted to pass him, but he seized her rudely by the arm, and swung her back.

"You will hurt my child!" she cried.

"Your child!" exclaimed the well-dressed ruffian, mockingly; "his child. And so it is dying, starving? What else could you expect when you married a worthless drunkard? See here, Rachel," he continued, at the same time extending his hand towards her filled with money; "half this, a quarter—nay, a tithe of it would save its life, and—"

"You would not give me one penny, Carus," interrupted his cousin, calmly. "You forget how well I know you."

"Right," answered the infuriated man, hurling the coin over the bridge. "Not a doit. Let the brat starve, and its mother with it. A pauper's shell may hold them both."

"Your wish—your cruel wish—will soon be gratified!" sobbed the terrified woman. "I must hasten to my desolate home."

"But I can't part with you thus," observed Carus Kearn.

"What mean you?"

"That you have no right to beg," replied her persecutor; "it is a punishable offence. You must pass the night at the police-office; I shall give you in charge."

"You cannot mean it!" exclaimed Rachel, indignantly.

"Can't I?" answered her cousin, coolly.

"You dare not—bad as you are—you dare not brave the infamy of such an act. The world would cry shame upon you!"

"Let it cry: I am not to be terrified by clamour."

Had he not been excited by wine, and still more by the ferocious satisfaction he experienced in witnessing the humiliation of the woman who had rejected him, the cold, calculating man of the world would have hesitated before risking the exposure; but in his present state of mind, all considerations of prudence yielded to the desire of gratifying his hate. Grasping his cousin once more by the arm, he called loudly for the police: fortunately, his cries were unanswered.

Whilst Rachel was struggling to release herself, Jack Manders, who had just escaped from the park, came running over the bridge. He recognised Mrs. Markham in an instant, and stopped.

"Did you pass a policeman, boy?" demanded Carus.

"More than one," replied the lad: "but what are you doing with that woman?"

"She has been begging."

"Has she?"

"And I intend to give her in charge."

"Do you?"

"Bring me a policeman, and I'll give you half a sovereign," added Carus Kearn.

Jack's heart—for, despite the school of vice in which he had unhappily been reared, the poor fellow really possessed such a thing—had bitterly reproached him for the danger into which he had led his late companion: not that he considered it likely to prove very serious; for Richard, as our readers are aware, had not touched the pocket of the benevolent old gentlemen in St. James's Park, and was totally unknown to the police—circumstances greatly in his favour, according to the calculations of his more experienced friend, in whom the feeling of remorse became doubly strong when he saw Rachel struggling in the rude grasp of her cousin.

"Did you hear me, boy? Half a sovereign," repeated Carus, "for a policeman!"

"I heard ye," exclaimed the lad: "hadn't you better have two?"

Springing on the well-dressed ruffian, the speaker dextrously struck him a smart blow in the centre of his right cheek, and sent him sprawling on the slippery pavement. This was a trick his uncle, the returned convict, had taught him; and more than once it had enabled Jack to escape from his captors.

The fall was a severe one.

"Run!" whispered her protector to the terrified woman; "the peeler is at the other end of the bridge—I saw him in the bar of 'The Anchor,' a-drinkin' success to the new year, and plenty of 'em. Don't stare so, Mrs. Markham, you frighten me: run—run!"

The hope of escaping from the degrading exposure her persecutor had threatened her with imparted a momentary strength to the trembling limbs of Rachel, and a mother's love added speed to her flight as she rapidly disappeared in the direction of her home.

Jack Manders was not slow to follow; still he gallantly kept behind, determined, at any risk, to prevent her being overtaken. Several times he repeated to himself "Only for begging! only for begging!" Had it been for thieving, doubtless he could have understood it.

When the policeman at last made his appearance on the bridge, Carus Kearn was standing alone, leaning against the parapet, to recover his breath.

"Curse you!" he muttered, gasping with rage and mortification between every word; "you fellows are never in the way when your services are required."

"Sure, and I must take my reglar bate," answered the man, with a strong Hibernian accent, and at the same time touching his hat, for the speaker was well dressed, and not so drunk but he knew what he was about. "What's the row? Has your honour been robbed?"

"Yes!" exclaimed Carus, eagerly, "yes."

"Where's the villians?" demanded the policeman.

"That is, I might have been robbed," replied the gentleman, after a moment's reflection, for his fall had somewhat sobered him, and he foresaw that it would be unwise to bring an accusation against his cousin which he could not prove. "Did you pass a woman and a boy as you came up?"

"Not a christian sowl, barring a donkey and the fireman's dog," said the policeman, seriously; "but may be your honour will walk to the station, and make your charge afore the inspector."

"Charge!" repeated Carus; "against whom?"

"Them as might have robbed you—sure your honour knows 'em—bad luck to 'em—they are always on the look-out for gentlemen that have had a dhrap too much, and see smarter out of one eye than the other."

"Why, you do not mean to insinuate that I am tipsy?" demanded Carus.

"Sorry I'd be to hint at such a thing," answered the man, with a half serious, half comical air. "I am not like many as is in the force, to take a dirty advantage of a gentleman for being merry, and lock him up, but it's in the commissioners' struitions, and I might get fined for not doing it, but I'll run the risk of it."

The man of pleasure was too well accustomed to adventures of a similar character, not to comprehend what was expected of him. He took the hint; carelessly tossed the speaker half-a-crown; then, gathering his cloak around him, walked on.

"Might have been robbed," repeated the guardian of the peace, with a chuckle, as he stooped to pick up the coin. "He'd be a courageous boy that ud try to rob ye. There's more mischief in them great, staring, black eyes than in a loaded pistol or a peeler's staff. He looks all the world as if he'd murdered a praist; and is no rail born gentleman, for all he is so free with his money; I can tell that by the looks of him, to say nothing of his manners. Spilt salt to him—throwing instead of giving it!"

With these not very complimentary observations on the personal appearance of Carus Kearn, the policeman resumed his beat.

The Irish are keen judges of character, and the man had appreciated him rightly.

Instead of returning to her wretched home, Rachel Markham, in the hope of obtaining assistance for her child, made the best of her way to the house of a neighbour who kept a tobacconist's shop in the York-road. She was a kind-hearted little woman, and had frequently procured the unhappy mother employment at her needle.

Mrs. Tuttle, the person alluded to, had the reputation of being exceedingly well-to-do in the world. If such really were the case, it must have been owing to her own prudence and economy. No one knew the value of a penny better than herself; and yet she was anything but mean. When she gave, she did so with discretion; which, in our opinion, is the wisest part of charity.

Having no family, and her husband being from home all day, Mrs. T., as she was generally designated, had turned her attention to business at an age when many in her position would have thought only of pleasure. Early and late she might be found in her carefully swept shop, seated behind the counter, ready to attend to her customers; or by the fire in the cosy, comfortable back-parlour, which communicated with it by folding-doors.

Although she was, at the period we are writing of, young and exceedingly pretty, scandal, which spares few reputations, had never breathed a syllable against hers. Perhaps for two reasons: first, that her conduct was irreproachable; and secondly, because nature armed her with a quiet sarcastic humour, which, if necessary, she could use most effectively in self-defence. More than one puppy and conceited loungeur have we seen put to flight with well-bred but pointed retorts, which told all the better from her invariably keeping her temper.

We have been thus particular in introducing her to our readers, as in the course of our tale they will have more than one occasion of renewing their acquaintance with her.

Mrs. Tuttle was just thinking of shutting up, when Rachel staggered rather than walked into the shop, with little Mary in her arms.

A frown, for an instant, knit the brows of the mistress of the place; but no sooner did she gaze on the pale, careworn features of her visitor, than it gave place to an expression of benevolent interest. She comprehended that it was weakness and not drink which caused the broken-hearted mother to totter beneath her burden.

"Come into the parlour," she said. "Sit down. What is the matter?"

When anything like an emergency occurred, the speaker was a woman of few words.

"Dead!" sobbed her visitor, as she threw back the shawl which concealed her child. "Dead with cold and hunger—dead in the streets. I begged—begged," she added, with a fresh burst of sorrow, "but no one would listen to my prayer."

Her hearer felt inexpressibly shocked. Her first care, however, was to take the infant in her arms, and commence chafing its half-frozen limbs; her next to ring the bell and direct her niece—a staid young person, who lived with her as a companion and assistant—to warm some milk. By the time it was ready, the little sufferer began to show signs of returning animation.

Rachel sat the while with her eyes fixed intently regarding her; and yet she appeared unconscious of all the kind-hearted woman was doing. Misery had chained even the voice of gratitude, as well as every sense, save sight.

"Give her a glass of wine," said Mrs. Tuttle.

The niece poured one out, and held it to the lips of Rachel, but the intended kindness was unheeded—she made no effort to swallow it.

"Warm it," added her aunt, wiping aside her tears. "Rouse yourself, Mrs. Markham; you must rouse yourself, for your children's sake. This is weak, very weak."

Still there was no reply.

What compassion and well-meant reproof failed to achieve, one little word uttered by her child effected. It broke the horrible spell under which the wife of the drunkard sat enthralled, motionless as a statue. Mary at last unclosed her soft blue eyes, and faintly pronounced the name of "Mother."

As if a spring had been suddenly released, Rachel sprang from her seat, sank upon her knees at the feet of Mrs. Tuttle, on whose lap the little sufferer was still lying, and covered her cheeks with tears and kisses, bound her arms around her, pressed her convulsively to her aching breast, and murmured incoherent thanks to heaven.

"Saved!" she sobbed, "saved! My heart has one treasure left. Both my children are not torn from me. Providence is merciful. And you," she added, grasping the hand of Mrs. Tuttle, "and you its instrument."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed the little woman, who had a very great objection to being thanked for any good she might do, and being for the moment what she called upset. "It's not much use the best of us can be to our fellow-creatures in this world. Say no more about it. Think of the child; she is hungry, and the milk is ready. Sit down," she added, "and take the glass of wine Eliza" (this was the name of her niece) "has made warm for you."

The grateful mother obeyed meekly as an infant might have done, and sat silently watching and mentally blessing her as Mary eagerly partook of the food her benefactress had prepared for her.

Mrs. Tuttle was not the person to perform a kind action by halves. But to complete her act of benevolence it was necessary she should be informed of everything; and she set about obtaining the requisite information in her usual business-like manner.

Having first rocked her charge to sleep, she wrapped her carefully in a warm blanket, and placed her in the arms of her mother, who was far more likely to converse rationally, she considered, with her rescued treasure nestled against her heart: her next care was to send her servant with food and other necessities to the cottage in the Belvedere-road: that done, she gradually drew from her visitor a narrative of all that had taken place. When we say all, we must except the story of the work-box: Rachel could not humiliate the father of her children by relating that.

"Oh, these men—these men!" exclaimed her hearer, when she had concluded; "if the best of them are troublesome at times, what must the bad ones be?—not that I have any reason to complain," she added. "You must be firm, Mrs. Markham—very firm. I should like to catch Mr. T. coming home drunk every night—or, indeed, any night—and plunging me in poverty and distress!"

Now this was the very thing the speaker would not like to have caught her husband at; so it must be set down as an indirect way of expressing her abhorrence of the dissipated conduct of George Markham.

"As for Richard," she continued, "I have no fear of him, though you are quite right to remove him from this neighbourhood as quickly as possible. Richard is honest."

"So young, and in the streets at such an hour!" observed his mother, with a sigh, for with the recovery of Mary, all her fears for the safety of her brother had returned.

"Bad," replied her kind friend, "but not hopeless. He will return, take my word for it; but he must not find you absent."

"I will depart at once," said Rachel, anxiously.

"You will find both fire, light, and food," said Mrs. Tuttle; "and don't let matters come to such extremity again. There, I want no words; I know all that you would say. The servant will carry the child for you. Good night," she added, "or rather good morning, for the new year has commenced already. May it prove a happier, much happier one for you than the past!"

With this kind wish the speaker hastened the departure of her visitor; not that she felt so anxious to get rid of her as to avoid a repetition of thanks and expressions of gratitude which really distressed her to listen to, for it was one of her maxims that kindness should be done for kindness' sake, and not for the empty gratification of hearing oneself praised.

The little woman was right. Would there were more like her in the world.

When Rachel entered her cottage, she gazed around her: the past appeared like some painful dream, till reflection convinced her of its reality. The fire that burnt cheerfully in the grate, seemed to mock the sadness at her heart. Involuntarily she turned towards the trundle bed Richard used to occupy, but it was empty. She had a thousand times rather have found her home cold and desolate, as she had quitted it, and have seen him sleeping there, have received his affectionate kiss, and heard his kind good-night.

Still she did not abandon herself to despair. He might return. Kneeling by the vacant couch, she poured forth a mother's hopes and fears in prayer.

The clock had just struck two when George made his appearance, so completely under the influence of the intoxicating draught, which takes the reason prisoner, leaves manhood a wreck, and mind a blank, that he could only reel into a chair, where he sat gazing vacantly, first at the fire, and then at the woman whose happiness he had destroyed.

Rachel tried to speak to him, but the words faded on her lips, and she felt a sickening sensation approaching to disgust, creeping over her, as she contemplated the ruin dissipation had worked in his once manly form and intellectual features.

It is a dangerous moment when such feelings rise in the heart of a wife: love, and that which is even more lasting than love, respect, hang trembling in the balance—a feather light as the down from the unfledged cygnet's wing, may turn the scale, inclining it to hate.

"What a difference!" she mentally exclaimed; "is this the promise for which I quitted a happy home, risked a father's anger and the loss of friends, the world's respect—all but my own esteem?"

Then the recollection that her parent's harshness had been one, if not the leading, influence in the change she so deeply felt, awakened kindlier feelings, and she sighed as she pronounced his name—

"Poor George!"

The drunkard was breathing heavily. Rachel could not attempt to assist him to his bed, the task was beyond her strength; but with womanly kindness she untied the handkerchief which on quitting the public house he had knotted closely round his neck, placed it on a chair, and listened till his breath came freely.

Her husband looked up in her face and tried to smile; consciousness was struggling with the fiend which had subdued it; the effort lasted but for an instant; his features relaxed into their vacant stare again.

The mother's engrossing thoughts were of her boy. The idea of his wandering in the streets at such an hour, exposed not only to the bitter cold, but to dangers to which the pitiless frost, the piercing wind, the tempest's flash, were mercies, wrung her heart with agony, and she continued to pace the narrow limits of her house, listening at every step, hoping and trusting, but resuming her wearying walk again with increased disappointment. More than once she felt tempted to seek for him herself. It was not the terrors of the night or the inclemency of the season which prevented her, but the utter ignorance of where to look for him.

London is a short word, but it comprises a world—a desert, and a city—a home to those who inhabit it, a wilderness to the unfriended wretch who wanders in its labyrinth.

Rachel had no friends to whom she could apply, and was without the means to employ assistance; and so she remained, counting the weary hours and minutes, hoping, trusting, and praying until day-break.

It was a sad fate for the once happy girl, who had been the light of her father's house, the admiration of encircling friends. Where was that father? He had abandoned her. Where were the friends? All gone; vanished in the hour of trial. True to the world's instincts, they had disappeared like shadows which are only seen in sunshine.

When we say all, there was one exception: the old clerk, Peter Mangles, had neither forgotten nor abandoned her. He had heard of her visit to Blackheath on his return home, and greatly regretted his absence; for he felt assured that nothing but unusual distress, some sudden and severe calamity, could have brought Rachel from her home on such a day to see him.

Much to the annoyance of his housekeeper, whose ways were as methodical as his own, the old man insisted on having breakfast an hour earlier than usual; and having despatched it, instead of waiting for the omnibus to ride into town, as he had done every day for the last thirty years, he actually sent for a fly.

To the remonstrance of the well-meaning woman, who observed that it was a piece of extravagance, he drily replied that he could afford it, and drove off, leaving her overwhelmed with astonishment, and not a little tormented by curiosity.

Suddenly the suspicion struck her that Peter Mangles was going to be married. A thousand little circumstances convinced her that such was the case. He had never breakfasted so early before, never engaged a fly to take him to town; and visions of a mistress, whom it might be difficult, if not impossible to please, calculations on the chances of retaining or losing her place, floated through the brain of Mrs. Lawrence, who could not help thinking that if her master wanted a wife, he need not have gone to London to look for one.

The hour's start which Peter Mangles had gained by this arrangement, enabled him to call at the Belvedere-road, and still be at his usual hour in the city—a point he had never neglected in the memory of the oldest porter in the establishment: in fact, so regular was he, that the clerks would sooner have believed St. Paul's clock to be wrong than the cashier behind his time.

As the vehicle drove rapidly along the road, little did the old man, whose heart was filled with thoughts of charity and kindness, imagine the scene of woe—the utter desolation he was about to witness in the house of her he had known and loved as a child.

But we must reserve the description of it for the succeeding chapter.

CHAPTER VI.

O sacred sorrow, by whom souls are tried!—
Sent not to punish mortals, but to guide—
If thou art mine—and who shall proudly dare
To tell his Maker he has had his share?—
Still let me feel for what thy pangs are sent,
And be my guide, and not my punishment.

CRABBE.

MEANWHILE, we doubt not but our readers feel somewhat impatient to learn what had become of the hero of our tale. As the feeling is too natural to be longer trifled with, we shall at once proceed to inform them.

As the cab into which he had been partly persuaded and partly forced to enter, drove rapidly through the streets, Richard soon ceased to recognise the direction in which they were going, it being evidently a part of the town he was unacquainted with. Several times he thought of calling for assistance, or attempting to escape; but the searching gray eyes of his companion, who watched his every movement, restrained him; and yet there was nothing unkind either in his looks or words: at times he even fancied he could detect glances of kindness and compassion from beneath his bushy eyebrows.

"Where are you taking me to, sir?" he at last demanded. "Oh, this will cause my mother to die with grief."

"I am acting for your good," replied the gentleman, mildly. "The line of duty is not always the most pleasant one, but it leads to happiness in the end."

"Happiness!" repeated his prisoner, with a sigh. "I shall never know the meaning of the word again. Poor mother! poor Mary! starving! Oh, sir! for pity sake, release me. I have never done you any wrong. You cannot find the heart to injure me."

"Injure!" exclaimed the old man, deeply moved. "I tell you again that my purpose is a kind one. I would snatch you, as I have wished and tried to do others, from the misery and shame into which vice has cast them. You blame me now, and deem my proceedings harsh; the day will come when you will bless them."

"Never, sir, never!" cried the youth, indignantly. "They are cruel, cruel in the extreme. I shall always hate you."

"I expect no gratitude," observed the mysterious personage, with a sigh, "and shall not feel disappointed. You cannot change my intentions. Attempt to escape, and I consign you into the hands of justice. You have your choice—submission or a prison."

Nothing further passed on either side till the vehicle drew up in front of a handsome mansion in one of the squares. Lights were seen from the drawing-room window, and the sounds of music heard. Richard looked up with surprise. He imagined that his conductor was taking him to some dreadfully gloomy place, with heaven knows what intention, perhaps to murder him—for he had heard of such things—instead of which, it appeared to him a palace.

A servant, in plain but handsome livery, came to the door of the cab.

"Send your master to me," said the gentleman.

The man disappeared, and in a few minutes the owner of the house came to him. A long and somewhat animated conversation ensued, in a language which our hero would have given worlds, had he possessed them, to understand. At its conclusion, he was directed to descend; for an instant he hesitated, but the stern, determined voice, the recollection that in the event of his refusal a prison awaited him, decided his obedience, and he walked between the two gentlemen into the house, passed through a hall crowded with servants, who stared inquiringly after him; for his dress, though scrupulously clean, bore all the signs of poverty.

At last his conductor stopped at a side door, which the master of the mansion opened with a key.

"Wait," he said, in a kindly tone, "till I have lit the gas."

In less time than it has taken us to describe it, our hero found himself seated with his companions in a comfortably-furnished apartment, the walls of which were covered with plans of estates, charts, maps, and shelves filled with tin cases labelled and with books.

Richard had never before been in a lawyer's office, or he must at once have recognised the peculiar features of the place. As it was, he gazed around him with a bewildered air. No wonder that he did so; the adventures of the night might have puzzled an older head and clearer brain than his to comprehend them.

"I have already told you the circumstances under which I found this boy," observed the old man, breaking the silence; "you will ascertain in the morning whether his tale be true or false. Not that I doubt it," he added, with a sigh, "but there must be no error on the subject."

"Certainly not," answered the gentleman.

"If true," resumed the speaker, "explain to him my intentions in his favour. I leave him in your care," he added, "certain that he will be kindly treated, and carefully watched to prevent escape."

"This is tyranny!" exclaimed the boy, impetuously. "By what right, sir, do you detain me from my parents?"

"You hear him, Morton," said the man whom he regarded as his persecutor.

"At least, I know the name of one of you!" observed Richard Markham.

"Hush!" interrupted the gentleman whom he had just heard addressed by the name of Morton; "the right you question is not only that of the strong against the weak, but of justice against one accused of crime."

"I am innocent!"

"That can only be proved by a public trial," observed the lawyer; "and before trial comes the prison and its contaminating influence, its shame and stain. This is a disgrace we wish to spare you: act wisely, and do not attempt to disappoint the efforts of your friends."

"Friends!" repeated Richard, in a contemptuous tone; "but I have done. I am in your hands; as you act by me, so heaven will judge you."

"Amen," said the old man, in a fervent tone; and without pronouncing another word he took his leave.

For some time after his departure Mr. Morton regarded his new acquaintance in silence. He was naturally a kindly disposed man—the father also of a family—and the frank, open countenance of the youth pleased and interested him. Ringing the bell, he directed the servant who answered it to bring a tray with refreshment, and to prepare a room for his unexpected visitor.

"At the top of the house," he added, as the man quitted the room to execute his orders.

"You are tired," he said, as soon as our hero had done justice to the good things set before him. "In the morning we will speak further together, and anything I can do, consistently with my word to my client, who is a most excellent, although somewhat singular man, to relieve your anxiety respecting your mother and sister, I will."

There was something in the voice as well as the words of the speaker which convinced his hearer that he was speaking truthfully, and he looked up in his face and faintly smiled.

That night, or rather morning, Richard Markham slept in a luxurious bed for the first time in his life, or rather, we should have said, rested in one; for it was long, very long, ere sleep closed his aching eyelids; and when it came at last, pale faces haunted his troubled dreams, and tearful eyes seemed watching him.

More than once he leaned upon his pillow, and murmured the names of "Mother—Mary."

We must now leave him for awhile, and return to the house where his absence was so deeply mourned.

George Markham had sufficiently recovered from his fit of drunkenness to retire to the inner room of the cottage to rest; and his wife, pale and haggard from mental as well as bodily suffering, and weary watching of the night, was engaged in preparing breakfast for herself and Mary, when the fly drew up at the door.

The mother's first thought was of her son, and she sprang to open it, fondly believing some kind, pitying hand had led the lost one back to her.

An involuntary sigh of disappointment escaped her as she recognised her last friend, Peter Mangles, whom, at any other time, she would have rejoiced to meet.

"Why, Rachel," said the old man, somewhat mortified, "you don't seem very glad to see me, and yet I have called at some slight inconvenience, thinking you might require my aid. It was not my fault that I was from home," he added; "you know I take but few holidays."

There was something so wo-begone, so utterly wretched in the look with which she regarded him, that Peter's heart reproached him for having spoken unkindly. Something dreadful, he saw, had taken place; so, telling the driver to wait, he entered the cottage. It was the first time he had visited it, and its comfortless, desolate appearance sent a chill through his frame.

"What has occurred?" he asked, as soon as Mrs. Markham had seated herself.

The distracted mother could only pronounce the name of her son.

"Ill?" said her visitor

"Lost!" murmured Rachel; "lost to me, I fear, for ever."

It was not without considerable difficulty, for the narrative was broken by tears and sobs, that the clerk drew from her the sad story of Richard's disappearance, and her own sufferings.

"Bad," he said, "very bad, but not hopeless. Nothing is lost in London if people only set the right way about recovering it: we will soon find the boy again. And as for that rascal Carus, I never regretted till this moment that I refused a share in the firm."

"Speak not of the wretch," replied the anxious mother; "it is of Richard that I am thinking: were he restored to me—could I once more fold him to my heart—"

The words were interrupted by the appearance of a neighbour, a bustling, ignorant, but well-meaning woman, who had heard of the disappearance of our hero.

"O, Mrs. Markham!" she exclaimed; "sad news, sad news!"

Rachel turned, if possible, paler than before.

"I can feel for you," added the speaker. "I've had trouble enough with my own children, but nothing to equal yours."

"Do speak out," cried the old clerk, impetuously; "you are more provoking than a bankruptcy."

The woman bridled up; she had come with a kind intention, and did not understand being addressed so harshly.

"Well, then, I got it all out of that young rascal Jack Manders; he is at the bottom of every mischief."

"You are killing her," interrupted Peter Mangles.

"Richard has been taken up for picking pockets!"

Rachel uttered a piercing scream, and fell senseless from her chair.

Terrified at the sight, little Mary began to cry bitterly, and call to father that mamma was dying. The noise roused the half-sobered drunkard from his sleep, and he came staggering into the room with a bewildered air. At the sight of his former friend he started back, feeling the full force of his degradation, though not of his misery.

"What! what is the matter?" he demanded, rubbing his blood-shot eyes.

Peter pointed sternly to the inanimate form of his wife.

"For heaven's sake, explain!" added the wretched man.

"You have murdered her!" pronounced the old man, solemnly; "driven your boy to theft—to shame—to a prison! George, George! are these the hopes I once entertained of you?"

The guilty husband threw himself by the side of the inanimate form of his unhappy wife; implored her to look up to bless him, but with a look or word; madly cursed himself as the cause of all her misery: then called frantically upon his son, whom his misconduct had urged to crime.

It was a fearful scene. The iron of remorse had entered into the very heart of the drunkard, and wounded the only part of it his debasing vice had left uncorrupted—the love he still felt for his wife and children.

"It's no use bawling now the mischief's done," tartly observed the woman who had brought the fatal intelligence. "The only comfort you can bring her is news of her poor boy. I know what a mother's feelin's is. Poor thing—poor thing!" she added, kneeling by her side, and chafing her hands and forehead.

In our experiences of life we have frequently had occasion to remark the strong feeling of sympathy which unites the poor, how willing they are to assist each other by offices of kindness, when other means are denied them. The speaker meant well, and was far from suspecting the mischief her inconsiderate manner had occasioned. To one of her own class the shock might have proved less severe; to a delicate organisation like Rachel's, it was all but fatal.

Slowly the sufferer unclosed her eyes and gazed vacantly around till she encountered the glance of her husband, when a convulsive shudder ran through her frame, and she relapsed into insensibility, for the sense of misery returned with the sight of him who had occasioned it.

George Markham caught up his hat, and rushed like a madman from the cottage, resolved to search London over till he had obtained tidings of his son.

Peter Mangles looked around him for an instant with an air of utter helplessness. In the intensity of his feelings, even the city, the astonishment and uneasiness his absence would cause to the firm, were forgotten, everything but the state of Rachel. He could not leave her in that desolate abode, the child who had sat a hundred times upon his knees, the fair girl whose affectionate smile had so frequently welcomed him in her father's house; no—his mind was made up, and he proceeded to act at once, for he had always looked upon decision, not only as a great moral, but business-like virtue.

With the assistance of the neighbour, who had not quite forgiven his pronouncing her to be more provoking than a bankruptcy, he wrapped the sufferer in a shawl and deposited her safely in the fly, placed Mary beside her, got in himself, and ordered the driver to return to Blackheath.

"But what will her husband say when he returns?" demanded the astonished woman.

"What he pleases," answered Peter. "If he has neglected his duty, I know mine."

"And the neighbours? People will talk, and—"

The old clerk drew up the glass of the carriage impatiently, and directed the coachman to drive on; leaving the astonished speaker dumbfounded at such a summary mode of proceeding.

The event caused quite a sensation in the Belvedere-road. Some of the neighbours pronounced Peter Mangles to be no less a person than the great city merchant, who had forgiven and taken away his daughter. Others suspected that she had been carried off by some less reputable character, and blamed their informant—after they had drawn everything out of her—for not having called the police.

Like the old man with the ass in the fable, the woman consoled herself with the reflection that it was impossible to please every one. She had done her best, and the wisest can do no more.

The housekeeper at Ledger Cottage—the name of Peter Mangles's suburban abode—was greatly surprised when the fly once more drove up to the door. Seeing a female in it, her suspicions were confirmed; and she hastened, as she thought, to receive her new mistress.

"Well!" she exclaimed, "you have brought her home?"

"Of course I have. Take the child."

"Child?" repeated the astonished Mrs. Lawrence.

"Well!"

"What is the woman staring at?" demanded her master, as he placed Mary in her arms. "Get the best room ready; I expect the doctor directly."

The respectable old lady felt more and more puzzled to comprehend the affair; which, in her private opinion, began to wear rather an ugly appearance, although she charitably hoped that her master was really married.

Pursing up her lips, she asked him, demurely, "If she could assist Mrs. Mangles?"

"Mrs. who?" cried the astonished Peter.

"Mrs. Mangles, sir."

"You are a fool, Mrs. Lawrence," solemnly pronounced her master; "there is no such being, either in esse or in posse."

This was the only occasion Peter had ever been known to tamper with the Latin tongue, which, truth to say, he looked upon with greater suspicion than even on Pennsylvanian bonds or other questionable securities.

"I don't know about her being a posse," retorted the angry housekeeper, "but it's my belief she is no better than she should be."

"Few of us are," observed the old gentleman, sarcastically; "few of us are."

Removing the scarcely conscious Rachel from the carriage, he bore her, with the assistance of the driver, into the house; Mrs. Lawrence following, overwhelmed with confusion at the ridiculous error into which she had fallen. To make amends for it—she was really a kind-hearted woman—she began to busy herself by attending to her unexpected guest, whom she succeeded in getting to bed before the arrival of the physician, who was still in the chamber of his patient when Mr. Bently drove up, alarmed at the unusual absence of his confidential clerk, cashier, and friend.

"Are you ill, Mangles?" he demanded, as he entered the little parlour where the former was anxiously waiting the report of the medical man.

"Ill! No," replied Peter, tartly.

His employer regarded him with surprise.

"Yes, I am ill," added the speaker; "sick at heart; and all through you, Richard. I ought to have let you years since—years since. I was a fool I didn't."

"What has occurred to excite this humour?" inquired the merchant.

"What has occurred!" repeated the clerk. "What has not occurred, and all through your unforgiving temper! It's a pleasant list. I'll run over the items to you. First, your son-in-law, whom you ought to have assisted, is a hopeless drunkard."

"Curse him!" interrupted Mr. Bently, warmly. "He has destroyed my happiness."

"You destroyed it yourself, Richard," observed the old man, mournfully. "Next, his son, named after you—they had better have called him Peter, for I shall leave him all I possess—has been taken up for pocket-picking."

The proud spirit of the man of wealth was deeply wrung, and he uttered a suppressed groan.

"That did not come from your heart, Richard," continued the speaker,—"I wish it had; but from your pride. The worst is not told. Your daughter Rachel, the only child of one of the richest men in the city, was last night reduced to beg for charity. And whom do you imagine she asked it of? Her cousin Carus. The heartless scoundrel not only bade her starve, but heaped reproaches and insult on her innocent head."

"The ruffian!"

"Aye, ruffian is the word. I am afraid it is not the worst name he merits."

"What mean you?"

"It does not signify what I mean," replied Peter, pettishly. "You will find it all out in time. I've only suspicions, and—no, no. Without proof an honest man should not speak ill even of an enemy."

"But my child! You spoke of my child?"

"She is dying, I fear," replied her benefactor.

"Dying!" exclaimed the conscience-stricken parent. "Oh, let me fly to her. I have been too harsh, perhaps,—too unrelenting."

"Fly," repeated Peter Mangles, as Mr. Bently was about to quit the room in order to regain his carriage, "and where would you fly to? I wish, Richard, you would not express yourself in so unbusinesslike a manner. To talk of flying, is like hinting at a bankruptcy; and I can answer there is no fear of that."

"My child! my suffering child!"

"And do you imagine that I left the daughter of my oldest friend," resumed the clerk, "in her abode of poverty and sorrow? No! I brought her back with me. She is here, Richard, here, under my roof, and shall never quit it unless for a happier one; or the grave," added the old man, calmly, "or the grave!"

"I must see her!"

"Not to reproach her," observed the old clerk, fervently.

"Reproach her! you will drive me mad," replied the merchant; "but I forgive you, for you have never been a father."

"Thank goodness, not," said Peter, complacently. "I have had trouble, maybe, to keep your ledgers in order. Heaven knows how I should have managed with a family."

As they were about to leave the little parlour to visit Rachel—for, in the emotion of one and the joy of the other at the prospect of a reconciliation, neither of them had calculated on the effect of a surprise—the speakers fortunately encountered the physician, who at once forbade their visit.

"But I am her father," urged Mr. Bently.

"Head of the firm of the name of Bently in the city," added the owner of Ledger Cottage, by way of introducing them.

"I am sorry," said the man of science, "to repeat my prohibition, but the state of my patient is most critical; the least emotion, either of joy, surprise, or sorrow, may produce a fatal effect."

"Is there hope?" demanded Mr. Bently.

The physician paused, as if to measure the amount of consolation his words were to convey.

"There is hope," he said; "but it is so slight, a breath would almost break it. In four-and-twenty hours I shall be able to speak more positively."

Neither Peter Mangles nor his employer quitted Ledger Cottage that day; the former crept about the house as stealthily as a cat, and even banished his favourite parrot to a neighbour's house, lest its talking should disturb his suffering guest.

At night the father and friend of Rachel were not the only watchers. Her guilty but repentant husband haunted the Heath like some unquiet spirit, walking before the house he dared not enter, for his hope of recovering his son, or of obtaining intelligence of him had failed, and conscience whispered him it was the only plea on which he might trust for forgiveness. A few hours had made him an altered man. He now beheld his conduct in all its deformity, and shuddered at the picture.

Frequently in the long hours of the night, as he stood gazing at the windows watching every shadow that crossed the blinds, he would wring his half-frozen hands, and mutter the words—"Too late! too late!"

Such were the promptings of his despair, the outpourings of his lacerated heart. But who shall presume to repeat the self-accusing sinner's words, and say the angel of repentance had overshadowed him too late?

The following morning, the physician pronounced a slight amelioration in the state of his patient, which Peter Mangles no sooner heard, than he prepared to set out for the city. Two days' absence from his books and accounts were more than any reason, short of the death of his protégée, could have justified. He was naturally of a hopeful disposition, and trusted for the best.

As he walked briskly over the Heath, in order to catch the omnibus—for he had sent to prevent its calling, as usual, at his door—the husband of Rachel stood before him, so wo-begone, so wretched, that the kind old clerk had not the courage to reproach him.

"A word; only one, sir, for mercy sake!" exclaimed the unhappy man. "My wife! I have been watching all night at her window. Do speak to me; my heart is almost broken!"

"The doctor thinks she is better, George; that with care, great care, she may recover."

"Thank heaven! Then I have not murdered her. Her death is not upon my soul, as well as the ruin of my poor boy."

"Have you heard any tidings of him?"

"None," groaned the penitent father, "none. I have inquired at every police-station, haunted every court, each den of vice I can think of, but he is nowhere to be found."

"Out all night," thought his hearer, with a glance of compassion; "and such a night, too. Here, George," he added, speaking aloud, "you must require some refreshment."

The husband of Rachel pressed his hand, but refused the proffered gift.

"Henceforth," he said, "the bread I eat shall be the bread of industry. It's not pride. Oh, believe me, it is not pride—that has long since been crushed—but the stern resolve of a repentant man to redeem, if possible, his sullied name; to win the forgiveness of the angel he has wronged; to die with the consciousness that his poor children will not curse the memory of their father."

"There's hope in him yet," exclaimed Peter Mangles, as George Markham walked rapidly away from him. "I always said there was, for, when a boy, I invariably found his petty cash book right; more," he added, "than I could ever say for that precious rascal Carus."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

DURING the last week I have been looking through—thanks to the courtesy of the Editor—a large pile of correspondence. All sorts of questions are asked upon every subject, and prompt answers are required. The answers, I have no doubt, will be given as speedily as possible, although it needs no argument to prove that every correspondent cannot be answered first.

Well: in looking through the mass of epistolary writing submitted to me, I could not help noticing that a large majority of the writers were either ill-informed as to the proper mode of inditing, or were otherwise very careless as to how they wrote. Some of them used no points—left punctuation entirely to the reader's discretion; others adopted a stilted mode of correspondence, quite unfit for the subject in hand, and exhausted paper and patience in a round-about way of expressing the simplest idea.

Under these circumstances, I have endeavoured to furnish my young readers with some plain practical instructions in the art of writing; and I begin with

PUNCTUATION.

A letter without points is almost unintelligible; a letter mis-pointed conveys an opposite meaning—if it conveys any at all—from that intended by the writer. In punctuation, as in spelling, there is some diversity in the practice of writers and printers, but there are general rules to which all subscribe.

The points used are as follow—

The period	?	The semicolon	;
The interrogation	?	The comma	,
The exclamation	!	The dash	—
The colon	:	The parenthesis	()

The word period means a circuit, or circle.

1. It is placed at the end of a declarative or imperative sentence; as "Spring is beautiful. Go in peace."

2. It is placed after abbreviations. Thus, MS. for Manuscript.

The mark of interrogation is placed at the end of an interrogative sentence; as, "Is not the innocence of childhood sweet?"

THE EXCLAMATION!—This mark is used after an exclamatory sentence; as, "Alas, unhappy child!"

THE COLON:—This mark is somewhat troublesome to the pupil.

1. The colon is used within a sentence, and separates those parts that make full sense, when the connecting word is left out. Thus, "The promise is broad: it has no condition."

2. It is used after the words following, as follows, thus, when they introduce anything. Thus: "A tear may wait on joy." He answered as follows: "I am a man."

THE SEMICOLON;—The semicolon is also a troublesome mark.

1. It is used within a sentence, and separates the parts that make full sense, when the connecting word is present. Thus: "We know enough; and our hearts are not with you."

2. It is placed before as when it introduces an instance. Thus: "An animal has senses; as the fly."

THE COMMA,—The comma is used in many cases. These, however, can be readily learned.

1. It separates pairs of words.

Example. "Hope and fear, joy and grief, come and go."

2. It takes the place of an omitted word.

Example. "Robert is wise, just, and prudent."

3. It separates words used to explain each other

Example. "Socrates, the philosopher."

4. It is placed after a long member of a sentence, when something is said of it.

Example. "A careful love of nature, will be rewarded."

5. It separates parts expressing some circumstance.

Examples. "Life, however, is valuable. In the morning, awake to duty. The man, whom you loved, is dead."

THE DASH — The dash is used when the sentence breaks off without completing the sense.

Example. "The exile—his tears are dried."

THE PARENTHESIS () The parenthesis separates an incidental word or phrase.

Example. "The home of the poor man (home, did I say?) was the abode of oppression."

THE COMMA, SEMICOLON, AND COLON.—These are the only stops that present any difficulty to the pupil. Their use may be illustrated.

THE COMMA.—"Wisdom hath builded her house, and killed her fatlings."

THE SEMICOLON.—"Wisdom hath builded her house; and she hath killed her fatlings."

THE COLON.—"Wisdom hath builded her house: she hath killed her fatlings."

Attention to these rules is most important. Correct punctuation, though very rare, is exceedingly necessary. The omission, or misuse, of points in writing as clearly involves grammatical error as does the false collocation of words, and as inevitably involves the writer's ideas in obscurity.

NATURALNESS.

Rules and specific directions are useful in their places, and therefore we have given you a few of them; but, at the best, they but imperfectly interpret Nature's unerring laws of order, and are fallible, and subject to perplexing exceptions. If you can make yourself master of the principles which underlie them, you may forget the rules as soon as you please. Till you can do this you will find them useful, provided you do not allow them to enslave you. Strive to be correct and methodical, but not stiff and formal. All writing, to be satisfactory, must be natural. Do not, therefore, aim at any set or special phraseology. Imitate no model. Study good authors, for the improvement of your own style, and not for the acquisition of theirs. What is natural in them may be constrained and laboured in you. Be yourself—be natural.

LONG SENTENCES.

Unpractised writers should avoid long sentences. They are not easily managed, and are apt to get involved or entangled.

A violation of this rule is the source of much of the inelegant and ungrammatical writing with which we meet. A writer commences a sentence, without having the whole clearly fixed in his mind, and goes on adding clause after clause, loosely linked together with "buts" and "ands," till at last, instead of having expressed his thought, he has involved it in utter obscurity.

TAUTOLOGY.

Avoid the repetition of the same sense in different words, as well as the needless repetition of the same words. For instance, do not say, "The nefarious wickedness of his conduct," because that would be the same as saying, "The extremely wicked wickedness," &c.; nor, "We returned back again;" for "We returned" fully expresses your meaning.

ADJECTIVES.

Young writers are prone to use adjectives too lavishly, and to put too many of them in the superlative degree. These qualifying or describing words lose force by multiplication; and if you make everything you describe the grandest, sublimest, most beautiful, most lovely, most delightful, most exquisite, or most splendid, you can no longer express the difference, in degree of grandeur, beauty, and so forth, between different objects.

FIGURES OF SPEECH.

Comparisons, metaphors, and other figures of speech, when correctly used, add much to the beauty of a literary composition; but the young writer should use them cautiously, and with good judgment. A broken metaphor may disfigure a whole essay.

FIGURES OF ARITHMETIC.

Numbers, except dates and sums of money, should generally be expressed in words. In legal documents, sums of money should be expressed in words, and sometimes in both words and figures. Never write, "I have been in this town 3 days;" nor, "There are 25 pear-trees in my father's orchard."

CONTRACTIONS.

Never use the character &, except in the titles of firms; as, Smith & Jones, and even there the word and, written out in full, looks better. Contractions in general are to be avoided. The economy of time and space secured by their use, hardly compensates for the mutilated appearance of the words, and the liability to error involved. Don't, can't, isn't, and other contractions of the same class, are allowable in familiar letters, and where familiar conversation is quoted, but not in any graver style.

READING.

You may learn much by reading good authors, with particular reference to style. Read slowly and carefully, observing constantly what kind of words are used, and whose style pleases you. I can hardly advise on this point, because tastes and capacities differ, and the style best adapted to serve the purpose of one might be studied with but little advantage by another. Addison, Johnson, Macaulay, Brougham, Wilson (Kit North), Thackeray, are all worthy of study, for their style; but, I repeat, beware of imitating those authors, or anybody else. Have a style of your own.

LAST, BUT NOT LEAST.

But neither my rules, directions, and hints, nor the study of grammar and rhetoric, nor the reading of good authors, nor all these together, will make you a good writer without persevering practice. Writing is a great and noble art, and, like all other arts, requires time and labour for its acquisition. It is cheaply purchased at the expense of years of study and practice. But you may write all your lifetime, and continue to improve to the last; though your style, like your handwriting, is liable to grow worse instead of better, if you allow yourself to fall into negligent and careless habits. Study, read, and, above all, write.

LITTLE BY LITTLE.

"Little by little," an acorn said,
As it slowly sank in its mossy bed;
"I am improving every day,
Hidden deep in the earth away."
Little by little, each day it grew;
Little by little, it sipped the dew;
Downward it sent out a threadlike root;
Up in the air sprang a tiny shoot.
Day after day, and year after year,
Little by little, the leaves appear;
And the slender branches spread far and wide,
Till the mighty oak is the forest's pride.

Far down in the depths of the dark blue sea
An insect train work ceaselessly;
Grain by grain, they are building well,
Each one alone in its little cell.
Moment by moment, and day by day,
Never stopping to rest or to play,
Rocks upon rocks they are rearing high,
Till the top looks out on the sunny sky;
The gentle wind and the balmy air,
Little by little, bring verdure there;
Till the summer sunbeams gaily smile
On the buds and flowers of the coral isle.

"Little by little," said a thoughtful boy,
"Moment by moment, I'll well employ,
Learning a little every day,
And not spending all my time in play.
And still this rule in my mind shall dwell,
'Whatever I do, I will do it well.'"

Little by little, I'll learn to know
The treasured wisdom of long ago;
And one of these days perhaps we'll see
That the world will be the better for me.
And do not you think that this simple plan
Made him a wise and a useful man?

NO TIME FOR READING.

"WHAT are you looking at, Arthur?" inquired Mrs. Merritt, as she raised her head and found her brother's eyes fixed intently upon her.

"I was remarking your industry. Do you devote the whole of your time to needlework?"

"When I am not attending to other duties, I am never destitute of needlework. There is so much to be done in a family," resumed Mrs. Merritt, stitching away faster than ever, and not noticing the peculiar expression on Mr. Warren's face. She considered his observation rather a compliment than otherwise, but at the same time wondered why he had never remarked the fact of her industry before.

"What are you reading now?" he asked, after a short pause.

"What am I reading? Nothing particular that I know of; I cannot possibly get time. Oh, upon a second thought, I did read a sketch last week; but I glanced over it so hurriedly that I'm sure I can't tell now what it was about."

"Do you always read hurriedly?"

"I am obliged to do so, when I read at all; but to be candid, I don't trouble books and papers much."

"You have no taste for reading, I presume?"

"On the contrary, I am very fond of it; but you know it takes up so much time, and I really have not a minute to spare. With my sewing, visiting, shopping, and family cares, I have no leisure. Some people put out their needlework, but I think it a needless expense," said Mrs. Merritt.

"You do no unnecessary needlework, I suppose?"

"Oh no, indeed!"

"If I may be so bold, what are you making now?"

"This is an apron for Lizzie, as you may readily see."

"But could she not wear it without such a quantity of trimming?" queried Mr. Warren, looking at the diminutive article the lady was working upon.

"I suppose she could; but it would look very plain, and I do so like trimming and embroidery on children's clothes," said the lady, glancing admiringly on the pretty vine her fingers had formed on the delicate goods.

"How much time does it require to embroider an article like that?"

"Why, how inquisitive you are to-day, Arthur! But if you must know, I presume it would take quite a day to do it thoroughly, or, at least, in the way I should like it to be done."

"You have allowed that it is unnecessary to embroider it at all; and have furthermore added that a day is required in which to complete the important work. Now, would it not be wiser and better to spend the time named in reading some instructive work?" asked the gentleman, looking earnestly at his sister.

"In some cases, it might," was her reply; "but you must recollect that I do not embroider all the time; I generally have plain sewing in my hands."

"You have rather evaded my question. Supposing you get but eight hours' reprieve from plain sewing in a week; you can certainly devote it to that purpose, if you please," he added, with a good-humoured smile.

"You make a great story out of a little matter, brother Arthur," returned the lady, colouring. "Eight hours a week are hardly worth taking advantage of."

"Let us look about and see if we cannot increase the number. Here are six chair-seats, all embroidered by yourself; and yonder are two small and three large pictures, which originated from the same source. How long did it take you to accomplish these?"

"I really cannot tell; I do not know."

"But you can form some estimate?" persisted Mr. Warren, who seemed determined to gain his point.

"Well, perhaps the leisure time of a year," said Mrs. Merritt, after a short pause.

"And that, allowing eight hours a week, would make four hundred and sixteen hours in a year. That sounds much larger than our first calculation, does it not, Julia? Just think how many books you could read in that period. You would not always be obliged to put in the plea of 'sewing which must be done,' when I invite you to accompany me on some of my charitable visits, where a woman's judgment and penetration are so much superior to those of a man. You could also devote more time for music, and, in addition, not feel obliged to give up an interesting and agreeable correspondence with distant friends, for want of time to write. Am I not a good calculator, my dear sister?"

Mrs. Merritt did not reply; she did not like to own that her brother had the best side of the argument, though her better perception told her that he had.

"I like to look at embroidery," he continued. "Beautiful colours are always agreeable to the eye, and the employment denotes industry, ingenuity, and perseverance; but that is no sign that it should be carried to excess. Pictures in worsted look very well; but your own good sense will tell you that it requires very little talent to produce them. Any lady, who understands the stitch which is used, and can make a good selection of colours—which is easily learned—can do what demands no superior genius or uncommon ability to perform. Am I right or wrong in this? Pray encourage me a little," he added, laughingly.

"Well, I don't suppose it requires any extraordinary talent to work pictures," replied the lady, after some hesitation.

"Thank you for the admission; now for something else. Here are four curtain tassels tied up very nicely in little bags. I dare say you consider the latter ornaments, do you not?"

"There are different opinions on that point; but, admitting they are not ornamental, they are certainly useful, for they prevent the tassels from being faded," added Mrs. Merritt, with an air that indicated her consciousness of being right that time.

"But was it necessary to ruffle them in so tasteful a manner?" was the next grave inquiry.

"I have no patience with you, Arthur!" exclaimed the lady, laughing, in spite of herself. "I never knew that gentlemen noticed such trivial things."

"Then you have something still to learn. When a lady asserts that she has no time to spare for reading or charitable visits, or a correspondence which she is well able to carry on, I invariably endeavour to find out what employs her all her hours. If I see her working worsted pictures, embroidering numberless articles with patience worthy a better cause, trimming children's clothes, which look a great deal better—in my old bachelor estimation—perfectly plain, ruffling bags to put curtain tassels in, manufacturing tall vases out of tiny shells, braiding rag carpets—which are not needed, and which cannot certainly lay claim to beauty—I think that she has mistaken her vocation; that she does not carry out her principles; in fact, that she is inconsistent. What think you, sister mine?"

"I have not thought about it at all."

"Just as I supposed; but if you will reflect upon the subject, you will see the justness of my conclusions. Where there is a will, there is a way; and if you really like reading, I think you can find time to indulge in that highly intellectual employment."

Mrs. Merritt made no rejoinder, but looked thoughtful, as her brother ceased speaking. She mused long upon his suggestions, and the sequel proved that they were not wholly lost upon her. She did not entirely resign fancy work; but before she gave herself up to its fascinations, she made sure that nothing more important demanded her attention.

The Matron.

NO. II.

I HOPE that no male reader of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER will look at the present article with any degree of dissatisfaction, or that he will think of tossing the number aside with a "Pshaw! what have I to do with baby-linen, long clothes, or frilled caps? Surely the Paper might be filled with more important matters than these!" Can any be so selfish as not to allow their wives—their "better halves"—one page, once a fortnight, for matters in which they, at least, feel a deep interest, and which they know, also, to be most important? And what is to become of the comfort of their children, of their health and development, physical and mental, if matrons do not, now and then, tender their advice, and the result of their experience, to those who are just beginning to feel their responsibilities, and who will gladly receive assistance? And what medium for such communications can be more suitable than the FAMILY PAPER? Bear with the matron, then, ye "lords of the creation," if an attempt be made to render your "little resemblances" some slight benefit, in which, by the way, you will yourselves be, eventually, sharers.

I am about to furnish some plain and simple directions as to cutting and contriving children's clothing; commencing with a baby's wardrobe. These, however, I shall preface with a few general remarks.

There are two objects which every mother ought to have in view, while preparing clothing for children: first, the health and comfort of the child; and, secondly, its pleasing appearance. The first, of course, is the most important; but I see no reason whatever why the second should be overlooked. In fact, I think it is as much the duty of a mother to dress her children as pleasantly as her means will permit, as it is to cultivate their intellects, their tempers, and their affections. The latter can only be done by degrees; the former should be attended to from the first moment of their appearance in the world.

Do not suppose that I am an advocate for fine dressing, much less for that which is showy and lavish; and certainly not for that which is expensive, or, at least, unsuitable to the position of the parents. There is a style of dress which is chaste and simple, which renders an infant an agreeable object, and which is appreciable by every beholder, impressing them with the most favourable opinion of the taste and carefulness of the mother. And this, I am prepared to show, can be done at a moderate cost.

Unless the means of the parent are ample, it is more desirable to use cheap materials, and plenty of them, than fine materials and a scanty quantity. Cleanliness is essential to health, as well as to appearance; and to secure this there ought to be a sufficient supply of every article of clothing for a daily change.

Ease and freedom should be consulted, and everything likely to produce irritation should be carefully avoided. Remember that a child is constantly growing, and that its clothes should be so made as that it may be able to move every limb freely. The throat, arm-holes, and wrists of dresses should be made so that they can readily be let out. Tight-fitting garments are apt to absorb the insensible perspiration, instead of allowing it free exit; and this frequently induces diseases of the skin. Pins should be used as sparingly as possible; indeed, it is better not to use them at all. Buttons and tape are best; but the buttons should be flat, and the tapes should be soft, so that the things may not cause any hard lumps. The fretfulness of children is often complained of; but as this is not natural to a healthy child, and as it is much to be deprecated, the mother, instead of being fretful or angry, should examine the dress of the child, and see if its uneasiness does not arise from some overtight string, or bent button, or hard wrinkle. A rectification of these causes of annoyance will do far more good than all the shakings, and angry looks, and "Oh, you cross creatures!" in the world.

When an infant seems more than usually delicate, or when the weather is very cold, flannel gowns, completely covering even the hands and feet, will be found necessary. For this purpose the flannel should be fine. Where this is not at hand, a sheet of fine wadding, wrapped round the infant, may answer the purpose.

For a new-born infant every article of dress should be white. The materials will, of course, differ, according to the circumstances of the parent; but those I name will be suitable in any family of the middle classes. For shirts and nightcaps, fine linen, though cambric muslin is more commonly employed; for night-dresses and petticoats, fine long-cloth; for morning-gowns, striped, fancy, or haircord muslin. Some articles may be obtained cheaper ready-made than they can be made at home, especially those which cannot be made without cutting to waste; as hoods, &c. Else, I always fancy that a mother looks with peculiar pleasure upon articles which she has made with her own hands, or which have been made by members of her own family.

THE FIRST SHIRT should be made of fine linen, or cambric muslin. Each shirt is twenty-three inches wide, and eleven inches long; it will, therefore, take one yard and seven-eighths to make six, without the sleeves.

The sleeves are made in one single piece, cut somewhat in half-handkerchief form, joined on the shoulder. The engraving shows the way in which the straight piece forming the shirt is cut. The neatest way of joining the shoulders is to hem both edges, and sew a lace footing between them; or they may have a double line of stitching. When sewed and felled, however neatly, the edges are apt to be hard. The sleeves should be sewed and felled in, and every other part finished in a very narrow hem. The sleeves may be trimmed with a little lace edging, and the slits finished with button-hole stitches, to prevent them from tearing down.

THE FIRST NIGHT-DRESS should be made of fine, long cloth. Choose a wide one; tear off three pieces, each thirty-three inches long, to make two gowns; slit one down the middle to make the two backs; from each of the others take two gores, sloping from one and one and a half to seven and a half inches. Cut these so that the narrow parts both come off the same end of the cloth; join the gores to the half-breadth, and then run and fell the sides, leaving rather more than four inches at the top for the arm-hole. Slope a little piece off at each shoulder, which join like the seams, and slit down an opening, in the middle of the back, ten inches long; this should be done with a narrow hem on one side, and a wide one on the other, the latter fastened over the former at the bottom, with a double row of stitching. The sleeves should be cut a little longer on one side, from shoulder to wrist, than on the other, to allow for them to be slightly frilled in at the elbow. The bottom of the sleeve must be rounded, so that, when turned back, it may form a cuff; as the infant grows, this can be let down. The sleeve may be eight inches long from the top of the shoulder, where it will be eight inches wide; six inches will be width enough at the wrist. All sleeves should be cut on the cross. The top of the gown may be simply hemmed, after being sloped, and white work sewed at the top. The wrist is formed by gathering in the front at four and five inches from the top of the hem; stroke down the gathers, and sew on the insertion, which will look pretty if lined with pink. Long strings of the same cloth are to be sewed at the extremities of the work, to tie round the wrist. The strings may be torn off the remaining piece before the sleeves are cut out. There is plenty of neat lace to be obtained at trifling cost, which will do nicely for children's night-dresses.

THE NIGHT-CAP should be made of fine linen, or French cambric. The borders may be of plain cambric, or have a neat edging sewn upon them. The crown of the cap should measure from an inch and a half to two inches across, and will look very pretty worked in crochet or embroidery. The cap is composed of three pieces—the crown, the head, and the neck. The head-piece should be ten inches long, and five inches deep; the neck-piece four inches; and three-quarters by two inches; it must be joined to the other part to form a round; in this the crown must be set. The head-piece is then slightly sloped, to shorten it towards the ears. There are, as will be seen from the engraving, six runnings, set two and two, with fine bobbin in them; these bobbins should draw at the end, and not at the top of the head. The frills should be set on, one behind the other. I am aware that there are differences of opinion among mothers as to the propriety of infants wearing caps. Extremes should be avoided. Some of the best medical authorities recommend the use of caps for the first month or two at least, especially for children born late in the autumn or winter. In some cases, and in very cold weather, and till the hair begins to grow, a small square of fine flannel, or of fine linen, may be laid on the top of the head before putting on the cap, just tacking it slightly to the cap, that the child may not be fidgeted by its slipping about.

Before describing other articles of clothing, I may furnish the result of my observation and experience on the question of warmth. Or, as it is a matter of great importance, I will quote one of the most eminent authorities of the day. He says:—"Infants are very susceptible of the impressions of cold; a proper regard, therefore, to a suitable clothing of the body is positively necessary to their enjoyment of health. An opinion, unfortunately, is prevalent in society, that the tender child has naturally a great power of generating heat, and resisting cold; and from this popular error have arisen fatal results. The injurious effects of cold upon the frame are not always manifest during, or immediately after, its application; so that, but too frequently, the fatal result is traced to a wrong source, or the infant sinks under the action of an unknown cause. It cannot be too generally known that the power of generating heat, in warm-blooded animals, is at its minimum—its lowest degree—at its birth, and increases successively to adult age; that young animals, therefore, instead of being warmer than adults, are generally a degree or two colder; and moreover, part with their heat more readily. These facts show the folly of that system of 'hardening the constitution,' as it is called, which induces the parent to plunge the tender and delicate child into a cold bath at all seasons, and freely to expose it to the cold cutting currents of an easterly wind."

At the same time, as I have said, extremes should be avoided. A Yorkshire paper, now before me, states that, a few days ago, a mother was travelling with an infant, in the neighbourhood of Wigan. She wrapped it carefully up in a large thick shawl, to protect it from the cold. On uncovering it, at her journey's end, she found, to her unspeakable horror, that her child was dead.

Lightness and genial warmth are the grand things to be observed in the clothing of infants. The neck, shoulders, and arms, should be well protected in cold weather, during which period no short-sleeved dresses ought to be worn, as their use frequently leads to croup, inflammation of the chest, and other infantile diseases. Fine flannel dresses, worn instead of calico, will materially assist in preserving the life of a delicate infant. But observation, circumstances, and, above all, experience, must decide as to these and similar matters.

"Children are careful comforts," says the old proverb. "True," says the reader; "at least, I know them to be certain cares."

MOON ON THE SEA

I SAW the youngling moon look meekly forth,
While the hoarse floods prolong'd their vesper hymn,
Touching the forehead of a far, gray isle
With silver radiance, delicately dim.

But arching high, in majesty and wrath,
And closer shutting o'er her gentle head,
Portending evil for her future path,
A sable cloud, its gathering blackness spread;

Yet still, adherent to the infant queen,
Fast by her side, with cheek serenely pale,
A tender, lonely, pure-eyed star was seen,
Like Abdiel faithful, tho' all else should fail:

And hark!—that voice upon the summer air,
Who hath one constant friend, the darkest cloud may dare.

SIR SAMUEL MORTON PETO, BART.

SIR SAMUEL MORTON PETO, whose portrait we have the pleasure of presenting, is a gentleman who has a double claim upon the interest and attention of the public. As one of the most extensive engineering contractors in the world, his name is invariably associated with one or other of the gigantic operations undertaken in this or in foreign countries. As a practical philanthropist, a man whose benevolence is as remarkable as his professional success, he is perpetually associated with every good and upright work which has for its object the elevation of the masses in a social, moral, or religious aspect.

Thus Sir Samuel Morton Peto is a popular man in a two-fold sense. Not that he has two characters—not that he is on the one hand a hard, bargain-driving, close-fisted business man, whose only purpose is to make money,—nor, on the other hand, one of those who give liberally what they have obtained with so much labour. There are men who never let works of mercy and charity interfere with business—who regard business as one thing and benevolence as another: this is not the case with Sir Samuel Morton Peto. He has set an excellent example of bringing his benevolence practically to bear on the common affairs of life. He has set about making all the people in his employment—a very legion of operatives—feel that the interests of employer and employed are identical: that there is between them a closer and better connection than that which arises from the payment and receipt of weekly wages—that the master cares for the comfort and welfare of his men, and is really and honestly anxious that they should be helped in every way to rise in the world. In his early life Samuel Morton Peto was a journeyman himself, and he thus became practically acquainted with the condition of working-men. He had the opportunity of ascertaining how much sterling merit—better than sterling coin, whatever they may say in the money market—was to be found among that extensive and influential class. He learned how many noble sentiments, and worthy aspirations—how much strong sympathy and pure virtue were in hearts that beat under a fustian jacket. It has been his effort to foster these sentiments, realise these aspirations, encourage this sympathy, and develop this virtue; and his efforts have been successful beyond expectation.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

SIR SAMUEL MORTON PETO, BART. AFTER A PHOTOGRAPH BY WATKINS.

In confirmation of what has been advanced, we may allude to the model village on his beautiful estate at Somerleyton, in Suffolk; to the schools he has established for the children of his workmen, to the assistance he has given to these workmen to educate themselves. He has been versatile in method, but constant in purpose; and whether building a chapel, or founding a book society, or planning a model village, or endowing a school, the promotion of the best interests of his workpeople has been constantly kept in sight.

As one of our most enterprising and successful contractors also, this gentleman occupies a conspicuous position. The following particulars respecting him in this capacity will no doubt be interesting.

He was born at Woking, in Surrey, in the year 1809, and served seven years under Mr. Henry Peto. While in this capacity he worked as carpenter and bricklayer. In 1830 he came into possession of a large fortune bequeathed to him by his uncle, and at the same time succeeded, with another nephew, Mr. Thomas Grissell, to the extensive business of the deceased. The business of the firm as builders and contractors increased under the new name "Grissell and Peto," till in 1845 the partnership was dissolved.

Two years later (1847) Mr. Peto was elected M.P. for Norwich. A liberal in politics, in favour of an extension of the suffrage, opposed to any fresh endowment of any religious denomination, and seeking the repeal of every impost which pressed on the consciences of dissenters, he rendered good service in the house. In 1854, however, he resigned his seat, having other work to do; and having patriotically undertaken the formation of the Balaklava railway, he shortly afterwards received a patent of baronetcy.

Among the principal contracts undertaken by this enterprising and benevolent man, that of the erection of the Houses of Parliament takes the first place. Next follow the Reform and Oxford and Cambridge club-houses, Hungerford Market, a large portion of the leading railway works in England and Canada, the Norwegian Grand Trunk Line, and the Royal Danish Line. It was on the completion of the latter that Sir Samuel was invested with the order of the Danebrog. He has also erected several places of worship. Bloomsbury Chapel was built at his expense, and he purchased and refitted as a chapel the Diorama, Regent's-park. Both of these are connected with the Baptist denomination, of which Sir Samuel is an eminent and esteemed member.

THE THREE GIPSIES.

ILLUSTRATION OF A POEM BY LENAÜ.

Nor long ago, there lived in an Austrian madhouse a patient who was an object of more than common sympathy and interest; and it went like a sound of mourning through the neighbourhood when the news came from the asylum that an unhappy lunatic had found release from the burden of his infirmity—that Nicholas Lenau was dead.

Who was Nicholas Lenau? our readers would ask; and why should he be distinguished from among the unhappy crowd of patients in the Austrian asylum?

Nicholas Lenau was one of the most gifted

of the modern German poets; and his life has a mournful significance, for it shows that the possession of the most brilliant mental gifts will not insure happiness; that public applause and fame will not secure content. Possessing undoubted genius—favourably known throughout the whole of Germany by his poems, and courted and caressed by every circle—Nicholas Lenau appeared, to the superficial observer, a fortunate and happy man. Young writers looked with envy on the favourable notices awarded to his works, and many a youthful aspirant for fame wished he could be as successful and as fortunate as Lenau.

They little knew the truth. They thought the tone of melancholy that appeared in all the poet's writings was but a mask, assumed first to excite and then to keep up the interest of the reader. They had heard the proverb which tells us "there is a skeleton in every house," but no man knew how hideous a spectre waved his sword, year after year, over the head of the poet. Still the tone of his writings began to be noticed. Everything he wrote sounded like a wail after lost happiness, or like the feverish outbursts of a man writing under the consciousness of some impending horror. More moody and distraught he became, as his fame and the number of his friends increased together; and frequently he would rush away from some pleasant party to indulge his grief in secret. Then, at last, suspicions of the truth began to be whispered abroad; and gradually people knew what kind of spectre it was that haunted Lenau. Over-work, over-excitement, and the strain of long mental exertion, had deranged the balance of that keen but morbidly sensitive intellect. Fancied horrors crowded thick upon the poet's sick brain; and no day labourer, who earned a scanty support by the sweat of his brow, had cause to envy Nicholas Lenau, as he sat among his friends—gifted, famous, and unhappy. Never was there a more terrible illustration of the trite proverb "All is not gold that glitters."

At last the blow came. Fatigued by a journey he had made on the banks of the Rhine; sick at heart with the dull, heavy weight of sleepless nights, the sufferer's brain at last gave way—and Lenau appeared among the horrified guests of a large hotel, a violent, dangerous maniac. It was necessary to place him under close restraint. At times his noble intellect would flash up like the expiring rays of a lamp, and his friends would hope against hope that he might yet recover; but then the dark cloud fell again, and at last the rest of the grave—the only rest he could long enjoy—was graciously sent to Lenau in his cell in the Austrian madhouse.

Reader! if thou hast health and strength, and the power to work, thank thy God for these gifts, night and day; for thou hast within thee the elements of that happiness for which one of the most gifted men sighed and longed in vain.

It was during one of his solitary journeys that Lenau encountered the group of Zigeuner, or gipsies, represented in our engraving. The contented look of these men at once suggested to him that here was the happiness he had so long sought; and he gave vent to his feelings in a little poem, "The Three Gipsies," which we have translated as closely as the exigencies of rhyme would allow. It runs thus:—

Saw I three gipsy men, once on a day,
All by a willow tree lying—
As my chaise creaked o'er the gravelly way,
Crunching, and groaning, and crying.

One there was grasping his fiddle so gay—
There in the sunlight I found him,
Playing a fiery roundelay,
Fiery sunlight around him.

One there was smoking a pipe that gleamed;
And, as the smoke did enwreath him,
Happy and proud as a monarch he seemed,
Scorning the base world beneath him.

One man lay sleeping beneath the dark trees,
His blithe tambourine hung there swinging;
Through its gay bells went the cool evening breeze,
Dreams through his light heart went winging.

Ah, but the clothes of the jovial three
Woefully patched were, and mended;
But they derided, in frolicsome glee,
Troubles on life that attended.

Threefold they showed me, the jovial three,
Painfully past them creeping,
How men may laugh at fate's cruelty,
Smoking, and singing, and sleeping.

Wistful the glances that backward I threw—
Fain would have filled their places.
Ah! they were happy, that black-haired crew,
Swarthy and dark though their faces.

THE LACE MERCHANT'S DOG.

Who would have imagined that a dog had been made serviceable as a clerk, and thus gained for his master upwards of a hundred thousand crowns? And yet an incident like this happened a few years since in Europe.

One of those industrious beings who know how to make a chaldron of coals out of a billet of wood, determined, in extreme poverty, to engage in trade. He preferred that of the merchandise which occupied the least space, and was calculated to yield the most profit. He borrowed a small sum of money from a friend, and repairing to Flanders, he there bought pieces of lace, which, without any danger, he smuggled into France in the following manner:—

He trained an active spaniel to his purpose. He caused him to be shaved, and procured for him the skin of another dog, of the same hue and the same shape. He then rolled the lace around the body of his dog, and put over it the garment of the stranger so adroitly, that it was impossible to discover the trick. The lace thus arranged in his pedestrian band-box, he would say to his docile messenger, "Forward, my friend." At these words the dog would start and pass boldly through the gates of Malines or Valenciennes, in the face of the vigilant officers placed there to prevent smuggling. Having passed the bounds, he would wait for his master at a little distance in the open country. There they mutually caressed and feasted, and the merchant placed his packages in a place of security, renewing his occupation as necessity required.

Such was the success of the smuggler, that in five or six years he amassed a handsome fortune, and kept his coach. Envy pursues the prosperous. A mischievous neighbour betrayed the lace merchant; and notwithstanding his efforts to disguise his dog, he was suspected, watched, and discovered.

How far does the cunning of some animals extend! Did the spies of the custom-house expect him at one gate, he saw them at a distance, and instantly went towards the other. Were the gates shut against him, he overcame every obstacle—sometimes he leaped over the wall; at others passed secretly behind a carriage, or running between the legs of travellers, he would thus accomplish his aim. One day, however, while swimming in a stream near Malines, he was shot, and died in the water. There was then about him five thousand crowns worth of lace; the loss of which did not affect the master, but he was inconsolable for the loss of his faithful dog.

LATSON.

BY FELIX STOWE.

CHAPTER VIII.

LOVE'S LABOUR LOST.

LATSON, having flung to the servant his enormous pilot-coat, and having shed his overalls, and hung up his hunting-whip, stood revealed in that splendid room, one of the handsomest of country gentlemen. He knew it, while he waited there; not a mirror from end to end of the apartment missed the honour of reflecting, first the front, then the profile, then the half-reversed view of that well-made form. The pier-glasses had the preference, for they showed the completer outline; and depend on it, the Colonel hated the winter, that forced those marvels of little feet into something stouter than glazed kid that day.

The visitor had no time to do more than make this hurried and very satisfactory circuit.

"The Lady Ethel is not at home, Colonel," said the lady herself, promptly opening the door, and standing at the entrance, with a very well-sustained imitation of the well-bred domestic.

"No, but her angel is!" cried Latson, as he sprang up towards her, and was about to take her from the threshold into the room.

"Not at home," she added, "to magistrates who send poor girls to prison for remembering an old lover! Oh, Hugh, Hugh, I blushed for shame of you, to-day, when I read about your committing that poor workhouse woman for nothing at all."

"And well you might, my little scold; there never was a worse report printed, even in the Wiltshire Messenger. Would you believe it, that heart-broken lass (Cyril, Cistatia, whatever her name was) had been up just five times before, on the very same charge about four different cases! They never printed a word of that, the scoundrels! Twice for annoying the same man, and two others beside!"

"Come, come!" said Ethel, looking at him askance, but evidently greatly relieved.

And Latson, snatching up a red and gilt copy of Burns's poems, kissed it with mock reverence, and laid it down again.

"You cruel little sceptic! I'll kiss the book upon it."

And he drew her towards him and seated her at his side by the fireplace, and went on—

"You didn't really think now, my precious, that that paper had given you all that occurred, did you? You know how those Messenger fellows always serve our party—oh, fie, Letty! Why, one look at the damsel would have made short work with your sympathy, I can tell you. She would have sworn against the Archbishop of Canterbury without flinching!"

And so, having first, on the very judgment-seat, hugged his own vices by petting a brother in cruelty, he finished by a falsehood and a slander against their common victim, to smooth the brow of a fine lady.

"Ah, but," Ethel rejoined, "I knew very well, without the Messenger, that your doctrines about the poor and their social rights were very strange indeed; very different, at least, from mine."

"My social right, at present, my lady, is not to talk political economy," laughed the Honourable Hugh; "so please spare me, this once, and talk to me, rather, my own girl, of the middle of next February; eh, Letty?" and he drew her beautiful hair through his fingers, and laid it round his neck, till it curled even a little way down his own opposite shoulder.

"Next February," the lovely girl said to him, "is a month I anticipate with very mixed feelings, after all, dear Hugh."

"A mixture, I suppose, of pride and satisfaction, is it?"

"A mixture of hope and apprehension."

"Apprehension!" cried the colonel.

"We are so very, very different in many things, dearest Hugh, that I often quake for fear lest our sympathy should hardly survive the first twelve months. In order to friendship, there must be sympathy; and when friendship is gone between man and wife, what becomes of true love?"

"In what do we differ so terribly?" asked Latson, holding her a little way from him, and looking her rather more fully in the face than was his wont to do with any companion. (For the almost invariable rule—that vice looks down, sideways, backward, everywhere but fully at you—had no exception in the manners of the Honourable Hugh.) "In what do we differ?"

"Would there be one question," answered Ethel, by asking, "upon which we should agree, in the management of tenantry, for instance?"

"A thousand!" said Latson, with a start, for he didn't know to what she was bringing him.

"Would you like me to go among the sick poor, sir, with my basket and my maid, as I do now?"

"Well," he answered, "as to that—"

"Would you object to making a farmer, in bad times, a present of a quarter's rent, just for a year, that he might pull round?"

"If you asked me to do it, my treasure, he should have it all back!"

"Indeed! If I asked you three years after our marriage, as readily as if I asked you now, my colonel?"

"You would ruin your estate, Ethel, if you did that sort of thing often," he replied.

"Why, verily, I question whether I could manage you, in such a matter, even now. We begin our differences early, neighbour Pliable. Let's try again. You would open the park at the Towers, of course, to the decent portion of the public, as mamma does here? And once or twice a year, there would be rural games along the grand walk, or anywhere, so as to be clear of the preserves or the young trees?—that's settled, I suppose, isn't it?"

"Really," said Latson, looking somewhat fidgety, "these are rather strange questions to choose, for differences between husband and wife. I should have imagined, speaking very humbly, that if I left you to superintend the conservatories, the avenues, and the park walls might, without presumption, be claimed by the lord,—eh, Letty?"

"And so, if you came into a conservatory, and suggested an improvement, I should be at liberty, should I, to tell you to mind your fences and your gamekeepers?—Ah, dear Hugh, a happy marriage knows no separate interests. Be it a flower,—be it a farm,—there are some things about both which we might fairly settle together. Not, thank goodness, that either you or I need conduct in person the draining or the repairing of the farm, or mix in person the compost for the plants; but there is no subject upon which either has the right to say to the other, 'It doesn't concern you;' and none on which either, having the right, should find the heart to say it. Oh, Hugh, if I could be perfectly secure of your agreement to this picture of married life!"

And the good girl (who had really known she was talking nonsense to Maude that morning, and didn't mean half she had said) put her little arm where her long ringlets had been, and looked into his face, with a look of tenderness which he little deserved; but yet of half suspicion, which he deserved more richly than she knew.

"Letty, my dear girl," he answered, when he had thought a moment, casting about, as men will, to excuse a bad nature with a bad argument, "the mistakes you always commit on these questions, lie in measuring those below us by our own standards—the standard of happiness or the standard of right. A landlord, or, indeed, anybody else, has no business to manage his property as if the men and women beneath him expected or claimed equality. Happiness is relative, and rights are relative—relative to station and to birth. My gardener would no doubt be happier if he owned all the trees he takes care of, or may think he would. But what of that? Am I to give them to him? He was born where he is, and I was born where I am. The socialist, indeed, might go for a division between us—share and share alike. But I should think not the Lady Ethel Blance. Depend on it, Letty, that is only putting in an extreme light the folly of half of your model modern landlords. You may carry this sort of thing a great deal too far, not for your own interest merely, but for the comfort of your dependents. And as to opening the parks, and getting up country fairs in one's own grounds, why, really, it is doing, my dear girl, what these very people who want it would never dream of doing to the class next below them. Do you suppose that if I flung open Latson to-morrow, Greaves, the tallow-chandler, or Poleaxe, the butcher, would tell their muffin-boys to make themselves at home at their houses one day in the week ever after?"

"I never argued," Ethel replied, "that a nobleman is bound to do this particular service to his tenantry. He is not bound; I merely mentioned it as one mode in which he can recognise the fact, that he has inferiors, at other times besides quarter day. And, let me say, my dear reasoner, that if Greaves or Poleaxe got as much of his property, or of his influence, from the muffin-boy as Colonel Latson does from his tenants, and if the privacy of the chandler and butchers would be no more disturbed by letting people into their parlours, than the privacy of the Colonel is by opening his outer park, why, I should say, 'Let in the muffin-boy;' but I give up the point of right; I never urged it. I say it is the duty of a proprietor, somehow or another, to take an interest in his dependents, and he may do it by many acts which those dependents could never claim exactly as their rights."

"Surely," said the Colonel, "whatever it is my duty to do, my people may claim as a right?"

"Not at all," she answered: "the duty has reference to a higher power—a power above both landlord and tenant; and so long as the rich man takes care of the interests of his poor in some conspicuous way, I grant you that others have no right to prescribe for themselves what that way shall be. My dear Hugh, it is the disposition that makes a good or bad landlord; and, if you choose, you may keep Latson Towers as close as a nunnery, so long as you make the world feel that you have a heart above leases and lawyers."

"Well, but answer what I said about relative standards of happiness."

"It needs no answer. Your gardener would think you a fool if you made him a present of your pineries and vineries; but he would think you a churl if his wife were dead, and he asked for a day's holiday to bury her, and you wouldn't grant it. The poor ask no equality. They do ask, not to be ranked with a horse or a plough. And I sometimes think, dear Hugh, that I would sooner lose your love than be taught so to rank them."

"Plague on that workhouse girl," said the Colonel, getting up and leaving Ethel standing there: "I've to thank her for this entertainment."

"If you would only let me, dearest," said Ethel, pleasantly, "I'd send this very day, and give her your thanks, or, at least, a promise of a servant's shelter at Latson Towers next February."

And Ethel followed the Colonel to the window, and put her arm within his.

Colonel! There is not much of a heart beneath that yellow waistcoat, on this December morning. But such as it is, it will be enough to torment you another day—another day, when you will feel as if, sooner than let drop that little hand, carelessly and pettishly, as you do, standing there and looking out upon the frost, you could rest your stout arm on the muzzle of your gun, and blow it to pieces!

Ethel! It had been good for thee, too, if, not thy lover's arm, but thy lover himself, could go off in the explosion, rather than that he should live to lead thee to the altar, as he will—Maude, the sick mother's counsel, his own bad temper, notwithstanding—on that coming February day!

CHAPTER IX.

THE BENCH AND THE DOCK.

THERE have been worse dispositions in the world, after all, than that of Dan Stuggs. Indeed, we have just left one standing in a lady's drawing-room.

Dan could either be made or marred by his company. He was like one of those chemical landscapes that you see sometimes. In the shop-window it is a picture of snow, and bare boughs, and icicles, and everything to chill you and make you shudder. Bring that piece of paper near the fire for a few moments, and the heat colours the ink, and every patch of snow is a bunch of flowers, and all the leaves are on the branches, and winter has become summer.

We have not forgotten how that Stuggs hated himself for letting Cicely go to prison, and how, in a moment, he repented of hard words to Joyce on that Sunday night. But there is just now another evil fit upon Dan. He has guessed a part of the truth as concerns the county justice, and he reflects on it after his bath at the pump.

He will go down again into Wiltshire; he will try to learn, by hook or crook, how matters stand; so that if, as he supposes, his friend the justice is really playing at hide and seek with any one who is anxious to find him, he may perhaps turn a penny (whether an honest one or no, Dan hitherto has not generally cared much), by way of gratitude for a certain recent good riddance.

It would be tiresome to the reader, if we led him through the rough adventures in which this vague project involved Mr. Stuggs. He had not a spark of ill-will to poor Joyce; he would even have rendered her a service, other things being equal. But, having himself supplied her with the piece of paper, that unfortunately might somehow involve the tranquillity of one to whom he felt indebted, why, it really almost appeared to be Dan's duty,—did it not?—(especially if he could gain by it), to prevent any possible disturbance of the magistrate's peace.

On the other hand, he incurred certain little risks of his own, by manifesting himself just now in that particular county, so that whatever he did, must clearly be done with the utmost circumspection, lest in approaching very near "The Towers," he should come rather nearer than was convenient to a certain workhouse or a certain gaol.

It is somewhat about a week after the time of old Claymore's visit to the dressmaker. Where the poor old man has wandered, and what the poor old man has done, all that while, we can never know. He was the shepherd in the sacred parable, seeking his lost sheep.

How he had discovered the fact of the marriage (so-called), at the same church where Ruth had found the infant, how he had hunted out the loose nose at "The Chequers," and learned, if not the name of the fashionable person, at least as much of it as Crutchway remembered or cared to tell—how he consequently wondered more and more why Joyce had never written, and what could be the motive for concealing herself, or forsaking little Hugh, and how the old man found himself so near the town in whose suburbs Latson flourished,—all this we need not report step by step, even had we heard it.

Certain it is, that you might have seen the same old comforter fringed all along the top with the few ragged-looking gray hairs (grayer even than when you saw them last), and the same old camlet cloak, and the same umbrella, going down along one of the narrow thoroughfares of the lower part of the town of Soreby (twenty miles from the place he wanted to reach), exactly as you saw them last, coming out of No. 19, in that back street in London. And yet not exactly. It is now an afternoon in the end of January. It is also a deep snowstorm, such a snowstorm as has not been known for years. So, the umbrella, being discovered to be of no manner of use, is tied up with the stick, and they are used together for a staff, as the old man trudges along. And then the comforter and the camlet coat are scarcely to be distinguished underneath a coating of snow, making even the gray hair look darker.

It is snow, snow, snow everywhere. Aye, and more snow in the poor old heart in the breast of the wayfarer.

The stage has become immovable a few miles short of the town, and there was nothing for Claymore but to walk on to Soreby.

We are not superstitious; but we have fancied, very, very often, that when a father is seeking a child, as old Claymore sought Joyce, it is possible for him to feel as if he grew nearer to his beloved one, when he is drawing nearer, before he has any other proof that he does. We know nothing of souls acting upon souls, without a fleshy medium. Much absurd nonsense has been written and spoken about it, and we are not going to write it here; but we nevertheless should be anything but astonished, if we knew that, when the world comes to know as much about spirit as it now takes such pains to know about matter, some explanation will be given of the circumstance, that we sometimes feel to be in fellowship with the bodily absent; and that we have a mysterious sense of approach when we are, though otherwise imperceptibly, coming nearer.

Certain it is, that all that afternoon, the old traveller was beginning to pluck up new courage. He fancied he could hear his dear girl's voice saying to him, not far off—

"A little further still, and we shall meet."

And he cheerily said in reply, all to himself, and yet to Joyce (who seemed to hear him)—

"I'm just coming now, darling; wait for me."

It was high time.

Turning one of the corners in that low neighbourhood, he came upon a little knot of bystanders, who were talking with great earnestness, and in a dialect a Shropshireman could make nearly as little of as we could.

But as he passed, he saw, here and there, other little knots of people, talking with the same earnestness; and especially as he came near one particular house, the excitement seemed to grow greater, though perhaps more decorous, and (if we may say so of excitement) quieter.

"I tell ye," said a rough-looking fellow, under his breath, "old Chance is gone in, and he's sent out for a lot o' snow; and they've stripped the poor creature, and are rubbing her all over with it about the lungs like; there is nothing to be done, lad, if old Chance can't do it!"

"Who found her?" asked one of the women.

"I did," said a man who looked like an under-bailiff or a watcher of game. "They may rub as they like, the poor soul has seen the last o' Wiltshire county, or I'm mistaken. You never saw such a thing in all your days. I could make nothing of my dogs all this blessed morning: a fine business we had of it. They went snuff, snuffing about the snow-drifts, I should say for full three-quarters of a mile, till at last we came upon her, poor thing! down in the Dead-man's Hollow. She couldn't have been there long, though; for where she slipped down off the turnpike wasn't covered, but all looked as if she hadn't scraped it above ten minutes. My notion is, she was stunned like with the fall, and then numbed with the cold, and couldn't get up again. Dear heart! But she had a look on her that I shan't forget this many a day; and so—me and my nerry yonder—we brought her down this hill, here, to Dame Griffin's, the nearest we thought of."

Long before the end of this last discourse, and no doubt moved by that strange feeling we hinted at above, old Claymore had pushed his way through the crowd at the little door, and was begging to be allowed to go into the room, as soon as the doctor pleased.

In this the father was some time in succeeding. When he entered the room at last, after the doctor was gone, it was only by telling the woman that he had some reason for thinking he could speak to the name of the poor girl, and after promising not to interfere with the attendants, who were still obeying the doctor's orders, that he was allowed to approach her.

The old man did no harm. He rather assisted the return of consciousness that had begun before the doctor left.

You should have seen him as he went up to the side of the bed. It was a different Joyce, it is true, from that one with whom he had parted a few years back. But it was Joyce,—and that was enough for him.

He knelt down by the side of the little bed; and, taking one of her hands in his, bent over and kissed it passionately again and again, no one daring to interrupt him. She breathed, and that was comfort for the old father: breathed through those dear lips, the fac-simile of which he had seen—unknown to her—in the tiny founding far away in the great city,—and, burying his face in the pillow, close to hers, he sobbed out his thanks to that Mercy which at last had restored to him his child.

How long he knelt down there he never could tell. But no one remained now in the room but the kind creature who had received the patient into the house. For it seemed as if nothing was wanting but time and care, and then the pulse would begin to beat fuller and oftener.

"She'll do now, poor dear," whispered the woman, as she saw that Joyce opened her eyes, and looked about the place.

The chest too was becoming warmer, so she put more hot water to the feet, and sat down on the side of the bed—while the old man still knelt opposite.

Presently he raised his head; for he heard a whisper.

"Yes! oh, yes! a friend!—a friend of yours, dearest! That will be the best of all!"

And the father put his ear close to his child's mouth. It wasn't necessary; she began to speak more audibly.

"You've forgiven me, dear Hugh," she said, with a bright, loving smile, "for saying we must be married, haven't you?"

And then there was a pause, the woman and the man both listening.

"Ah! he said, didn't he say (bless him!) 'forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long as ye both shall live?—I have, darling; yes I have! And so I ought. Dear mother! Write to her, Hugh. When may she come—come and see us? Oh, that horrid! Yes!—but she'll be so happy with us. And will they let father come?"

And there was a gasp ran shuddering through the room. But no one spoke.

"For better, for worse—for richer, for poorer," dear Hugh!"

And she took her hand from the old man, and held it out, adding, "and thereto I plight thee my troth!"

The bystanders exchanged looks, but neither ventured to speak; only Claymore's white hairs went lower and deeper down among the bed-clothes, and his whole frame shaking, shook the bed.

All was still for some seconds.

Then, suddenly, so suddenly that they started and stared upon her, she snatched both her hands away from them, and, feeling with her right hand one of the fingers of the left, and, turning round the ring, as in an ecstasy, she cried out in a tone that made them wonder—

"You lie! Say that again! Here it is! I knew he spoke the truth! Hugh Latson never lied! My name is Latson! He cannot lie! Look! look! Are you content?"

And with a smile of triumph, scorn, and love, all together, she held out her left hand in the midst, pointing the ring finger at some one she saw at the foot of the bed.

And then all was still again. The woman could make nothing of it; the wretched father made very little.

Softly turning over on her side, Joyce began to feel up and down, from the pillow to the middle of the couch, first on one side, then on the other.

"What is it, my own precious girl?" asked Claymore, and his eyes filled again and again, and emptied themselves on his withered hands as he pressed his face between them.

"What is it, sir?" shouted Joyce, in a key they had never thought to hear from her. "What is it? Give him back! Give him back, I say!"

And she turned from side to side in a perfect paroxysm of dismay and anger.

"I only lent him to you! I tell you he is not yours! Did the angel steal the child? You know he never did. Hugh! Hugh! I say my own little Hugh! Suppose he did," she began to rave; "suppose he did, what is that to the baby? Will you give him back?" and she would have sprung out of bed, if they had not stopped her.

"My only child," sobbed the old father; "for my sake, dearest, lie still. You are killing yourself, my own Joyce! Do, do, be calm."

And the woman left the room, to send for Chance back again, that he might know of these new symptoms.

Directly she was gone, Joyce felt about in the waist of her dress, and brought out a little piece of paper all soiled and worn, and, to Claymore's bewilderment, kissed it passionately, again and again, staring at it wildly between the kisses.

The poor girl turned on her father a look, one look, that made him leap up into her arms. And she smiled upon him—her old smile—as he rained down his tears upon her bosom. She put out her hand and gently slipped her fingers inside his stock, and held them there against his neck, as she used to do: and the old man lifted up his eyes to heaven, and was just trying to say, "Father, I thank Thee!" when she let him go, and fell back on the bed quite exhausted, and began to breathe very quickly, muttering thick sounds, of which he understood nothing, between the choking breaths.

He could catch no word for some time.

After a while she opened her eyes.

He saw her trying to put her lips together again; but it was almost more than she could do.

"Pro—prom—promise me," she gasped.

"Promise you! yes, my darling," said Claymore.

And she made a terrible effort to rise upon one elbow.

"That—you—will—never—hurt him," she murmured very low, as he bent his ear down.

"Never, never! my sweet Joyce!" sobbed the old man. "But have you no more to say?"

"Yes—yes!" she gasped.

And Claymore pressed his ear close to her mouth.

"I—did—think—I was married,—dear father,—when we went away!"

"I know it, my precious—I know it," said Claymore.

He thought she said, "It's at number, number;" but if she did, she would have been understood by no other listener; and she never added the figure. He laid his hand under her shoulders and kissed her, as if his soul was departing with hers.

"Number nineteen, dearest. Yes, I know."

She smiled her joy that he knew where the infant was. But there was one more flicker in the socket.

And the lips just went near enough together, at the last moment, to say—

"Hugh—forgive Hugh!"

"Quite! quite!" he murmured.

And then, Joyce Claymore, releasing her destroyer from all fear of importunity, and removing from him all danger for ever through her inconvenient love, heaped the last burning coal on the head of the Honourable Hugh!

So died one more of the many, many thousands who die in city, village, and wilderness,—of whom the world talks ever with coarse cruelty, or (at the best) with cheap compassion,—but whose blood, like Abel's, cries out for vengeance, and cries to One whose ear is not heavy; though, unlike Abel's, that blood is forced to wait till "the Time of the Restitution of all things!"

A door opened, in a country place, a few miles farther west, the next day but one after this occurrence in Soresby, and a man walked in, with his head hanging very low, and his gait being very unsteady, but not with drink.

He was rather better attired than when we parted with him at the cab-stand; but his appearance was not re-assuring to the cottagers—a woman and a girl of about nine or ten years of age.

After a sort of rough apology, Dan, in very few words, asked for Cicely, and learned that she had left the workhouse some time ago, and was in service away in Soresby,—the very town through which, of course, he had just come, on his way to the neighbourhood of Latson Towers.

Stuggs had no difficulty about the distance or the trouble of returning. But he entertained the strongest reluctance to be anywhere near Soresby again for a long time to come.

It is not known whether he had any acquaintance or relationship with Dame Griffin, or whether he had been more successful than other strangers in gaining admission into the house, on that evening, when Joyce died. But certain it is, that he knew who it was that had been found in the corpse, and certain it is that Dan had contrived to overhear a good deal of what was said between father and daughter, on that sad night. Indeed, for that matter, Joyce's excitement had been so great, that every now and then her words could have been heard outside in the street. The delirium that had been coming on for months, was brought to a crisis by the stunning fall in the snowstorm,—and then the reaction on the recovery from the cold and exposure, completed her derangement, and so destroyed her.

Dan had heard or seen quite enough.

The landscape had been held very near the fire,—and there was a beautiful summer in Dan's heart just then.

"But his heart was hot within him, and while he was musing, the fire burned."

Need we tell you how Cicely met him?

She met him as nine women out of every ten, though ever so sorely wronged, meet the first symptom of repentance or acknowledgment.

"Oh! my lass!" said Dan, "I can't make it all out. But I made sure thus far,—that there's been horrid work—that poor critter! And when I come to bethink me, that somebody else might ha' gone the same road, for all I'd been a-caring, and perhaps was gone, for all I knew,—I just prayed God to spare me, till I could come back, and say to ye, 'Cicely, can ye forgive poor Dan?' I'm not goin' to tell ye, not a word about my bein' sorry they took my poor lass to prison. I'm not goin' to make much of it, though it's as true as you stand there, that I never dreamt of such a thing. Heaven knows I was bad and black enough, from first to last, without that! I don't ask ye, dear Cis,—and here the poor fellow let go her hand he had taken, in the earnestness of his confession,—"I don't ask ye to care for Dan as ye did before. I'm not such a fool, I hope. But just say, 'Dan, it's all forgiven!' and then I'll go content. But, as true as you stand there, if you'd ha' died, as that girl of Latson's did, and prayed and blessed me before ye went, as she did him, and I'd ever heard of it, there'd just ha' been two people to bury in one grave, that's all,—for live I wouldn't another blessed second! There! Will ye say it, Cis? and then I'm off!"

She had hardly looked into his face all this while. They walked to and fro in a quiet part of the suburbs, whither she had got leave to come "to see a friend from a great distance," as Dan sent word. Cicely was weeping very fast and sorely,—and yet not sorely, for her little heart, though sad at Joyce's end, was happy in itself for the first time for weeks.

"Dan," she said, when she could find the breath to say it, "dear Dan, do ye think that poor lass would ha' let the justice go if he'd come and said, 'Will ye forgive me?'"

And Dan laughed a sort of hoarse smothered laugh, and said—

"May be not, Cisy."

"Would ye have said she loved him very hard if she did, Dan?"

"Bless ye!" said Dan; "bless ye! But nobody never tret her as I've done you, my poor little lass!"

And so they talked, and talked, and Dan never any more returned to live in London.

Other affairs took a much longer time to settle. Dan had no work at present. That must be obtained. A character had to be earned (not with Cicely, for he had only lost it with her for about five minutes in the justice room, but) with the little world in which such men move.

But as we are not aware that we shall have much more to do in this our story, either with Dan or with Cicely, it may be as well once for all to say, that when Joyce had been just twelve months lying at rest in Soresby churchyard, underneath a simple slab of stone, on which the old man had cut the letters "J. C.," and the date of her death,—on that very day twelve-month, a little plain white skirt just swept the edge of the stone as it passed down the gravel-walk; and when it touched the stone the wearer stopped, and some one else stopped beside her, as they walked arm-in-arm from the church-door to the churchyard-gate—not on Sunday, either.

Neither spoke, but they looked into each other's eyes, and there followed in both breasts a sigh and a prayer!

And so it was (and so it often is under that kind Providence which balances the good against the evil of this world,—so it was), that if out of Joyce's marriage there came a death, out of Joyce's death there sprang a happy marriage!

THE MASSACRE AT CAWNPORE.

THE atrocities committed by the mutineers on the innocent and defenceless, have given a terrible notoriety to Cawnpore.

Cawnpore is the capital of the collectorate of the same name, in the province of Allahabad. It is the chief British military station in the ceded districts of Hindostan on the west bank of the Ganges. It is built on the river side, and extends for about six miles, not in one regular town, but scattered residences and officers bungalows, more or less connected, with the exception of a tolerable main street, nearly parallel with the military lines. This street is composed of well-built brick houses, two or three storeys high, with wooden balconies in front. It was never a pleasant place of residence for Europeans, and, with the exception of its size, there were few circumstances about it to attract notice. It was a place of no great consequence, and contained no interesting relics of antiquity; but Cawnpore has attained a horrible celebrity—a melancholy interest. Whether we erect a monument or a church, or neither, over the fatal well, the story of the murdered women and the slaughtered children will be equally well remembered. Such a massacre as that at Cawnpore is not easily forgotten. It is written in characters of blood, that nothing can by any means efface.

The circumstances which preceded and led to the massacre may be thus briefly stated:—

Eight days before the mutiny broke out, General Sir Hugh Wheeler, seeing the disaffected spirit of the troops, applied to Nena Sahib, of Bithoor, for a guard for the protection of the treasury. This request was promptly complied with, and Nena sent two guns and 200 Nujeebs, armed with matchlocks, and these were placed at the collectorate over the treasure. A day or two before this Sir Hugh Wheeler had sent elephants to remove the treasure, amounting to about seven lacs, to the entrenchment; but the Sepoys would not allow this to be done, saying to the collector, who had told them that he was apprehensive of the treasure being looted by the budmashes and mutineers from the other stations, that if there were twice the amount they would guard it from danger.

On the 5th June, about three in the morning, the Sepoys and Sowars commenced burning their lines and shouting, and proceeded towards Nawabgunge, where the treasure was, leaving one regiment to prevent the Europeans from going to the relief of the collector. By-and-by, the treasure having been packed on elephants and carts, this regiment joined the others. It was then about midday, and the mutineers set off to the westward, in the direction of

THE MASSACRE OF THE FUGITIVES FROM CAWNPORE.

Kullianpore, and towards Delhi, accompanied by the 200 Nujeebs, with the two guns of Nena Sahib, leaving the inhabitants relieved, as it were, by their departure; and up to that time there had not been destruction of property or loss of life.

On the morning of the following day, about eight o'clock, the mutineers, headed by Nena, with about 600 of his followers and four guns (having, it seems, previously made up their minds to destroy all the Christians, whether European or native), returned to Cawnpore and halted about two miles to the west of the intrenchment, planted standards, and took up a position, with beating of drums. Immediately after about fifty Sowars were despatched to the cantonments to slay all the Europeans, and fifty Sowars to the town where the poorer people lived, to kill all the native converts and clerks. During this time, Nena Sahib hoisted two standards, one to the honour of Mahomet, and the other of Hunaman; to the former some 2,000 Mahomedans repaired, to the latter but a few Hindoos, who came not from the city, but of whom some were budmashes. The main body of the insurgents first attacked the nawab's palace, and, having blown open the gate with their cannon, they entered the palace and gutted it, and took the nawab prisoner; Nena Sahib being under the impression that the nawab had concealed some Europeans. They then proceeded to the intrenchments, and from two o'clock commenced the attack with cannon, at first with two of the guns, and on the following day with six. It appears that the Europeans within the intrenchments were not well supplied with ammunition, as it is supposed they did not expect an assault with cannon, and thus were only able to reply with one gun to twenty of the enemy's. For seventeen days continuously, the mutineers used every now and then to make an assault, with 4,000 or 5,000 men from all quarters, with the view of carrying the intrenchment by storm, but were invariably repulsed with heavy loss. By this time the Nena's forces had increased, with the addition of budmashes and mutineers from other stations, to about 12,000 men.

Three or four days after the death of General Wheeler, the garrison being short both of provisions and ammunition, and reduced in number by several casualties, hoisted a flag of truce. Nena Sahib then stopped the assault, and sent to inquire what was meant by the flag. Answer was returned by the Europeans that they had neither food nor ammunition, and they proposed to give up the country to him on his allowing them to depart. To this Nena consented, and for two days supplied them with food, and in that time prepared boats for their departure. At the end of this time Nena gave the Europeans his word in writing, and he, his officers, and head people, confirmed it with an oath. The Europeans then gave up their arms and the treasure in the entrenchments, amounting to about three lacs, and were conveyed in Hindostanee gharries and hospital dhoolies, most of the ladies being in the latter, under an escort of sowars, to the ghaut, or landing step, where they were embarked in seventeen boats out of nineteen that had been provided, with the exception of some thirty-two ladies with children.

As soon as the boats had pushed off from the ghaut, the boatmen jumped overboard, and swam to the shore, and then the mutineers opened fire on the boats from a masked battery of eight guns, which had been previously erected for the purpose. All the boats were sunk, and the people on board killed, with the exception of one boat that had passed down, and some twenty Europeans who had managed to swim to the shore.

This boat was pursued by 500 nujeebs, with two guns, who came up with it on the second day, and sunk the boat, and destroyed every one on board, off a place called Goshein-ka-Seerajpore. The twenty and odd Europeans who swam on shore at Cawnpore were blown away from guns in the course of two or three days, some each day.

The foregoing particulars are the details given by an eye-witness of the whole affair. What follows is collected from other sources.

The ladies and children, including those already left behind, were immediately placed under the charge of a native doctor. A list of their names, prepared by this man, was subsequently found. This list, with a few scattered leaves of diaries kept by the unhappy women themselves, are all that at present fill up the period between the first and second massacres, between the treacherous slaughters of the boats' crews and passengers, and the fiendish murder of the helpless women and children.

The scattered leaves already named were found, torn and bloodstained, on the ground where the massacre took place. Brief as were the entries, they were interesting and affecting as the last words of those—so young, so pure, so beautiful—who perished amid every barbarity which fiendish cruelty could devise. They lived in hope, those poor, hapless ones, that succour would arrive—that they would be relieved—that they would again look on faces they loved, and hear voices that were so dear to them. And this hope brightened as they heard the rumour that the British were advancing, that Havelock was on his triumphant march. But the shouts of victory sounded their death-knell. Nena, the incarnation of every base and cruel passion, issued his command—and the rest was blood and torture.

It is not necessary to dwell on the horrors of a scene which is graphically depicted in the accompanying sketch.

When our brave fellows entered Cawnpore they beheld such a spectacle as they—trained to warfare and accustomed to battle-fields as they were—had never seen before. The place of slaughter was deluged with blood—the blood of Englishwomen and their little ones. Scattered about were articles of feminine attire and employment—workboxes, pieces of embroidery, crochet; and, more harrowing still, female hair torn out by the roots, or ruthlessly cut off by the Sepoys. The gallant Highlanders gathered up these locks; parted them piece by piece, that every man might take his portion; and swore to take a Sepoy's life for every hair!

The arch-mover of sedition, the monster Nena, escaped. He had completed his work of treachery and bloodshed, and had fled. So far as we know he is still at large. Again and again the report has been received that Nena has been seen here or seen there; but it appears that there are several fellows who personate him, and who by this means render his detection more difficult. There are not two opinions as to the punishment due to this treacherous and murderous prince;—or, if there are two opinions, they are, not as to whether he should be punished or spared, but rather what sort of death he should die. The capture of Delhi, the relief of Lucknow, the arrival of fresh troops, render the hope of his speedy arrest more certain. Whenever, wherever he is taken, the gallows awaits him.

Among all the horrible details of the mutiny throughout Bengal, none are so terrible as those connected with the massacre at Cawnpore; and the blackest crime committed during the revolt is the murder of the women and children there. The apologists for the mutiny can find no excuse for this. And those most anxious to temper their justice with mercy, must make exceptions in the case of these Sepoys—the murderers of our children—our wives—our sisters. No palliation can be urged on behalf of Nena and his myrmidons. The blood of the women cries from the ground, and our soldiers never fight so bravely, so heroically, as when they rush on to the charge with the rallying cry—"Remember the women—remember the babies!"

GIVING AWAY A CHILD.

ON board one of the Lake steamers, bound for the far West, were an Irish family—husband, wife, and three children. They were evidently in very destitute circumstances; but the exceeding beauty of the children—two girls and a boy—was the admiration of all their fellow-passengers. A lady, who had no children of her own, was desirous of adopting one of the little travellers, and made application to the father through a friend, who gives the following touching and, as we suppose, truthful account of the negotiation:—

"I proceeded, he says, immediately upon my delicate diplomacy. Finding my friend on deck, I thus opened the affair:

"You are very poor?"

His answer was very characteristic:

"Poor, sir!" said he; "ay, if there's a poorer man than me troublin' the world, God pity both of us, for we'd be about aqual."

"Then how do you manage to support your children?"

"Is it support them, sir? Why, I don't support them any way; they get supported some way or other. It'll be time enough for me to complain when they do."

"Would it be a relief to you to part with one of them?"

It was too sudden; he turned sharply round.

"A what, sir!" he cried; "a relief to part from my child? Would it be a relief to have the hands chopped from the body, or the heart torn out of my breast? A relief indeed! God be good to us, what do you mane?"

"You don't understand me," I replied. "If, now, it were in one's power to provide comfortably for one of your children, would you stand in the way of its interests?"

"No, sir," said he; "the heavens knows that I would willingly cut the sunshine away from myself, that they might get all the warm of it; but do tell uz what you're driving at."

I then told him that a lady had taken a fancy to have one of his children; and, if he would consent to it, it should be educated, and finally settled comfortably in life.

This threw him into a fit of gratitude. He scratched his head, and looked the very picture of bewilderment. The struggle between a father's love and a child's interest was evident and touching. At length he said—

"O, murther! wouldn't it be a great thing for the baby? But I must go and talk with Mary—that's the mother of them; an' it wouldn't be right to be giving away her children afore her face, and she to know nothing at all about it."

"Away with you then," said I, "and bring me an answer back as soon as possible."

In about half an hour he returned, leading two of his children. His eyes were red and swollen, and his face pale from excitement and agitation.

"Well," I inquired, "what success?"

"Bedad, it was a hard struggle, sir," said he. "But I've been talking to Mary, an' she says, as it's for the child's good, may be the heavens above will give us strength to bear it."

"Very well; and which of them is it to be?"

"Faix, and I don't know, sir," and he ran his eye dubiously over both. "Here's little Norah—she's the oldest, an' won't need her mother so much; but then—O! tear and aigers—it's myself that can't tell which I'd rather part with least; so take the first one that comes, wid a blessin'. There, sir," and he handed over little Norah; turning back, he snatched her up in his arms, and gave her one long, hearty father's kiss, saying through his tears—

"May God be good to him that's good to you, an' them that offers you hurt or harm, may their souls never see St. Pether."

Then taking his other child by the hand, he walked away, leaving Norah with me.

I took her down to the cabin, and we thought the matter settled. It must be confessed, to my great indignation, however, in about an hour's time I saw my friend Pat at the window. As soon as he caught my eye he commenced making signs for me to come out. I did so, and found that he had the other child in his arms.

"What's the matter now?" asked I.

"Well, sir," said he, "I ax your pardon for troubling you about so foolish a thing as a child or two, but we were thinkin' that maybe it'd make no differ—you see, sir, I've been talking to Mary, an' she says she can't part with Norah, because the creature has a look ov me; but here's little Biddy, she's purtyer far, an' av you please, sir, will you swap?"

"Certainly," said I, "whenever you like."

So he snapped up little Norah, as though it were some recovered treasure, and darted away with her, leaving little Biddy, who remained with us all night; but lo! the moment when we entered the cabin in the morning, there was Pat making his mysterious signs at the window, and this time he had the youngest, a baby, in his arms.

"What's wrong now?" I inquired.

"Be the hokey fly, sir, an' it's meself that's almost ashamed to tell you. You see I've been talkin' to Mary, and she didn't like to part with Norah, because she had a look of me; and, be my troth, I can't part with Biddy, because she's the model of her mother; but there's little Pauden, sir. There's a lump of a Christian for you two years old, and not a day more; he'll never be any trouble to any one, for av he takes after his mother, he'll have the brightest eye, an' av he takes after his father, he'll have a fine broad pair of shoulders to push his way through the world. Will you swap agin, sir?"

"With all my heart," said I; "it's all the same to me." And so little Pauden was left with me.

"Ha, ha," said I to myself, as I looked into his big, laughing eyes, "the affair is settled at last."

But it wasn't: for ten minutes had scarcely elapsed, when Pat rushed into the cabin without sign or ceremony, and snatching up the baby, cried out—

"It's no use; I've been talkin' to Mary, an' we can't do it. Look at him, sir: he's the youngest and the best of the batch. You wouldn't keep him from us. You see, sir, Norah has a look ov me, an' Biddy has a look ov Mary; but, be me troth, little Pauden has the mother's eye, an' my nose, an' a little of both of uz all over. No, sir, no; we can bear hard fortune, starvation, and misery, but we can't bear to part from our children, unless it be the will of heaven to take them from us."

THE SECRET OF LONGEVITY.

THE means known, so far, of promoting longevity, have been usually concentrated in short, pithy sayings, as, "Keep your head cool, and your feet warm," "Work much, and eat little," &c.; just as if the whole science of human life could be summed up and brought out in a few words, while its greatest principles were kept out of sight. One of the best of these sayings is given by an Italian in his 116th year, who, being asked the means of his living so long, replied with that improvisation for which his country is remarkable:

"When hungry, of the best I eat,
And dry and warm I keep my feet;
I screen my head from sun and rain,
And let few cares perplex my brain."

The following is about the best theory of the matter: Every man is born with a certain stock of vitality, which cannot be increased, but may be husbanded. With this stock he may live fast or slow—may live extensively or intensively—may draw his little amount of life over a large space, or narrow it into a concentrated one; but when his stock is exhausted, he has no more. He who lives extensively—who drinks pure water, avoids all inflammatory diseases, exercises sufficiently, but not too laboriously, indulges no exhausting passions, feeds on no exciting material, pursues no debilitating pleasures, avoids all laborious and protracted study, preserves an easy mind, and thus husbands his quantum of vitality—will live considerably longer than he otherwise would do, because he lives slow; while he, on the other hand, who lives intensively—who beverages himself on liquors and wines, exposes himself to inflammatory diseases, or causes that produce them, labours beyond his strength, visits exciting scenes, and indulges exhausting passions, lives on stimulating and highly-seasoned food—is always debilitated by his pleasures.

INDUSTRY ITS OWN REWARD.

ANYTHING we make up our minds to do we can do. There is nothing impossible to be done by determined, persevering effort, and nothing of importance can be accomplished without it. It was labour that built the pyramids, by labour the arts and sciences were brought to their present state of perfection, and labour is necessary for the health and happiness of all. Industry is the law of our being, and we are so constituted that when the law is fully recognised, it brings its own reward. Bodily labour is not the only kind that is necessary—mind and body should be exercised. In this way cheerfulness and contentment are promoted, and we are prepared to fill with honour any station assigned us by Providence. We often regard the doom pronounced on man, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," a curse, but it is really a blessing, for we find that all rational enjoyment follows in the train of industrious labour, whether physical or mental.

PADDLE YOUR OWN CANOE.

VOYAGER! upon life's sea,
To yourself be true,
And whate'er your lot may be,
Paddle your own canoe.
Never, though the winds may rave,
Falter nor look back;
But, upon the darkest wave,
Leave a shining track.

Nobly dare the wildest storm,
Stem the hardest gale;
Brave of heart, and strong of arm,
You will never fail.
When the world is cold and dark,
Keep an aim in view;
And toward the beacon mark
Paddle your own canoe.

Every wave that bears you on
To the silent shore,
From its sunny source has gone,
To return no more.
Then let not an hour's delay
Cheat you of your due;
But, while it is called to-day,
Paddle your own canoe.

If your birth denied you wealth,
Lofty state, and power;
Honest fame and hardy health
Are a better dower.
But if these will not suffice,
Golden gain pursue;
And to reach the glittering prize,
Paddle your own canoe.

Would you wrest the wreath of fame
From the hand of fate?
Would you write a deathless name
With the good and great?
Would you bless your fellow-men?
Heart and soul imbue
With the holy task, and then
Paddle your own canoe.

Would you crush the tyrant wrong,
In the world's free fight?
With a spirit brave and strong,
Battle for the right.
And to break the chains that bind
The many to the few;
To enfranchise slavish mind,
Paddle your own canoe.

Nothing great is lightly won;
Nothing won is lost;
Every good deed, nobly done,
Will repay the cost.
Leave to heaven, in humble trust,
All you will to do;
But if you succeed, you must
Paddle your own canoe.

THE "LOST" RED FOR GLASS PAINTING.—The whole secret of the production of red glass in every way equal to the ancient mode consists in this: though the deutoxide of copper, when melted with glass, gives a green or sky-blue colour, the protoxide gives the red in question; this, by reflected light, is dingy, but by transmitted light, beautifully splendid. Great skill and practice are required, to prevent the copper, while the glass is in fusion, from taking up the additional dose of oxygen, and thus passing from red to green. Again, glass, though containing the proper oxide of copper when first taken out of the pot, often shows only a dirty greenish hue; but if it be exposed for a few minutes to a dull red heat, a fine red tint will be thrown out. Modern artists use the red from silver, which was unknown to the ancients, but will not bear comparison with the old red.

Varieties.

COURAGE AND PATIENCE.

LIFE is sad, because we know it,
 Death, because we know it not;
 But we will not fret or murmur—
 Every man must bear his lot.
 Coward hearts, who shrink and fly,
 Are not fit to live or die!

Knowing Life, we should not fear it,
 Neither Death, for that's unknown:
 Courage, Patience—these are virtues
 Which for many sins atone:
 Who has these—and have not I?—
 He is fit to live and die!

WHEN the execrated Jeffries opened the assizes at Bristol, for the trial of the unfortunate rebels in Monmouth's expedition, he spoke in these terms: "I have brought a brush in my pocket, to rub off your dirt; I tell you I have brought a besom, with which I will sweep every man's door, within and without; for in good truth you were rubbing; the dirt of your ditch is in your nostrils."

KNIGHTS ROBBERS.—In the "Dietum de Kenilworth," made in the fifty-first year of the reign of Henry III., there is the following curious clause:—"Knights and esquires, who are robbers, and among the principal robbers in wars and plunderings, if they have no lands, but have goods, shall pay half of their goods for their redemption, and find sufficient surety henceforth to keep the peace of the king and kingdom."

A GENTLEMAN once observed to Mr. Beloe, the bibliographer, "that Mr. 'Tomus,' whose name was on the back of so many of his books, must certainly have been a man of wondrous erudition to have written so much!"

A JOLLY old doctor said that people who were prompt in their payments always recovered in their sickness, as they were good customers, and physicians could not afford to lose them.

BODY and mind have many points in common. An old epigram mentions one of these thus:

The mind, just like the stomach, takes
 Its food for pleasure, profit, use;
 Reflection all the virtue makes,
 And serves it for its gastric juice!

THE chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex one, and in prudently cultivating an undergrowth of small pleasures, since very few great ones are let on long leases.

CAN any philosopher explain to us how it is that brokers and others who deal in notes, mortgages, &c., consider these articles of merchandise valueless when they are cancelled? What we want to know is, why they cannot sell that which they can-cel?

THAT was a very learned and thoughtful mayor of Shrewsbury to whom Lord Mansfield remarked at dinner:—"Your town appears very old." To which his honour the mayor replied, "It was always so, please your lordship."

SIMPLY UNBEARABLE.—Viscount Williams never said a worse thing than this. He declared that the ruin of Big Ben was caused by two of the ancient tribes of Palestine—the Hammer-wrights and the Hittites.

AMONG the "Notices to Correspondents" in a journal not remarkable for its regard to propriety, there appeared the following: "DECENCY came too late to have a place in our paper this week." Another paper made an apology to its readers for postponing "births and deaths until next week."

WE know a very worthy wife who was recently half frightened out of her senses by an ominous sentence in a letter from her husband. He said, "There is no telegraph office in this village, but, if I do not write to you to-morrow from Pittsburg, I shall despatch you."

"At a social party in Cincinnati," writes a genial friend, "a young lawyer observed a young lady approaching whom he had had the misfortune to offend. He extended his hand, and exclaimed:—'Good evening, Mary.' 'Miss Mary, if you please,' said the young lady, bridling up at his familiarity. 'We can miss you, Mary, only when you are absent,' he replied, and they were soon reconciled. It is said that she will soon be missed no more."

"FATHER, are there any boys in parliament?" "No, my son—why do you ask that question?" "Because the papers said the other day that the members kicked Mr. Brown's Bill out of the house."

"COMMON taters," said Mrs. Partington to herself, as she waked out of a little nap into which she had been thrown on Sunday by a soporific preacher; "what has common taters to do with the gospel?" The preacher had alluded to some commentators, the odd sound of which tickled her ear and awakened her. "Common taters," she continued; "well, all sorts of taters are bad enough, and many of 'em are rotten, clean through; and if he is calling his hearers such names, heaven knows where he will stop. Common taters, indeed! I'll send him up a peck of uncom-ones-to-morrow, and show him that all of them ain't alike." She left the house with a very indefinite idea of what he meant, but determined to set him right on the potato question.

THE late Mr. John Jones being asked by a friend "how he kept himself from being involved in quarrels?" replied, "By letting the angry person have all the quarrel to himself."

A CHAP out West, who had been severely afflicted with the palpitation of the heart, says he found instant relief by the application of another palpitating heart to the part affected. Quite another triumph of Homeopathy—"like cures like."

"WELL, farmer, you told us your wood was a good place for hunting. Now, we've tramped through it for three hours, and found no game." "Just so. Well I calculate, as a general thing, the less game there is, the more hunting you have."

"BILLY, how did you lose your finger?" "Easily enough," said Billy. "I suppose you did, but how?" "I guess you'd a lost your'n, if it had been where mine was." "That don't answer my question!" "Well, if you must know," said Billy, "I had to cut it off, or else steal the trap."

THE Cockneys are always talking of their rights, and some strange ones they have among the number. "I have no right to pay more than my share. I have no right to be insulted, abused, kicked, knocked down, murdered." Such are common modes of cockney talking.

A YANKEE STORY.—An instance of absence of mind occurred a day or two since, where an explorer into the mysteries of chemical science burned his nose by a fluid lamp with which he came in contact. We met him a day or two afterwards, with a large plaster on his nose, and asked him about his hurt. "It looks bad, don't it?" said he. We assured him it didn't look anything else, and asked him if it hurt him much while it was roasting. "Ne'er a bit," replied he; "in fact, I didn't feel it at all, I was so absorbed in my experiments; and, though I kept smelling something like burned meat, I imagined it was a dinner cooking somewhere, and kept right on until my student told me my nose was on fire, and putting my hand upon it, I found that it was even so. I thrust it into a bucket of water and that extinguished it, but it has left the mark, you see."

LATEST ABOUT THE BELL.

Poor Mr. Warner
 Is put in the corner,
 For making a bad Big Ben;
 And now it appears
 That the good Mr. Mears
 Is to furnish a new Bell. When?

A MUSIC LESSON.—A Highland piper, having a scholar to teach, disdained to crack his brains with the names of semibreves, minims, crotchets, and quavers. "Here, Donald," said he, "tak' yer pipes, lad, and gie us a blast. So, verra weel blawn, indeed; but what's a sound, Donald, without sense? You may blow for ever without making a tune o't, if I dinna tell you how the queer things on the paper maun help you. You see that big fellow, wi' a round, open face (pointing to a semibreve, between two lines of a bar), he moves slowly from that line to this, while ye beat an' wi' your fist and gie a long blast; if, now, ye put a leg to him ye mak' twa o' him, and he'll move twice as fast; an' if ye black his face, he'll run four times faster than the fellow wi' the white face; but if, after blacking his face, ye'll bend his knee, or tie his leg, he'll hop eight times faster than the white-faced chap I showed you first. Now, when'er you blaw your pipes, Donald, remember this—that the tighter those fellows' legs are tied, the faster they'll run, and the quicker they're sure to dance."

GULIELMUS.

ARITHMETICAL.

A party of emigrants, 102 in number, were trying to form a colony, and, of course, went in search of water. They succeeded in finding a reservoir containing 1,000 gallons, which was fed by three different springs. One of these would, by its force, fill the reservoir (had it been empty) in 15 days, the other in 20 days, and the smallest in 30 days. How long would the 102 persons be before they were out of water, supposing that each required one gallon and a half per day?

Drawn Game.

(a) At the present stage of the game this move is not to be commended: it is, indeed, generally worse than useless to pin the K Kt thus before the adversary has castled.—(b) Well played; if White take it, Black, of course, takes Q B P with Q, checking.—(c) Q B P takes P, seems better play.—(d) Seeing that White had, during the last few moves, acquired a decidedly superior position, he acted injudiciously in permitting the exchange of Queens.—(e) This move, as well as Black's 29th, seems to be lost time.

Our Editorial Table.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE AND THE PUBLIC.—In order to give subscribers and the public every facility for procuring the numbers of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, New Series, we beg to inform them that the numbers of this new series, price One Penny each, will be on sale without increase of charge until further notice. All the back numbers of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, old series, can be had of the Publishers at the usual price of three halfpence a number.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.—As we have no doubt that the weekly numbers of our New Series will be carefully preserved for binding, we have had the cases for the First Volume prepared, so that they can be obtained at once and used as a portfolio for containing the numbers until the volume is completed, which it will be in future every six months, instead of twelve months, as heretofore. The price of the Cases, gilt lettered on side and back, will be 1s. 6d. each.

FLORENCE EMILY.—The "sorrowing mother" about whom you inquire, was Monica, distinguished alike for her parental affection and piety; and the son "for whom she prayed for twenty long and weary years," was Augustine, who, after a long course of profligacy, became a pious Christian, the Bishop of Hippo, and one of the most celebrated fathers of the Christian church. He was born in the year 354, and died seventy-six years afterwards.

OLIVE BRANCH.—Many "Olive Branches," of various families, among our readers, have applied to us, like our present correspondent, for information respecting their chances in "commercial houses" as clerks. We think, therefore, the few hints we give in answer to "Olive Branch," may interest many of our younger subscribers. Junior clerks—lads of sixteen and upwards—are continually required in mercantile houses in London and elsewhere; the custom in many firms being, when a clerk leaves their employ, to shift all those under him one step upward, and to take a new "junior" to begin, as it were, at the foot of the ladder, his duties at first not being very heavy. He has to copy letters; to act sometimes as messenger; to put away and bring out ledgers, &c.; and the qualifications he is expected to possess are,—Firstly, a good address and a neat appearance (for no one will have a slovenly clerk); secondly, a good handwriting; thirdly, some knowledge of accounts; and fourthly, a general aptitude to make himself useful, and to learn. He is taken, not for what he is, but in expectation that he may turn out well.

LOTTIE.—In a delicate lady's hand, writes the following questions:—

Was there ever a fair called the Forest Fair?
Was it held in the Forest of Dean, or where?
Is it kept up now, and continued there?
You will much oblige if you'll this declare.

We can only say in reply that—

In Epping Forest was Fairhol fair
But people used to get tipsy there,
And so 't was suppressed, they say, by the mayor,
And more than this we don't know—or care.

A CONSTANT READER.—The best preparation for singing is, in our opinion, first, to make sure you have a good voice; secondly, to refrain from overstraining it; and thirdly, not to spoil it by eating too many voice lozenges.

MORGAN.—The story you offer us about the "Idle Indian" is interesting enough, but may be described in the words of the nigger who was eulogising a porker of minute dimensions, he was endeavouring to sell at St. Louis, "Him berry little, massa, but him berry old!"

THEODORE.—Without any means of judging of our correspondent's abilities, we are unable to say whether he has a good chance of a situation in India. The only way of "making sure before starting," is to get appointed by a London house having a corresponding or branch house in Hindostan.

NENA SAHIB. desirous of killing a cat, must needs write to us for instructions. What has poor pussy done? and why should not Nena grant her a reprieve or even a free pardon? We indignantly refuse our advice to the sanguinary Sahib.

A SCHOOLBOY wants us to say whom we consider the greatest of modern generals? If, by modern generals, our correspondent means commanders of the present century, we should say, for vastness of genius and quickness of resource, Napoleon Bonaparte; for coolness, self-reliance, and steadiness of purpose, the late Duke of Wellington. In the last century, we should give Marlborough the preference for these reasons: he gained his victories under great disadvantages; the generals associated with him in command were generally incapable; the foreign troops mutinous; and the ministry at home often thwarted him. His renown rests not on a few brilliant achievements, but on a succession of well-planned and brilliantly executed measures.

A COUNTRY BUMPKIN is advised to refrain from using antimony in fattening his hogs. The success of the practice is exceedingly doubtful, and we should decidedly object to partake of a porker fed on such a system.

WRITER.—A précis is a short summary or abstract from official papers. The rules you have to observe in writing it, are—Firstly, to make your abstract complete, omit no essential point. Secondly, avoid every superfluous word, for brevity is a great feature in a good précis. Thirdly, let your sentences be short and clear.

B. C.—Thanks for "Elsie Gray."

AMANDA MALVINA.—Poorness of blood is the cause.

JOHN B.—You are utterly wrong, and will do well to discard the notion as soon as possible.

TANSWELL.—The sentences are too abusive for translation.

CORNEY RAGG.—You are too old; try the merchant service.

H. F.—Both terms are correct.

WILLIE.—Our advice is, that you give up all idea of a seaman's life. Your notions of its duties and enjoyments are evidently taken from maritime novels, which give only the stirring incidents which occur like angels' visits—at long intervals. No mention is there made of the monotonous, toilsome every-day life. You are much too old to commence such a career now, and had better digest your discontent, and stick to your trade, which is a very good one. You would find the life of a sailor boy on the great, free ocean, the reverse of free; nor is there much that is great about it, except, perhaps, the amount of work expected from the unhappy apprentices.

EL TIO TOMAS.—Age is not so much regarded as height. Consult an Army List. Your questions are too numerous.

SAM SLICK.—Your suggestion shall receive all attention. Handwriting excusable.

R. W. wishes to know, "What age is the most suitable for getting married?"—That at which you can support a wife, know her value, and your own mind.

PLEXTUS SOLUS is tenderly persecuted by a gentleman whose friendship she wishes, and would grieve to lose, but whom she could not marry, and whom she, therefore, wishes to spare the pain of a refusal, which must follow the offer she sees impending. Actuated by courtesy, she has replied to the letters addressed to her; and she fears that this concession, although prompted solely by civility, may be considered indicative of a warmer feeling, and mislead the recipient. Under these circumstances, she asks our advice. It is simply this (and, judging from the easy flow of her letter to us, "Plextus" will find no difficulty in following it): to answer her correspondent's next letter in such a strain as he cannot mistake; and, without replying to a question which has not been asked, frame the language so as to show plainly what the answer would be if it were.

E. J. T.—However disgraceful the bridegroom's conduct may have been in deserting his bride, it does not exonerate her from her duties and his claim. She cannot marry again; nor, unless she is a bolder woman than ordinary, would she, after past experience, we should think, wish it.

J. B. compliments us very highly in promising to abide by our advice upon an exceedingly delicate subject—no less than the propriety of engaging himself to a very young lady, whom for six years there is no probability of his being able to marry. We are duly impressed with and gratified by our correspondent's confidence and promise, although fearful that when he reads our advice he will hesitate to take it, since it is, to relinquish by all means his wish to enter into the engagement he suggests. Six years is a long engagement for any girl, especially so young a one as "J. B.'s" adored, and to a lover so juvenile as himself. A thousand things may occur to render the fulfilment of the compact unwise or impossible. It would therefore, we think, be unkind, if not dishonourable, to the lady to fetter her. She might, and in all probability would, keep her truth faithfully, but would he? Is he sure of himself?

HENRI.—You must choose for yourself; there are plenty advertised.

WINNIE WILDFLOWER.—Verses to my infant son are too long, would have tired the little boy, and made him cry; if a little shorter, would have done very well indeed. Try again.

A NOVICE.—Either you have misstated the question, or somebody has been hoaxing you.

VIOLETTA.—Wait patiently; any attempt to bring matters to a crisis will only end ill. If the man loves you, he will find some better way of telling you than simply turning pale when he hears your name mentioned.

BILLY O'RORKE.—A good wife should, so far as it is possible for a fallible human being to be perfect, be so: for certainly no two-footed creature under the sun has greater need of perfection. She should have good temper, good health, and good sense; be cheerful, not giddy; frugal, not mean; active, not bustling; affectionate, not demonstrative; gentle, not weak; pretty, not conceited; accomplished, not pedantic; everything, in short, which Man, her lord and master, in his varying moods, wishes and desires. As to how his lordship may discover whether such a being truly loves him or not, we cannot tell. We should think he needs be under no anxiety on the subject: she would surely be only too grateful for his notice; but to assure himself positively of the fact, he, like the honourable head of his race in the east, need only throw the handkerchief.

TELEGRAM.—Your friend would be an Irishman, of course. Suppose he had been born in a stable, would he be a horse?

EDGARDO RUBINI.—No.

ECONOMIST.—We regret being unable to give you a safe receipt for cleaning ermine. There are many things said to be good for the purpose, but none that we ever tried answered. The best way of having furs cleaned, is to send them to some respectable shop where they undertake such things. It is too costly an article to try experiments upon.

JOSEPHINE.—You should have let your hair and forehead alone. People who want to mend nature generally mar her. Why isn't a low forehead as good as a high one? The latter is only prized as being indicative of intellect, and what sort of intellect can a person be supposed to possess who snips off her hair until a perfect forest of bristles, a regular scrubbing-brush, comes, where soft and wavy tresses were before? Let the poor, tormented brow alone. It may come right in time, although we are by no means sure of it.

ELLEN FORRESTER is referred to our answer to "Josephine," and counselled to take warning from the predicament into which that improver of nature has brought herself.

ARGYLE MACNAMARA.—If your lady-love is in a position to give from her own purse money to a church collection, it would be extremely officious in you to offer to do so for her. There is no objection to your presenting to her any gift wrapped as you receive it from the shop, provided all marks or figures which could betray the cost are obliterated.

WELSH BESSY must pardon our declining to acquiesce in her request. So far as the questions affect herself or society generally, she is quite as capable of answering them as ourselves or the gentleman alluded to; so far as they are merely personal to him, neither "Bessy" nor we have any right to ask information from him.

ARTICLED PUPIL will find his question answered about twenty times throughout our last numbers.

ANTIMACASSAR.—Try an infusion of rosemary as a wash; we have known it answer.

H. T.—"Cassell's Illustrated Almanack" has been re-printed, and we think you will now have no difficulty in obtaining it of any bookseller.

A LOVER OF JUSTICE.—We are not aware of any difference existing between the English and Scottish law which would prevent an officer charging bystanders to assist him in securing a prisoner, or would prevent him from being responsible before a justice of the peace for undue violence towards any person in his custody.

CASSELL'S MASTERPIECE had better let counsel be instructed at the trial to apply to the court for additional allowance, on account of the distance he will have travelled.

RARA AVIS IN TERRA.—Five per centum per annum is the highest interest that can be charged when landed property is included in the security: any larger sum may be obtained on mere personal security, as in discounts, bills, or notes.

C. F.—Shorthand depends on practice. There are several systems of almost equal merit.

DUFFER.—Use the coarsest oil colours that can be procured.

CLARA.—The law of debtor and creditor, and its operation in Australia and Canada with regard to debt, may vary according to the peculiar circumstances of the case. You had better, therefore, consult some respectable settler, versed in colonial law, and explain your position explicitly to him. He will advise you better than our space will enable us to do. The law of arrest in our colonies is different from that in use here.

J. B., F. K., W. H. G., A. D., and others.—The Second Volume of "Cassell's Illustrated History of England," the text by William Howitt, will be ready in a few days. It contains about 300 engravings, and sells in cloth boards, for six shillings. The period included in this volume extends from the beginning of the reign of Edward IV. to the death of Queen Elizabeth.

SUFFERER.—Throw the quack stuff into the fire, or out of window, and use cold water instead.

ABERNETHY must state whether he wants to become a physician or a surgeon.

THOMAS WILLIAMS.—State your requirements in a few simple words. There are plenty of advertisements in the morning papers which will serve you as models. Don't make your advertisement too long.

A LEARNER.—Your question is too elaborate; we must decline.

LILY DALE.—We have perused your letter with much interest and attention, and so far as we can, in this brief space, will answer it to the best of our ability. We are not at all surprised at your dissatisfaction with the amount of learning you have acquired at school; few intelligent girls are ever content with the modicum they gain there, but we would entreat them to remember that they have at least obtained one valuable art, that of knowing how to learn, and that this art they should, during succeeding hours of leisure, improve to the utmost. At school, people learn the alphabet, as it were, of many things; at home they should progress in, and perfect them. Languages especially, learned from tutors, should be thoroughly studied alone, and made the means whereby the history, biography, and science of the people who speak it, may be acquired. Drawing, necessarily confined in schools to formal copies and plaster models, may, and ought to be, studied at home from nature. And so with everything connected with the purely intellectual part of a woman's education. But let our fair readers never forget that their minds are not all they have to cultivate. A clever, i.e., book-learned woman, is not always either a pleasant, happy, or useful one. To our wives, mothers, and sisters, God has given fingers which need teaching, hearts which need cultivation and training, affections which need guiding and improving, and if these are left untended and untought, all the intellectuality in the world will not compensate for the loss. In the feminine occupations which adorn a home, there is nothing derogatory to the brightest genius or the loftiest intellect; and how much more fascinating and attractive is the girl who, bringing to her aid the powers of a well cultivated mind, assists her mother in household duties, makes her father the savoury dish he loves, mends her little brother's clothes, and sings the big one the song he would seek elsewhere, than the blue lady who, from the grand height of her uselessness, looks down upon ill-made dresses, rent garments, disappointed faces, and at last lonely firesides, as things at which she may grumble, but with which she has no connection. Let "Lily Dale," then, cultivate her mind by forming intimate acquaintance with the best standard authors she can procure; but at the same time, and quite as zealously, let her cultivate her home qualities, her powers of usefulness, her Christianity.

GULIELMUS.—Thanks for your letter; you are right.

A BRITISH SUBJECT.—California is rather an unpromising place for a search after a brother from whom you have not heard for five years. The only method we can suggest is that you should apply to some mercantile firm having correspondents at San Francisco, to get an advertisement put into a San Francisco paper (several are published there). We think, however, the chances are rather against you.

A FACTORY LAD, ANXIOUS FOR IMPROVEMENT.—We cannot offer you better encouragement than to direct your attention to the career of that intrepid African traveller Dr. Livingstone. At ten years of age he was a piecer in a cotton factory, working, excepting the intervals for meals, from six in the morning till eight at night. With part of the first week's wages he purchased "Rudiments of Latin." "At sixteen," he says, "I knew Virgil and Horace better than I do now." It is within the power of every youth who has this noble aspiration, to acquire a good solid education. For the attainment of a thorough knowledge of the English language, there is no work to compare with Fowler's, which forms one volume of "Cassell's Educational Course." Bound in cloth, the book costs three-and-sixpence; but for the convenience of such as the "Factory Lad," the "Course" is issued in weekly numbers, price three-halfpence.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

First Grave-digger. But is this law?

Second Grave-digger. Ay, marry is't; crowner's-quest law.—HAMLET.

NEVER in the memory of that greatly talked-of personage, the oldest inhabitant of the place, had so much excitement been witnessed in St. Faith's, or such general horror felt, as at the death of the keeper, and he unlucky soldier slain within an hour after his return to his native village; slain with the words 'welcome home!' ringing in his ears, the grasp of friendship warm upon his hand. It is true there had frequently been disturbances before: rough contests with the gamekeepers, blows exchanged, and shots on one occasion fired; but this time the contest had ended in death, through the obstinacy and pride of one wrong-headed man.

Horror and excitement were not the only feelings publicly expressed. Deep sympathy for poor old Simon—for the helpless child thus cast upon his bounty, and strong indignation against the lord of the manor for the part he had taken in the affray, were mingled with them; and justly so, for the exclusive rights of Sir Norman Boothroyd to the sporting over the common were questionable, to say the least of them; and yet two lives had been sacrificed, two humble homes made desolate.

If the name of the baronet had previously been unpopular in the neighbourhood, it was now execrated; a public meeting was called, the first time such a thing had ever been attempted in St. Faith's, and subscriptions entered into by the tenantry, in order to try the long-disputed question between themselves and their overbearing landlord who heard of their intentions with ill-concealed rage and mortification, for he had long since taken legal opinions on the subject himself, and they had been unfavourable.

Whilst the agitation of the rustic population of St. Faith's was at its height, the coroner arrived to hold his inquest on the bodies. Several county magistrates also attended, and amongst others, Mr. Thornton and Squire Blundell. As the former gentleman drove up to the village inn, he was loudly cheered by the crowd of farmers and others gathered in front of the house.

"Sad affair," he said, addressing those nearest to him, as he alighted, "very sad!"

"We'll have our rights!" exclaimed the crowd, "we are sure to have justice now you are come; you have always been the poor man's friend."

"And shall continue so," replied the gentleman, "as long as he respects the laws. Let me entreat," he added, "that there may be no disturbance. Do not give your enemies, if you have any, such an advantage over you."

BARNY GEE'S CHILD AND THE STEWARD.

With this caution he passed on.

Far different was the reception Sir Norman Boothroyd experienced. No sooner was his carriage seen to emerge from the park gates, than a succession of groans and yells saluted him. His first impulse was to return to the hall; but pride, the dread of encountering the sneers of his wife, restrained him from it, and he passed through the crowd pale as death, expecting every moment that violence would be offered. It was not till he found himself in the club-room, where the inquest was to be held, that he recovered from his fears. To Mr. Thornton he bowed stiffly, but extended his hand to his brother magistrate, who touched it slightly; for although a keen sportsman himself, he had always disapproved of the dogged tenacity with which his neighbour held out for his manorial rights on the common.

Squire Blundell never looked upon rabbits as game; in fact, he had a profound contempt for rabbits.

The first death inquired into was that of Springthorp, the keeper.

As our readers may naturally suppose, not one of the party so fatally implicated in the affair presented themselves as witnesses, for fear of compromising themselves, and Sir Norman had taken care they should not be summoned. The consequence was that his testimony and that of the keepers was the only evidence heard. More than one lip curled in scorn when the baronet swore that the poachers fired first upon his party before the volley was returned which caused the death of Barny Gee; and several not very complimentary murmurs were heard in the crowd which occupied the lower end of the room—manifestations which the coroner soon quieted.

"Can you identify any of these misguided men, Sir Norman?" inquired the coroner.

"Not one of them," was the reply.

By a singular coincidence, the keepers were equally unable to name or even to describe the person of a single individual amongst their assailants; and yet the moon had been shining brightly all the time they were watching their proceedings from their place of concealment in the ditch.

"Well," whispered Squire Blundell in the ear of his brother magistrate, "that be what I call extraordinary! Boothroyd be acting more kindly than I tried an credit for."

Thornton smiled: he fully appreciated the kindness of the baronet.

"To be sure," added the speaker, "they were only after the rabbits."

The last witness examined was Dr. Phrase, an exceedingly pompous little man, famous for his verbosity, who had considerably consented for the last thirty years to hide the light of his genius in the obscure village of St. Faith's. Not that he was without ambition; on the contrary, he possessed more than an ordinary share of that peculiarly impulsive quality: but the opportunity of distinguishing himself by blazoning his attainments to the world had all his life been wanting. The inquest at last presented one—for the proceedings were sure to be reported both in the local and London papers—and he resolved to make the most of it.

Having been sworn, the disciple of Æsculapius gathered his strength like a Titan for the display.

"Your name, I believe, is Phrase?" said the coroner, as he turned over a fresh page to continue his notes.

"Dionysius Phrase, Doctor of Medicine, and Member of the Royal College of Surgeons," replied the witness.

"You examined the body of the deceased?"

"I did."

"Will you describe the result of your examination to the jury?"

The little man placed his hand upon his breast and bowed profoundly, next regarded the magistrates to fix their attention, then coughed once or twice to clear his throat, and commenced giving his evidence: "Perceiving two wounds on the body of the subject—one in the abdominal, the other in the pectoral region—I at once proceeded, secundum artem—"

"And what did these go to be for?" interrupted the foreman of the jury, a respectable, shrewd-looking farmer, who had paid most earnest attention to the proceedings throughout.

"Go to whom?" inquired the witness, slightly put out.

"To Secundum Artem," replied the old man, knitting his gray, bushy eyebrows, and looking angry at what he considered an attempt to prevaricate. "Thee saidst thee had been there, doctor, and I'll hold thee to it."

His brother jurors nodded approval.

Phrase blandly explained to them that, in scientific nomenclature, secundum artem simply meant according to the rules of art.

The honest farmer did not feel quite satisfied till he saw that Mr. Thornton appeared to be so, when, nodding to the speaker, he told him to go on.

"As I was about to state," resumed the witness, "I made a crucial incision, which laid bare the muscles of the abdomen; this enabled me to trace distinctly the course which the slug or shot had taken. It had, I discovered, passed through the peritoneum, without injuring the intestines."

The man of science paused, and looked around him to witness the effect his description had produced, which gave occasion for the foreman of the jury to attack him again.

"Does thee mean to swear, doctor, that poor Tom Springthorp was shot thro' a pair, pair—what did you call them?"

"Peritoneum," said the gentleman, helping him out.

"That be the word!" exclaimed the farmer, in a tone of triumph, for he felt certain that he had fixed the speaker this time. "I tell 'ee he wor shot in a fustian jacket. I seed him myself afore he wor moved off the common."

Great was the worthy man's astonishment when made to comprehend that peritoneum was the name of that thin, soft membrane which envelops the intestines.

"Well," said the farmer, "only to think of my living to these years and never knowed that I had such a thing afore."

"The deceased did not die from the injury in the abdomen, then?" observed the coroner.

"Certainly not," replied Dr. Phrase; "so I at once proceeded to examine the heart and lungs. The latter appeared healthy, that is to say, comparatively healthy; a slight state of peripneumonia, perhaps, but nothing serious. The wound which caused his death was in the heart. I traced the course of the slugs; they had perforated the pericardium, which I found distended with blood, and had torn the right ventricle."

As there were no more witnesses to be heard, the coroner proceeded to sum up, which he did clearly and dispassionately, pointing out that it had been distinctly proved by the evidence of Sir Norman Boothroyd and his servants, that the poachers had fired first; that the deceased was engaged in his lawful occupation or calling at the time he received the injury which had caused his death; and concluded by calling on the jury to dismiss from their minds any personal feelings or prejudices they might entertain, and return a verdict according to the evidence they had heard.

Those whom he addressed were conscientious men, to whom an oath was a solemn thing. After an hour's deliberation, a verdict of "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown," was pronounced, amid the breathless silence of the court. Many a heart beat wildly as the hearers heard it, but not one who could have contradicted the evidence of the baronet and the keepers stepped forward from the crowd.

Murder! it was like the sword of Damocles suspended over the head of each one of the party.

In describing the cause of the death of Barny Gee, Doctor Phrase had to be less technical. The charge, which consisted entirely of swan shot, had lodged in the poor fellow's lungs, hence the suffocation from hemorrhage before he could make his last wishes known to Farmer Minter.

The feeling of sympathy was both general and deep when Simon gave his evidence—described the unexpected return of his brother; the joy of their meeting; his hastening to the cottage with the child; his return to join the ringers in the belfry; and Barny's quitting him to seek his former companions on the common.

"Do you know the names of those companions?" inquired the coroner.

"I know nothing," answered the old man, wiping away a tear, "but that I have lost my only brother. He could have had nothing to do with the poachers," he added—"if they were poachers—for he was unarmed."

"Can you swear that?" demanded Sir Norman's lawyer.

"I can swear that he was when he left me," replied the bell-ringer.

One of the jurors inquired if any powder or shot had been found upon the body. The constables produced all that had been discovered, a silver watch and seven pounds.

"And this discharge," added Simon, handing the blood-stained parchment to one of the officers. "I should like it to be read in court. It's a poor satisfaction—but still it is one: Barny was no deserter."

The document attesting the honourable character of the deceased, was handed first to the jury and to the coroner, who passed it to the magistrate. Mr. Thornton was the last to read it, which he did aloud. Just as he was about to return it, he discovered some writing, nearly obliterated by the recent stains; but, by holding it at a certain distance, he was enabled to make it out.

"This is singular!" he exclaimed.

There was a general movement of surprise.

"The bearer, Barny Gee, served under me in the Punjaub Horse, and twice saved my life. Knowing no other means of showing my gratitude, I write this certificate in the hope that it may one day be useful to him."

(Signed) "Lieutenant BOOTHROYD."

The countenance of the baronet became deadly pale. It was the signature of his younger brother.

The half-subdued murmurs of execration which fell upon his ear, told him how deep was the disgust his conduct had inspired.

"I believe it to be an impudent forgery!" he exclaimed.

"That be easily proved, Norman," said Squire Blundell; "there be old Blackmore, who taught ye both to write."

The parchment was handed to the village schoolmaster, who, after a careful examination, declared himself ready to make oath that it was the handwriting of his former pupil, Allan Boothroyd.

Again the coroner summed up, but far more elaborately than he had done before, for the case had assumed an appearance likely to attract public attention. The jury retired, and after an hour's absence, returned a verdict of wilful murder against Sir Norman Boothroyd and the keepers.

It was received with a tremendous cheer by the crowd of farmers and yeomen who filled the room.

"I can't receive it, gentlemen," said the officer, as soon as he could obtain silence. "There is not a tittle of evidence to justify it; not a magistrate in the county would act upon it. Sir Norman and his servants were legally in the right; they fired in self-defence. The deceased, even if unarmed, was aiding and abetting others in the performance of an illegal act."

"If Springthorp wor murdered," replied the foreman, "so wor poor Barny."

"Nothing of the kind, I tell you," repeated the coroner. "You must reconsider your verdict."

The jury once more retired, and after a still longer absence, consented that their finding should be an open one—"That the deceased was found shot, but under what circumstances there was not sufficient evidence before them to judge of."

As to a verdict of justifiable homicide, they firmly refused to pronounce it.

This still left the death of Barny an open question.

Great was the excitement and dissatisfaction amongst the crowd. In the midst of it Sir Norman wisely stole away, and had regained his carriage before his departure was noticed by his tenantry. For the first time in his life, perhaps, he experienced regret, such regret as the heartless and egotistical feel who have compromised their own dear safety; nor was it till he had held a long consultation with his lawyer that he recovered anything like his usual composure.

Lady Boothroyd was the person who felt most annoyed, although, true to the part she had accepted, she echoed her husband's feelings and opinions in the presence of his legal adviser; but when alone with him, she freely expressed her real sentiments on his egregious folly, as she unhesitatingly pronounced it, in sacrificing the proper influence he ought to possess over his tenantry for a shadow.

"It will require all my tact," she observed, "to undo the mischief you have done with your antiquated ideas of manorial rights, and miserable squabbles for a few worthless rabbits."

"I tell you it was a pheasant this time," urged the baronet, in a tone of submission.

The lady shrugged her shoulders.

"You heard Marshal admit that I was in my right."

"Legal right," said his wife, with a marked emphasis on the word legal. "Of course he admitted it; and did you ever find a lawyer yet to pronounce a rich client in the wrong? The question, I hear, will soon be decided, for the tenantry have entered into a subscription, to try it."

"I shall defend my rights," exclaimed the lord of the manor, "to my last guinea."

"And so make your name still more ridiculous."

"Lady Boothroyd!"

"You must do nothing of the kind," continued her ladyship, without being in the slightest degree moved by the tone of offended dignity in which he had pronounced her name. "I must take the affair into my own hands and try what conciliation will do. A pretty dénouement to this ridiculous dispute, to have the mansion fired over our heads, or be shot at in our own grounds by some desperate poacher, bent on seeking revenge: such I foresee will be the end of your obstinacy."

The speaker's belief in the truth of her predictions may be regarded as somewhat more than questionable, but they produced the effect she intended, of completely terrifying her husband, whose courage she well knew to be tempered by more than a usual share of prudence and personal consideration.

Sir Norman muttered something about her having her own way, and shut himself up in the library for the rest of the day.

Lady Boothroyd was one of those persons, as our readers begin to be aware, who, having once made up their minds upon any subject, never suffer their decision to remain a dead letter, but proceed to act upon it at once. A groom was instantly despatched to the home farm to request the attendance of Andrew Sillex, the steward, a tall, gaunt, aged man, whom Sir Norman, to the great surprise of all who knew him, still continued in the management of his estate. Some thought it was out of consideration for his long services; others knew not what to think.

Having given her orders to her messenger, the mistress of Meldown Park sat down quietly to consider her plans, in which pleasing occupation we must leave her for awhile, and return to poor Simon and his orphan niece.

The cottage of the bell-ringer had scarcely been free a single instant the entire day from the well-meant visits of sympathising friends. Many a rough but honest hand had been pressed to his, and offers of assistance made; but the old man gratefully declined them all: not from pride—for he was one of the humblest, as well as simplest creatures upon God's earth—but affection. He would bury poor Barny, he said, himself: it was the last proof of love he could ever show him, and no one should share it with him, or assist in the task of protecting his orphan child.

His better half, Hester—who was one of the most prudent and notable wives in St. Faith's—approved of his resolution. Having no children of her own, the kind-hearted woman had taken a sudden affection for the helpless creature thus unexpectedly thrown upon her care. It was something for her to love; and most of us know what that means.

One circumstance embarrassed the worthy couple: Lillian spoke but very little English, and neither the weaver nor his wife understood a word of Hindostani.

The inmates of the cottage were seated by the fire; Simon, with his niece upon his knee on one side of the tea-table, and Hester on the other, when a gentle tap was heard at the door.

"Come in," cried the bell-ringer.

The latch was raised, and the steward shuffled into the room.

The appearance of the man was quite as remarkable as his character: so for the benefit of our readers we shall attempt to sketch both to them.

Andrew Sillex, before age had bowed his thin, ungainly person, must have stood at least six feet high. Winter and summer his dress was the same: buckskin breeches, top boots, and a bluebody-coat with brass buttons. No one had ever seen him in any other costume—in fact, it was his boast that he had never worn trousers or shoes in his life. Good-natured people said it was because he had inherited the wardrobe of his old master, the former baronet—nearly as eccentric a personage as himself. There certainly was a mouldy sort of air about him, as if his clothes had been kept in the charnel-house instead of a wholesome Christian-like chest of drawers till he required them; and his features conveyed the same disagreeable impression.

Imagine a parchment skin drawn over a skull scarcely larger than that of a boy of sixteen; high cheekbones, small gray eyes, prominent nose, and thin, fleshless lips which, when he laughed, or what was more commonly the case with him, indulged in a chuckle, displayed a set of teeth a shark might have envied; they were so regular, white, and pointed.

Notwithstanding these peculiarities, the steward was rather liked than not by the tenantry. No one spoke more freely of Sir Norman than he did; but although he frequently blamed his orders as harsh and illiberal, he obeyed them to the very letter: duty was one thing, and sympathy another. He had a kind word to bestow on all who came to him,—to be sure it was all he ever did bestow: for although known to be rich, he was exceedingly chary of parting with his money—in fact, he had very little occasion to spend any. The home farm supplied him with all he required for his table; as for dress, as we said before, he had inherited the wardrobe of Sir Norman's predecessor.

"Ah, Mr. Sillex, is that you?" exclaimed Simon, in a tone of surprise; "what brings you here?"

"I come to condole with you, my good friend," replied the visitor, unceremoniously drawing a chair and taking a seat near the fire. "You really seem very comfortable here," he added, looking round the neatly furnished room. "But, no wonder, the rent you pay is merely nominal."

"No thanks to your master," observed Hester, tartly.

"You are quite right there," said the old man. "Bless me," he added, fixing his eyes upon Lillian, "is that poor Barny's child?"

"It is indeed," answered the weaver, kissing her.

The steward regarded her long and earnestly; then he broke into a low but lengthened chuckle.

"She is very pretty," he said.

"That she is," answered the gratified aunt.

"And good," added Simon.

"Do you think her much like your brother?"

"I suppose she resembles his wife," said the bell-ringer, "for I can't trace the slightest resemblance to her father."

Andrew Sillex smiled.

"Not that I shall love her the less on that account."

"Of course not."

Hester, who began to get tired of being catechised, gave her visitor a broad hint, that both herself and her husband were in deep affliction, and did not care for company.

"Of course you do not," replied the old man, without displaying the slightest feeling of anger; a proof of what excellent discipline, both moral and physical, his mind and features were under. "But I came on business."

"Business with us!"

"Yes, Sir Norman, who is not so bad, that is, not quite so bad as you imagine him, is deeply distressed at the melancholy death of your brother, and has directed me to inform you that he intends to pay all the funeral expenses himself."

"He won't," answered Simon, greatly agitated.

"But I tell you that he does," said the steward.

"And I tell you that he shan't!" exclaimed Hester Gee; "not if my husband has to ply the shuttle from morning till night, and I sell the last gown from my back; not that there is the least fear of that. Why, what is the man staring at?" she added.

"You refuse!"

"Refuse!" repeated the mistress of the cottage, indignantly. "Now don't you put yourself out of the way, Simon. Leave me to talk to him. Refuse with scorn! We have refused the help of those whom it would have been no shame to have been beholden to—kind friends and neighbours, people with hearts of flesh and blood, and warm Christian feelings in them. Refused it because we wished to show our love to poor Barny by putting him in the grave at our own expense; and do you imagine we are going to accept a penny from his murderer?"

"Murder is a very serious word, Mrs. Gee—a very serious word," observed her visitor: "it was no murder."

"God will call it so," said the bell-ringer, solemnly, "for the blood of poor and rich, gentle and simple, is equal in His eyes. I'd rather be like poor Barny there," he added, pointing to the inner room where the body had been placed, "than change places with Sir Norman Boothroyd."

"You are wrong, my good friend—believe me, you are wrong," replied Andrew Sillex. "The baronet may not be what we should consider a good man—in fact, between ourselves, I don't mind saying that I look upon him rather as a bad one—but he is incapable of the crime you name. I know him well: he wouldn't have the pluck to do it. Her ladyship is very much distressed at what has occurred; and I have no doubt but she will do something handsome—very handsome, for the child, especially when she sees what a pretty, interesting little creature she is: send her to school, perhaps—or take her entirely off your hands," he added.

"I know it's not my lady's fault," said Hester. "Every one is aware that she has not a will of her own."

Here the messenger of Lady Boothroyd gave a short dry cough to hide his inclination to indulge in one of his usual chuckles.

"But I couldn't part with Lillian," continued the speaker, "even to her. We can work for her; can't we, Simon?"

"That we can," replied the weaver, approvingly.

"You refuse all assistance, then?" demanded the steward.

"All."

"Both for the expenses of the funeral and for the child?"

"Both for the expenses of the funeral and the child," repeated husband and wife.

"If you should repent it, you know where to find me," observed the old man, rising to take his leave.

"We shan't repent it."

"I only said 'if.' Servants, you know, are obliged to execute the orders of their master. Of course, you cannot bear me any ill-will for what has taken place?"

"None in the least," observed Simon Gee, extending his hand with honest frankness towards his visitor, who grasped it most affectionately in his long bony claws, and wished him good night.

As he shuffled out of the cottage, he cast another long and searching glance upon Lillian, as if he wished to impress every feature of her innocent face upon his memory.

Although the hour was getting late, Andrew Sillex, instead of returning to the home farm, walked to the Hall, and had a long and private interview with Lady Boothroyd, to whom he related the result of his visit.

"Insolent!" exclaimed her ladyship, in a tone of vexation. "It is not often that I condescend to conciliation. I shall take no further means to serve them."

"Yes, you will," said the steward.

"Speak plainly, man; I detest enigmas," replied the mistress of Meldown Park. "What mean you?"

"You have not seen the child yet."

"What child?" demanded the haughty woman, impatiently.

"The dead soldier's—Barny Gee's. He brought it with him from India. Poor little thing!" he continued, "it is an orphan now; so young—so interesting!"

The hypocritical tone, and affected interest of the speaker for the orphan, did not deceive his hearer. But all her endeavours to draw any further explanation from him were useless. The only reply the old man made to her numerous questions was—

"See her yourself; you ought to see her."

So singular were his words, and still more the look that accompanied them, they produced the effect he intended, of exciting the curiosity of the mistress of Meldown Park; and she resolved to visit the cottage immediately after the funeral of Barny Gee.

CHAPTER VIII.

Patience! for I have wrong,
And dare not show wherein;
Patience shall be my song,
Since truth can nothing win.
Patience then for this fit;
Hereafter come not yet.

SIR THOMAS WYATT, written in the Tower.

LONG before any one in the house was stirring, Richard Markham was up and examining the room in which he had passed the night a prisoner. All idea of danger or violence being intended to himself had vanished—he had nothing to lose; and yet he scarcely felt less wretched, for his thoughts were of those whom he had left in want and misery. His mother's sorrow, he well knew, must have been increased by the agony and suspense his absence had occasioned. Poor Mary, too, what would he not have given to have ascertained her state?

His first care, on quitting the comfortable bed, was to raise the window. The view, like most views from the back of London houses, was a cheerless one—a wilderness of roofs, chimney-pots, and tiles, on which the sparrows were hopping and chirping as merrily as if there were no such things as green fields, trees, or pleasant lanes. The youth regarded them with a feeling of envy—for they were at liberty, he a prisoner.

The height of the window from the ground was at least sixty feet; to descend from it without a ladder or a rope, impossible. Had Jack Manders been in a similar situation, in all probability he would have manufactured the last from the sheets and curtains of the bed, for he was a lad of uncommon fertility of invention, and had been trained in a different school from our hero. His uncle had made Newgate gymnastics, as they are called in the profession, a branch of his education.

The prisoner raised his eyes to the roof, which projected over the wall, at a distance far beyond his reach, even if he had possessed the nerve to trust himself to it.

Disappointed in his hopes of escape that way, Richard next directed his attention towards the door, a good solid one, and tried the lock, which resisted all his efforts to force it.

"I must cut the wood-work from the catch," he thought; "it is my only chance."

He had a knife in his pocket, and he set to work most resolutely. How his last night's companion would have smiled had he seen the useless labour and the pile of chips which gradually accumulated on the floor. With a knife, or even a rusty nail, he would have undertaken to pick a much stronger lock than the one which held our hero a prisoner.

The poor boy laboured so earnestly that in a very short time he came to one of the screws which held the lock, when the blade broke. His last hope was gone.

Overcome with vexation and disappointment, he threw himself upon the bed, and buried his face in the pillow to hide the tears he felt ashamed of.

Two hours later, when the servant brought him his breakfast, he looked uncommonly surprised at the proofs of the prisoner's industry, but made no observation, his master having forbidden him strictly either to ask or answer any question. He arranged the things quietly upon the table, and quitted the room, locking the door carefully after him.

When, at a later period of the day, the lawyer visited his charge, he found him sitting mournfully by the window; the breakfast on the table untasted.

"This is foolish, my poor boy," he observed, in a kindly tone.

"You may keep me here," replied our hero, firmly; "but can't compel me to eat."

"Hunger will compel you," answered the gentleman, "as it has done hardened and resolute men who have made a similar resolve, and broken it. You have never felt what hunger really is."

His prisoner gave a sickly smile. "In its first stages," continued Mr. Morton, "probably it may have been familiar to you, but not in its last, when the gnawing pain becomes agony—madness; in which parents have been known to destroy the infant they could no longer nourish at their tortured breasts; the shipwrecked mariner to sacrifice the life of the comrade by his side, which a few hours before he would have risked his own to save. This is folly—utter folly. Why distress those who wish you well?"

"I cannot eat," exclaimed Richard Markham, "and know that those I love are starving!"

"You allude to your mother and sister?"

"Yes."

"They will be taken care of—doubtless are by this time; for the gentleman who has taken an interest in you, promised me that such should be the case; and he is one who never breaks his word."

"Bless him!" said the youth, in a tone of deep emotion. "O bless him for that!—but if he is so benevolent, why am I detained here?"

"For your good."

Richard regarded him doubtfully. "And the good of those who are dearest to you," observed his visitor. "Your benefactor is a man of vast wealth, but rather eccentric in his mode of acting and thinking. He has ascertained that your story is a true one—more; learnt that which you carefully concealed from him."

"Concealed from him?" repeated our hero, with surprise.

"Yes: the drunken habits of your father."

The prisoner coloured deeply.

"Which caused the poverty, misery, and degradation, not only of his wife, but children."

"It was not my place, sir, to speak of the failings of a parent."

"Right," said the gentleman, approvingly. "I have no doubt but we shall perfectly understand each other in time. The friend whom Providence has so unexpectedly raised up for you at the moment when you stood upon the verge of crime acts not as ordinary minds would act. He has determined to withdraw you from the debasing influence of such an example—to educate you and provide for you, on one condition."

"Name it, sir."

"That you consent to quit London for the residence of a clergyman in a distant part of the kingdom, who receives only six pupils, and—"

"Quit London without seeing my mother!" exclaimed the prisoner, indignantly. "Never—never!"

"You forget the advantages."

"No, I don't."

"The opportunity of rescuing yourself from a life of misery, if not of crime—of obtaining an honourable position in the world's esteem—of eventually serving those you love."

The boy shook his head impatiently: his heart was unconvinced.

"Hear me out," added his adviser. "Should you refuse, my instructions are to take you before a magistrate. The gentleman will appear against you, and the result will be—"

"An acquittal; my prosecutor knows I am no thief; his own evidence will prove my innocence."

"But render you liable to be sent for two years to a penitentiary," observed the lawyer, gravely, "as the associate of one."

The countenance of the youth flushed with shame, and then turned pale.

"Your fate is in your own hands."

"If I could only see the gentleman," murmured Richard.

"It would be useless," replied the former. "Come," he added, placing his hand kindly upon his shoulder, "act reasonably, and I will so far exceed my instructions, as to permit you to write to your mother."

"To write, and not see her, sir."

"The last I dare not grant."

"And what proof have I that, even if I were to consent, you would keep faith with me?"

"My word," answered his adviser. "You doubt me; perhaps it is not unnatural that you should do so, for much that has taken place must appear incomprehensible to you. Did you observe or hear anything," he continued, "when brought to my house last night?"

"I heard music, sir, and the sound of feet in the room above me, as if there was dancing."

"They were my children, Richard," said Mr. Morton, "the beings for whom I toil in an arduous profession; they are at home for the holidays; one of them is a lad about your own age. Think you that his father would degrade himself by a lie?"

"No!" exclaimed the youth, regarding him earnestly; "my father would not do that."

"You consent, then?"

"Yes."

The promise was reluctantly given—torn from him by the force of circumstances beyond the poor boy's power to control. Older heads ere now have been compelled to bow to the same fatal law, necessity. Still there was a mental reservation of escaping if he could.

"And you promise not to run away?" added the lawyer.

"Don't ask me to promise that," answered the youth; "for if I saw a chance of liberty, my heart tells me I should break it."

There was a frankness and honesty in the reply which confirmed the good opinion the agent of his mysterious benefactor began to entertain of him. His profession more, perhaps, than any other, afforded opportunities for judging of the heart; and he had long since come to the conclusion that it was unwise to tax humanity beyond its strength. He liked our hero all the better for his refusal.

"I must trust, then, to the vigilance of my servant," he observed, with a quiet smile, "and the security of an additional bolt to your door. You have been tampering with the lock, I perceive, already."

"And should have succeeded if my knife had not broken."

"Perhaps," said the lawyer; "but you must first have passed through my office, where there are half a dozen clerks."

"When shall I write my letter?" demanded Richard Markham, with a sigh, for he saw how hopeless any attempt to quit the house must prove.

"After breakfast," replied Mr. Morton, pointing to the tray, with a smile. "You are at liberty to state in it that you have found a friend who has promised to provide for and assist you; but my name must not be mentioned."

The youth considered that the prohibition was at least a guarantee of his intention to deliver it; and, with a heavy heart, he sat down to the well-spread table before him.

"If my mother and Mary could only share it with me," he thought, "how happy it would make them."

Little did he imagine the change that had taken place in his absence.

The letter was written. Our readers are already aware of the circumstances which prevented Rachel at that time from receiving it.

At the end of a week, Richard Markham, who had been handsomely clothed, started in company with the friendly lawyer for Jersey, where he was to remain under the care of the Reverend Oneas Brown, who prepared six pupils for the army, India, or the universities; but before quitting London, our hero had an interview with his singular benefactor, who contemplated the visible improvement in his appearance with satisfaction.

"A fine lad, Morton!" he exclaimed; "pity he should be lost for want of training."

"A thousand, sir."

"Will you give me your hand?" said the gentleman, at the same time extending his own towards his protégé.

The youth gave it reluctantly.

"I perceive you hate me," observed the gentleman, bitterly. "But I am not surprised at it: the last thing I expect to meet with in this world is gratitude," he added, with a sigh.

"I cannot hate you," replied the boy.

"Why did you hesitate, then, to give me your hand?"

"Because I do not understand you. You have given me fine clothes—are about to send me to school—and speak me fairly: but I had rather a thousand times return to poverty and those who love me."

"Umph! truthful at any rate," muttered the unknown.

"I was taught to be so, sir, by my dear mother."

"Your affection for her scarcely surprises me," said the gentleman. "For the more I see of you, the more I feel interested in your favour. I should have assisted her too," he added, "but those whom I sent to make inquiries, informed me that she had been taken care of by her friends."

"My grandfather!" exclaimed Richard, joyfully.

"I hope it is my grandfather: how happy it will make her."

"Is he so rich, then?"

"I know nothing about his wealth," replied the youth; "for I only knew that I had a grandfather by being taught to pray for him; but my mother loves him dearly. It was only on the day I first met you, sir, she parted with the little gold locket that contained his hair: I shall never forget how she kissed it and cried over it."

"Ah, these city men!" exclaimed his benefactor—

"these men of gold and discounts—their hearts are like iron!"

"Surely, not all," observed the lawyer.

"All," repeated his client—"at least, in resolution, and that is nearly the same. Good-bye," he added, extending his hand to Richard. "Do not judge me till you are old enough to comprehend me: merit my bounty by your good conduct, and you shall find that accident has replaced your natural friends by one whose intentions, perhaps, are kinder than his words."

The tone of earnestness with which these words were spoken produced a singular impression upon Richard, who, yielding to an impulse he could scarcely understand, proffered his hand to him freely.

"God bless you, my poor boy!" said the gentleman, shaking it warmly: "we shall be excellent friends in time."

"He must restore me to my mother first," observed our hero, as he quitted the room. "I feel as if I could love him then."

"All in good time," said the lawyer, with a smile.

On their way to Southampton he informed his young companion that he had a favour to request of him.

"From me, sir?—oh willingly!"

"Hear it first," continued Mr. Morton. "From all that I have seen of you, I entertain the highest opinion of your truthfulness. I have a son, about your own age, who, for the last five years, has been a pupil at the same school you are going to."

"I am sure I shall like him!" exclaimed Richard.

"I trust you will; but that is not all. I want you to promise me never to name to him, without my permission, the circumstances under which you became acquainted with me. Should you refuse me," added the speaker, "I must seek another tutor for him."

"Not on my account," replied his charge. "I faithfully promise you."

The lawyer thanked him, and felt perfectly satisfied with his word.

Two days afterwards they arrived at their destination in Jersey, and the long neglected youth found himself the inmate of an elegant villa, from whose windows he could discover a picturesque view of St. Clement's Bay.

"O, how happy I should feel," he observed, as he parted with his travelling companion, "if—"

"There is always an 'if' in this world," interrupted Mr. Morton: "it is the condition of existence, the incentive to exertion; the mind would stagnate without it. When you feel disposed to give your word to your tutor not to run away, he has directions to make you a proper allowance of pocket money: till then you will be kept penniless."

"I shall never give it, sir, for I feel it is my duty to seek my parents."

The lawyer smiled.

"If the son resembles the father," thought Richard Markham, as he watched the departure of the steamer, "I shall be sure to like him. How will this all end? Is it a dream or reality?"

Such were the questions he frequently asked himself, as he walked to the villa, by the side of the Reverend Oneas Brown, who had already given instructions to the sheriff and officers of the port, to keep an eye upon him, should he attempt to escape from the island.

We trust our readers will not feel tired by the gadding propensities we have displayed. From the Channel Islands to Blackheath is no inconsiderable jump; and yet we must request them to make it.

The pen is a greater enchanter even than steam, and annihilates time and distance more quickly. Presto! the change is made; and instead of the picturesque rocks, the deep blue bays, and the almost Italian landscapes of Jersey, we are once more within a bird's-eye view of dear old smoky London, in the neighbourhood of Greenwich Park, the paradise of cockneys, pensioners, and nursery maids.

Every day Mr. Bently had been a visitor at the house of his friend, Peter Mangles, who, judging from the deep anxiety and affection he displayed, till the physician pronounced the crisis past and their patient out of danger, fondly anticipated a reconciliation between the stern parent and his offending child. It was the only recompense the kind old man either desired or dreamt of for his disinterested exertions.

Finding, however, that as the danger receded, the feelings of the merchant gradually cooled, and that he carefully avoided all allusion to the subject, the clerk resolved to put it to him in a form so unmistakably straightforward and plain, there could be no evading an explanation.

"This account, Richard," he said, "has been of many years' standing, and must have caused you many a sleepless night. I am sure it has me. Don't you think it is time to cross it out, write paid against it, and take poor Rachel to your heart again? Don't answer me yet," he added, hastily, not altogether satisfied with the expression which clouded the countenance of his hearer; "you have not heard half what I have to urge."

"I am willing to hear it," observed the merchant, calmly.

"That's right: nothing like patience in business. Remember how I unravelled Batt and Blindem's affair, which you wanted to close at once. Well, then, your child has suffered severely, paid a large dividend in tears and sorrow. The loss of her boy has almost broken her heart. Surely, Richard," he continued, "it is time to let bygones be bygones, and pass the sponge over the memory of the past."

"I am ready, nay, anxious, to forgive her," said Mr. Bently, deliberately; "to receive her to my home and affection once more."

"Thank heaven!" ejaculated Peter Mangles, grasping his hand; "I always thought your heart was in the right place; only a little difficult to get at."

"On one condition," added the father of Rachel, deliberately.

The old man slowly repeated the words.

"That she separates from her worthless husband."

"Separates!" exclaimed Peter, in a tone of surprise and indignation. "You forget theirs is a partnership for life. Separate, when things are looking up, and George is reforming and earning his bread by honest industry! I told a lie, Richard: your heart is not in the right place to propose such a thing; and what is worse, I fear never will be. I'd sooner undertake," he added, "to get a bad bill discounted than try to move it again."

These reproaches were received more in sorrow than in anger by Mr. Bently, who perfectly understood the warm, impetuous nature of the speaker when his feelings were excited—a circumstance which very rarely occurred; for in all the ordinary affairs of life Peter Mangles was as cool as the world's friendship when poverty appeals to it, and prosaic as a column of figures in his ledger.

"Listen to me," said his employer; "I have heard you patiently."

Here the aged clerk gave a dissatisfied "Humph!"

"If George Markham had not proved himself utterly worthless, I could have extended my forgiveness even to him. You say he is earning his living by honest labour—granted; but how does he pass his nights? in the most profligate debauchery—in scenes of vice and shameless dissipation."

"Don't believe a word of it," interrupted his hearer.

"I have watched him," said the merchant.

"By your agents. Wouldn't trust one of them."

"Watched him myself," replied Richard Bently; "for I felt determined this time that conscience should not have a loophole to reproach me. I traced him night after night to dens where pollution holds her court, and drunkenness and dishonesty minister to her vile passions. You may imagine the agony, the shame I felt when convinced by the evidence of my own senses, that my child—my only one—was the wife of such a character, degraded by bearing his name, and still more by the tenacity with which she clings to him. I can understand the love," he added, "which braves the world's opinion, and even risks a parent's anger; but the love which survives respect is no longer worthy of the name; it has degenerated into passion—wild, ungovernable passion."

This was a sad blow to all Peter Mangles' hopes and expectations. Such a delightful picture as he had painted to himself, of Rachel's reconciliation with her father, of having George once more in the counting-house, of training him to keep the books, and eventually succeeding to a share in the firm.

In all probability it was the only dream in his life that the old clerk had ever indulged in, and he measured his resentment against the husband of Rachel in proportion to his disappointment.

"The fool!" he muttered, bitterly, "the heartless fool! Had I heard this from any lips but yours, Richard, I could not have believed it. What! his son lost, his wife almost dying, and yet to—Ah! bad world—bad world! soon be in a state of bankruptcy, as far as goodness and integrity are concerned."

"Am I not right?" demanded his employer.

Peter reluctantly admitted that he was right. Still, there was a mental reservation in favour of his long and tenaciously held opinion that if George Markham had been treated kindly at the outset of his career, he would have proved himself a different man. With some reluctance, he undertook to be the bearer of the condition on which her father's forgiveness was to be obtained to his suffering guest.

"Why, Rachel!" he said—since she had been an inmate of his house, he generally addressed her by her Christian name—"how strong you are getting! Fifty per cent. better, at the very least, within the last week."

The sorrowing mother faintly smiled.

"I want to talk to you," he continued, "but not now, if you think it would fatigue you."

"Now!" exclaimed the invalid, nervously; "now; do not keep me in suspense. You have heard news of my poor lost boy."

The messenger shook his head, and a deep-drawn sigh betrayed how deeply she felt the disappointment.

"We shall find him in time," he observed, trying to look cheerful; "I am sure we shall. Never lost anything in my life—except those unfortunate securities," he added to himself.

"No news of my boy," murmured Rachel.

"Have you no one else to love?"

"George and—"

"Don't name him," interrupted the clerk, passionately. "He has disappointed me; upset all my calculations, and reversed all the plans I had laid to serve him—a heartless, worthless drunkard; a bad husband and a worse parent. No, Rachel, I did not come to speak of him, but of your father. You have only to say the word to be restored to his affections and to the home of your youth."

"Is my husband to share it?" demanded his hearer, greatly agitated.

"I tell you he is not worthy of it," replied Peter Mangles. "Whilst you have been suffering he has been dissipating—passing his nights in the vilest debauchery."

"No, no!" shrieked the agonised wife; "I cannot believe it."

A flood of tears came to her relief, and the kind old man wept for sympathy.

"It is but too true," he resumed; "your father watched him, night after night, to haunts I won't, in fact, I couldn't, describe to you, for I have not the faintest idea what they are like, but something very dreadful, no doubt, or Richard would not have felt so indignant. Rachel, you know how I stood up for George when all were against him; how I hoped, against hope, that he would one day reform and retrieve all. I now abandon him, and advise you, as your oldest friend, as one who loves you like a parent, to return to the home and affection of your father."

Rachel regarded him with a look so mournfully sad, that he half regretted the task he had undertaken.

"Would you lose both your children?" he added, pointing to Mary.

Peter had touched the chord aright. Maternal love could alone contend against the devotion of the wife. To save her remaining child from the misery and degradation which menaced her, she could have submitted to any sacrifice.

"I must see him!" she exclaimed.

"See whom—your father?"

"No. My husband," answered Rachel. "He must learn my resolution, and hear its justification from my lips. Had poverty and affliction fallen upon us through inexperience of the world or the dispensation of Providence, I could have endured them patiently, have toiled for him without a murmur or reproach. It is the crime which separates us, and not the suffering."

"Oh, the misery—the hopeless misery!" she continued, wringing her hands, "that attends the drunkard's wife. One by one, the illusions of her youth all vanish; and first terror, then disgust, supply their places, till her heart becomes the sepulchre of blighted feelings, which leave no tender memories in their ashes. My boy has already been sacrificed. A mother's love," she added, "tells me to preserve his sister."

"And it tells you wisely, too," exclaimed Peter Mangles, struck by her firmness and decision. "Nothing like striking a final balance when the account is unsatisfactory."

Could he have witnessed the agony of tears which followed his departure from the room, the old clerk might have considered it advisable to leave it open a little longer, or, in other words, to have given her erring husband one trial more.

POVERTY AND GENIUS.

THE history of those who, by their genius and untiring energy, have taken the sting from poverty and won for themselves a place in the catalogue of the illustrious, must ever be interesting to the sons of toil. The greatness of real worth belongs to such characters; apart from high birth and proudly swelling titles, from the splendour of wealth and station, and frequently without the advantages of early education, the children of penury have marched on to honour, patiently triumphing over the obstacles which impeded their progress. The working man may well glory in the new and noble aristocracy which his gifted companions at the loom, the plough, and the anvil have helped to establish, and be stimulated by their example to show himself worthy of the fraternity to which he belongs. True to our mission of being "the working man's friend," and feeling assured that the subject will be deeply interesting to our readers, we intend devoting a portion of our space to the biography of the poor who have made for themselves an honourable name in the world during the last hundred years, selecting our examples, however, as they may occur, and not binding ourselves to chronological order.

Among the many children to whom the year 1754 gave birth was one George Crabbe.

In a gloomy hovel at Aldborough, in Suffolk, the subject of this sketch was born, and here, with pinching want and childish sorrow as his constant companions, in dread of a tyrannical father, and amid stern and lawless poachers and smugglers, the boy grew up.

His home was constantly saddened by his mother's tears and his father's threats, and the only happiness he enjoyed in his young days was when, alone on the sea-shore, he watched the ocean's majestic fury, or talked with the rough fishermen and sailors, who had a kind of gentle pity for the frightened-looking lad. The crazy house in which he lived, with its chambers projecting far over the ground floor, and with its windows so small that scarcely any light could enter, communicated its silent gloom to his young imagination, and made him timorous and distrustful. He was a son that many a man might and day would have blessed God for, but to his own father, accustomed to a bold sea-faring life, his mild, inoffensive disposition was contemptible. His father loved hardihood and daring, and had no sympathy for the weakness and dreamy moods of the youthful George. Frequently had the boy to hear such words as these: "That boy must be a fool!"

Under these hard circumstances the youthful poet of the poor grew up. In himself, however, he lived a life of thought and aspiration which yielded some pleasure to him; and he created for himself a little world of imagination, which all the harshness he received could not break up. His gentle character, his love of books, and his youthful attempts at poetry, made him an object of compassion, and even his schoolfellows would say to any one who wanted to excite him to a boyish quarrel, "You mustn't meddle with him; let him alone, for he has got learning." But notwithstanding his mildness of disposition, and his quiet submission to all insults and injuries, there was gradually deepening within him a firmness and power of endurance which enabled him to stand unmoved amid the heaviest trials of manhood, and to wait for the clear shining of the sun during long days of thickest darkness. The time came when he would not for any consideration have been without the sorrows of his youth, as the discipline which fitted him to bear without repining the colder neglect and contempt which he received in after life. Relinquishing the business which had been chosen for him without any due regard to his likes or dislikes, and having previously fallen in love with one who, after many years' waiting, became his tender wife, he determined to start for London, and try his fortune there as a young literary adventurer. Not without long deliberation, however, did he decide upon this step; to quote from his simple and touching autobiography;

—“Mr. Crabbe, after as full and perfect a survey of the good and evil before him, as his prejudices, inclinations, and little knowledge of the world enabled him to take, finally resolved to abandon his profession. His health was not robust, his spirits were not equal; assistance he could expect none, and he was not so sanguine as to believe he could do without it. With the best verses he could write, and with very little more, he quitted the place of his birth, not without the most serious apprehensions of the consequences of such a step.”

Borrowing a little money from a friend, he, with a hope that for a moment triumphed over his fear, left the home of his childhood to make a new one for himself. He had three pounds in his pocket wherewith to begin the world. It is more than likely that could he have lifted up the veil which concealed the future from his gaze, could he have seen the weary days and nights which awaited him, and the long-continued series of sorrows and disappointments attached to the career of an unknown candidate for fame in the great metropolis, he would have wavered in his resolution and remained at Aldborough; but with a wish that was a prophecy of coming power, he set out to win his spurs as a knight of the pen.

Behold him at length in London. At the basis of his quiet retiring character there was a modest independence of spirit which stimulated him to depend entirely on his own exertions for a livelihood, and such a conviction of the work best suited to his powers, that he would rather have starved in that, than have grown rich in an inferior one.

When, therefore, he came to town, he never told his friends in London how straitened his circumstances were; for as long as a poorhouse was open to him, so long would he have refused to become burdensome to his benefactors. He took an humble lodging in Bishopsgate-street, and began to apply himself to poetical compositions with the utmost diligence. In this lodging he remained for more than a year, during which time his chief study was to read all such books as he could command, and to take as full and particular a view of mankind as his time and finances would allow him to do. His evenings he spent in instructive and interesting conversations with men who afterwards became known as the most celebrated mathematicians of the time. He never allowed himself to be drawn away by the amusements which had such attractions for others. He gave his whole thought and attention to the business of his life—poetical composition; it was through this that he was determined to gain an honest and respectable livelihood. Having at length finished some poetical pieces, he with a trembling hand sent them off, first to one publisher, then to another, then to many, many more, but only received the most bitter rejections and disappointments. For a while these successive failures damped the ardour of his purpose; but a deep belief in his own powers, which has saved many a gifted man from despair, came again and again to his rescue. Magazine after magazine, publisher after publisher he approached, but without success; and his pecuniary resources being quite exhausted, he began to appeal to several noblemen who had been the professed patrons of literature and literary men, for assistance to carry out his idea. His anxious yet quite dignified and manly appeals were wholly disregarded; and it is a marvel that the young adventurer did not sink under these repeated trials and rebuffs. His purse at this time was reduced to five and sixpence; but so easily were his bodily wants satisfied, and so habituated had he become to self-denial, that what would have been beggary to another was wealth to him. “Cast down, but not destroyed,” our young poet, wearied out by the cold indifference of publishers, and so jaded in spirit that he had scarcely a spark of energy left in him, bethought himself of a man of genius, to whom in his extremity he resolved to appeal. It was EDMUND BURKE to whom he stated his position. His letter to this justly celebrated man had not a shadow of servility in it: he wrote to him as a good and great man to lend him his assistance, if he could with propriety do so. Honour to the name of Edmund Burke! Although at that period he was engaged, and hotly too, in the great parliamentary excitements of the hour, he immediately fixed an early day for an interview with the poor author, and with that interview began the day of George Crabbe's prosperity and success. Burke, with his keen perception and genial heart, penetrated into the real greatness of the young poet's mind, and generously sympathised with him in his distresses. From that moment the tide turned in his favour; he took it at the flood and rolled rapidly towards fortune, usefulness, and popularity; for the time came when the poor, friendless youth who went into Mr. Burke's room with his last shilling gone, received three thousand pounds from Mr.

Murray for the copyright of his poems. The very first use Crabbe made of his good fortune was to seek out and relieve poor scholars like himself, and never, to the last day of his life, did he omit, especially when he came to London, to minister to the wants of sons of genius, whose energies were cramped by poverty. Shortly after his introduction to Mr. Burke, by a remarkable dispensation of Providence, George Crabbe returned to Aldborough to labour as a clergyman for the first time in the place where he had pined and sorrowed as a boy. With what feelings must he have looked upon the home of his childhood. To use the language of his son—“He left his home a deserter from his profession, with the imputation of having failed in it from wanting even common abilities for the discharge of its duties—in the estimation of the rude natives, a ‘lubber’ and a ‘fool.’ He returned a man of acknowledged talents—a successful author, and a clergyman with every prospect of preferment in the church. His father had the candour to admit that he had underrated his poetical abilities, and that he had acted judiciously in trusting to the bent of nature, rather than persevering in an occupation for which he was, from the outset, peculiarly disqualified.”

As the friend and teacher of the poor, the subject of this sketch went from town to town and from village to village; and when, at length, he died, a monument was erected to his memory, by grateful friends, upon which was the following inscription:—

“Sacred to the memory of the Rev. George Crabbe, LL.B., who died February 3rd, 1832, in the 78th year of his age. Born in humble life, he made himself what he was. By the force of his genius he broke through the obscurity of his birth—yet never ceased to feel for the less fortunate; entering (as his works can testify) into the sorrows and deprivations of the poorest of his parishioners, and so discharging the duties of his station as a minister and a magistrate, as to acquire the respect and esteem of all his neighbours. As a writer he is well described by a great contemporary, as ‘Nature's sternest painter, yet her best.’”

“Lives of great men all remind us
We may make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.”

LITTLE COURTESIES.

How much of meaning, of refinement, aye, of Christianity itself, there is in those little incidental attentions and politenesses which go a great way in making up the beauty of life!

We have known very many people—good, warm-hearted, and generous—who were capable of almost any act of self-sacrifice and abnegation, who would never have condescended to raise their hat to a lady, or offer her a glass of water, before drinking themselves. This is frequently the fault of a coarse-grained nature, but, perhaps, most often the result of early education. Indeed, we always think a man's manners are the “living epistle, known and read of all men,” of his mother's training. Habitual politeness can only make a man a thorough gentleman—a woman, a true lady. And this is most easily acquired in childhood, and in one's own household. If a boy be respectful and courteous to his sisters, he will be so to all women, so long as he lives; but if his intercourse with them be coarse, careless, abrupt, not softened and refined by a thousand nameless little attentions and graces, he will be rough, awkward—not fulfilling always the beautiful injunction of the apostle, “Be ye courteous to all men.” Then, too, outward refinement, influences and softens the inward character; for it is a law of our being that “expression intensifies the emotions and feelings.”

But this work, after all, lies with every mother in the land—in the world; and we can only hope that these hints may influence some to consider it.

THE HANDS.—One of the most common signs of want of breeding, is a sort of uncomfortable consciousness of the hands, an obvious ignorance of what to do with them, and a painful awkwardness in their adjustment. The hands of a gentleman seem perfectly at home without being occupied; they are habituated to the dolce far niente, or if they spontaneously move, it is attractively. Some of Queen Elizabeth's courtiers made playing with their sword-hilt an accomplishment, and the most efficient weapon of the Spanish coquette is her fan. Strength in the fingers is a sure token of mental aptitude. When Mutius burnt his hand off before the eyes of his captor, he gave the most indubitable proof we can imagine of fortitude; and it was natural that amid the ferocious bravery of feudal times, a bloody hand in the centre of an escutcheon should become the badge of a baronet of England.

THE DUMB CHILD.

A most affecting scene occurred some time ago in one of our metropolitan churches. An eloquent preacher was addressing his congregation on behalf of the deaf and dumb, who to the number of a hundred were seated before him. Suddenly pausing in one of his most eloquent and pathetic strains, he exclaimed, “But I will let them speak!” The mutes all rose, and looked for a few moments upon the spell-bound congregation. “I do not mock you,” cried the speaker, his face suffused with tears; “silence like this is eloquence!” And so it was. So, to the fond mother who speaks in the touching lines which follow, there was eloquence in every motion and gesture of the little one, although the ecstasies of sound had not yet been taught her by the angels.

She is my only girl:

I ask'd for her as some most precious thing,
For all unfinish'd was Love's jewel'd ring,
Till set with this soft pearl.
The shade that Time brought forth I could not see;
How pure, how perfect, seem'd the gift to me!

O, many a soft old tune

I used to sing unto that deaden'd ear,
And suffer'd not the lightest footstep near,
Lest she might wake too soon;
And hush'd her brothers' laughter while she lay.
Ah, needless care! I might have let them play!

'Twas long ere I believed

That this little daughter might not speak to me;
Waited and watch'd, God knows how patiently!
How willingly deceived:
Vain Love was long the untiring nurse of Faith,
And tended Hope until it starved to death.

O! if she could but hear

For one short hour, till I her tongue might teach
To call me mother, in the broken speech
That thrills the mother's ear!
Alas! those seal'd lips never may be stirr'd
To the deep music of that lovely word.

My heart it sorely tries

To see her kneel, with such a reverent air,
Beside her brothers at their evening prayer;
Or lift those earnest eyes
To watch our lips, as though our words she knew—
Then move her own, as she were speaking too.

I've watch'd her looking up

To the bright wonder of a sunset sky,
With such a depth of meaning in her eye,
That I could almost hope
The struggling soul would burst its binding cords,
And the long pent-up thoughts flow forth in words.

The song of bird and bee,

The chorus of the breezes, streams, and groves,
All the grand music to which nature moves,
Are wasted melody
To her: the world of sound a tuneless void;
While even Silence hath its charm destroy'd.

Her face is very fair;

Her blue eye beautiful; of finest mould
The soft white brow, o'er which, in waves of gold,
Ripples her shining hair.
Alas! this lovely temple closed must be,
For He who made it keeps the master-key.

Wills He the mind within

Should from earth's Babel-clamour be kept free, E'en that His still small voice and step might be Heard at its inner shrine,
Through that deep hush of soul, with clearer thrill?
Then should I grieve? O murmuring heart, be still!

She seems to have a sense

Of quiet gladness in her noiseless play.
She hath a pleasant smile, a gentle way,
Whose voiceless eloquence
Touches all hearts; though I had once the fear
That even her father would not care for her.

Thank God, it is not so!

And when his sons are playing merrily,
She comes and leans her head upon his knee.
Oh! at such times I know—
By his full eye, and tones subdued and mild—
How his heart yearns over his silent child.

Not of all gifts bereft

Even now. How could I say she did not speak?
What real language lights her eye and cheek,
And renders thanks to Him who left
Unto her soul yet open avenues
For joy to enter and for love to use!

And God, in love, doth give

To her defect a beauty of its own.
And we a deeper tenderness have known
Through that for which we grieve,
Yet shall the seal be melted from her ear,
Yea, and my voice shall fill it—but not here.

When that new sense is given,

What rapture will its first experience be,
That never woke to meaner melody
Than the rich songs of heaven—
To hear the full-toned anthem swelling round,
While angels teach the ecstasies of sound!

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

THE FORMATION OF CHARACTER.

It is my purpose in these articles to excite in the breasts of my youthful readers a laudable ambition rightly to fulfil the grand design and end of their existence. I do not only want to excite Hopes, I am ready, so far as I can practically, to help in the realisation of these Hopes.

Now, I have endeavoured to show you in the last two articles, how to write. But there are many things more important than a good handwriting or an elegantly indited letter. The subject I want to draw your attention to at present, is that of the formation of your own character, a work which is pre-eminently superior to the writing of an alphabetic character, and yet is accomplished by the same sort of means, namely, the diligent imitation of beautiful examples.

The great purpose of human life is the formation of genuine character. There is a wonderful difference between character and reputation. A man may acquire a reputation for that which he does not really possess; but character is a reality, it is that which the man actually is in mind and heart. Character is what a man is; reputation is what he is thought to be. Character is within; reputation is without. Character is what gives a man value in his own eyes; reputation is what he is valued at in the eyes of others. Character is his real worth; reputation is his market price.

Character is that which we make for ourselves. We may inherit wealth, or be elevated to high positions; but we can never inherit a character, or never have it bestowed upon us: we must make it for ourselves. Our characters are in our own hands; we mould them at our will. We cannot, even if we would, shuffle off the responsibility.

Some say circumstances make character. In some instances they do. But who that is wise will trust them? It is the glory of man that he is superior to circumstances. If he trusts to them to form his character, he does it of his own free will. It is not necessary that circumstances should exercise such control. We yield, not because we are overcome, but because we do not try to oppose; and the fact remains the same, that we are voluntary agents—not the creatures of blind chance.

Character is essential to happiness.—Without a good character happiness is never known. All that exalts, ennobles, embellishes, and dignifies humanity, is blended in the beauty and the glory of a truly genuine character.

All the treasures of ten thousand worlds will not compare in value with one pure heart, for the production of all that is satisfying and blessed. They will not purchase peace, nor joy, nor sacred rest, nor the sweet tranquillity of an unsullied conscience, nor one single moment's real bliss. They can never be exchanged for those golden-gloried virtues that blossom all over a good character, like the blossoms on a thick bed of roses, and which are as rich in the sweet incense that the heart loves most, as the flowers are in refreshing fragrance.

The youth who places a proper estimate upon a good character has learned a lesson that is more valuable to him than anything else possibly can be. He has learned the source of his purest joys.

But the happiness and blessedness of a good character are not confined to the sunny chambers of its possessor. Character is catching. If one has a good character, he gives something of its goodness to all with whom he associates. If his heart is radiant with the light of virtue, that light gets out, and shines in upon the hearts of others. He can scarcely look at another without impressing some mark of his own character on the heart of the one upon whom he gazes. A man's face is almost always radiant with the light of his true character. Character, like murder, will out. It cannot long be concealed. You might as well attempt to chain the lightnings in the black caverns of the surcharged cloud, or put a hood over the great bright face of the sun, as to lock up a man's character from the sight of his fellows. God never designed that it should be. Character was made to be seen. It is the government of the soul; put on, not only for the comfort and convenience of the wearer, but for the pleasure of other people's eyes. It is not worn for self alone, for that would be mean, but for all by whom it is surrounded.

The possession of character makes us useful.—It is not necessary that we shall be public speakers, or writers, or functionaries, in order that our influence shall be felt about us. These outward means of influence are more direct and apparent, but not more positive and sure. Our looks, our words, our actions even our silence, speak of our characters. We are impressing ourselves upon others. Our seniors, our equals in age and standing, and even the little children about us, are receiving impressions of our characters. We are breathing a silent but strong influence into many a soul, which goes direct from our characters. Are not our responsibilities fearful, so great and constant is our influence? And hence the vast, the inexpressibly vast, importance of possessing good characters.

Our characters are not for ourselves only, but for others. If they make us happy, they produce a similar happiness in the minds of all with whom we associate, differing only in degree. Think of our friends, relatives, and neighbours about us, the dear little children, the circles in social and business life we enter daily, weekly, yearly; think how many we meet with, speak with, and thus influence, from year to year, all through our lives, and then calculate the amount of influence we exert upon the world.

Would we do good to the world? Then let our characters be formed after the most perfect pattern within our attainment; for character is the most powerful instrumentality within our possession. It is not so showy or noisy as wealth, or station, or fame, but it is more grand and vigorous in the silent tread of its march among human hearts. Power chiefly rests in the things that are least bustling and noisy. The world looks upon the lightning as it leaps from the cloud upon the tree, or racks and splinters it into atoms, as a strong expression of power; but not a tithe so powerful is it as that electrical vigour, which in silence spreads the earth all over with flowers, and fruits, and herbage, and holds in its still grasp the worlds that play their game of grandeur in the blue sea above us. Should a vagrant comet in mad fury burst against our earth, and jostle our planet a few feet from the century-beaten track, we should startle in gaping awe at this tremendous manifestation of power; but what would that be, compared with the silent but sleepless potency of the calm old sun who holds his retinue of worlds in serene and solemn submission, and clothes them all in annual verdure and animation?

So it is, the things most silent and unseen, are the most powerful. Our characters are these silent sources or means of power, unseen by the visible and ambitious eye of the world, which God has permitted us to form and wield for the benefit of mankind. Let others shake the earth with an army's tread, sit on thrones, or harangue in senates; be it mine to mould a character that God shall honour and keep unsullied in its beauty and strength, to bear about me whenever I walk among my fellows.

In the formation of a good character, everybody can bless the world while they are blessing themselves, can give a glorious charity while they keep it, can impart wisdom while they obtain it, can make others rich while they are enriching themselves. While it is the best and only sure way in the world to do good unto others, it is the easiest. It requires no money, no loss of time, or sleep, or strength, but will rather add to all of these. It is so easy, that it is within everybody's reach. There is not, perhaps, a youth in the country that may not thus become a public benefactor. In blessing himself with a good character, he blesses the world with a good influence and example, besides the good he does in outward acts of goodness.

The inducements for the formation of a good character are almost innumerable. Among these the respect of the world should not be forgotten. All people love to be respected. To obtain respect, one must possess a good character. The world respects goodness, and does it honour. No matter where it is found—in the palace or hovel—it will be respected. Every man has an inward reverence for goodness. He meets it with a feeling of awe. He pays a willing tribute to virtue. Nothing on earth is more beloved, esteemed, and honoured in the world's great heart than a noble youth,—one whose character is pure, whose aims are high, whose life is a moral essay. Men delight to do him good, to aid him, to give him place, preferment, office, or anything that he may desire at their hands. Bad men will respect him: villains will "lie low" in his presence, and assume the outward garb of good men; and they, too, will vie with each other in doing him good. It is glorious to have the unlimited confidence and respect of all who know us, and to feel that such confidence is not misplaced. It is a thought that an angel may cherish in purity. To be conscious of being beloved for our real worth, respected and honoured for the excellency of our characters, is a happiness rich and hallowing in its influence.

But let the youth fix it in his mind as a fact, unalterably and everlastingly true, that this respect cannot be gained without a good character. He cannot deceive the world with respect to his true character. It will out. And if he has deceived for awhile, he will be all the more despised when he is found out. A character stainless as truth, sweet as goodness, upright as the soul of honesty, is the only thing with which to secure and hold the world's respect.

Then, again, he wants his own respect. The sweetest thing in earth is self-respect. To know that one is pure, is honest, is clean in the sight of God and man, is a solid comfort; and though all men forsake and slander, and abuse, it is a strength immovably sure and peaceful. Not for the world's gold, and wealth, and honours, and kingdoms, would a true man sell his self-respect; for while he has this, he cannot be altogether miserable, but will be happy. With a genuine, well-grounded self-respect, a man walks the earth in the dignity of a god. A dastard and a coward is he who has not self-respect.

Again, let the youth fix it as a fact that he must make his own character. It is a work which God has wisely consigned to him. No other can do it for him. Character is the unseen spirit-garment that one's own thoughts and feelings weave about his soul with invisible fingers.

In the formation of character look at the Great Example, the model given to us for our imitation. Our Saviour himself has set us an example that we should follow in his steps. The human character of Christ was the purest and noblest that the world ever saw. We needed such a pattern. Rules of conduct had been laid down before, but no man had been able to illustrate in his own person the lessons inculcated by their teachings. Christ did this. Divine as well as human, he dwelt amongst us to show what God is, what man should be. He occupied a humble position in life; he knew all the trials and temptations of an ordinary existence, the bitterness of poverty, the contumely of great men, the treachery of false friends, and the caprice of the multitude, and through it he preserved the same beautiful perfection of character, the same glorious symmetry of motion and action, in all places and under all circumstances.

Though this topic is more fit for a grave pulpit sermon than a slight paper like this, to leave out referring to the Great Model set before us for the formation of our characters, would be to omit the most important truth of all. In the formation of character, then, look to the Saviour as the model, and seek that divine help without which nothing is good, nothing is holy, and nothing is permanently successful.

REV. THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

The subject of our sketch, who has now, for many years, held so high a place in public estimation, as a preacher, a philanthropist, and a patriot, was born in the year 1800, in the town of Brechin, in Forfarshire, where his ancestors have resided for many generations. The family from which Dr. Guthrie is descended is one of the oldest and most respectable in Forfarshire; its founder, we are informed, having settled in that county as early as the reign of Malcolm Canmore.

After acquiring the elementary branches of education at a school in his native town, Thomas Guthrie entered the University of Edinburgh at the very early age of twelve years. When he had remained the usual period at the University, he left Edinburgh for Paris with the benevolent design of acquiring such a knowledge of medicine and surgery as would enable him, in after life, to render gratuitous assistance and relief to his future parishioners. After attending a number of the medical classes in the French University, he returned to Scotland, and was presented, by his noble friend and patron, the late Lord Panmure, to the parish of Arbirlot, in the neighbourhood of Arbroath. Here Mr. Guthrie laboured with great diligence and much success for several years, until his fame as a preacher induced the magistrates and town council of Edinburgh, in the year 1837, to offer him a charge in their city,—an offer he eventually accepted.

Removed to this new and most important field of labour, Mr. Guthrie entered on his work with an earnestness and a zeal which, from that hour to this, have never flagged. He at once rose into popularity as a most original, striking, and impressive preacher.

Our limits will not permit us to attempt a description of Dr. Guthrie as a preacher, even if we were adequate to the task. To form anything like a correct idea of his extraordinary powers as a speaker, he must be heard. On this subject we shall only observe that, whether in the pulpit or on the platform, he is equally at home, equally great in both, and, we are almost tempted to say, equally unrivalled in both. We know no living man who combines to such an extent the talent of wielding the passions and emotions of a Sabbath assembly with that of swaying the feelings and touching the hearts of a week-day audience. Whether it be to move his hearers to laughter or melt them to tears, he is alike effective. Indeed, in these respects we consider him unequalled by any man of the age; certainly by any man in his own country.

Speaking of the doctor's eloquence, we may observe that the talent of public speaking seems hereditary in his family. Mr. Guthrie, the minister of Stirling, an ancestor of the subject of our notice, was as remarkable for his power as a speaker, as for his ability as a divine, and his lofty patriotism and fearless independence as a citizen. And of Mr. William Guthrie, it may be justly said, that, as an orator and a divine, he was even superior to his illustrious relative, Mr. James Guthrie, if we may credit the testimony of contemporary historians, who pronounce him to have been the greatest divine and the most eloquent preacher of his day.

We have already said that Dr. Guthrie is amazingly popular. Look at his Ragged Schools—those noble monuments of his patriotism as well as of his philanthropy!—those blessed asylums for the hungry, and the naked, and the heart-broken, and the neglected, homeless, friendless orphans and outcasts amongst the juvenile population of our large towns and cities.

The Doctor has worked hard in the Ragged School cause; and his labours have been attended with great success. He has not only sought to communicate instruction to the ignorant, but to provide a home for the homeless, and food for the hungry. These efforts have been productive of incalculable benefits to the poor.

The space allotted to us in this article, will only admit of a passing allusion to the efforts of Dr. Guthrie in the cause of Temperance. For the right understanding of these, we beg to refer our readers to his noble book, "The City: its Sins, and its Sorrows," a work we have read again and again, with indescribable emotion; and which, were we rich enough, we would place in the hands (we know it will soon find its way to their hearts) of all who "love their kind" and their country.

In conclusion, we may remark that Dr. Guthrie is proverbial for his kind-heartedness and generosity; and is as much beloved for his social as for his public virtues. To see Dr. Guthrie to perfection, you must see him in the bosom of his family. There he is truly delightful. Admirable as he is in public, he is, if possible, still more admirable in private life: there he is the loving father, the courteous host, the brilliant, witty, instructive "conversationist," the fascinating companion, and the kind, generous, affectionate, and sympathising friend.

Such is the truly good and great man of whom our sketch is but a feeble portraiture. Although comparatively still a young man—for he is but little more than fifty—he has already won for himself a renown second only to that of the immortal Chalmers. His name has become a "household word" in Scotland, and will be "embalmed" in the page of imperishable history, and go down to posterity along with those of Chalmers, Henderson, and Knox.

Long may he be spared to his family, his congregation, to suffering humanity, and the Christian world!

THE FINAL ASSAULT OF DELHI.

THE TAKING OF DELHI.

DELHI, the doomed city, as our readers all know, has fallen. As of Babylon, in the mighty denunciations of the Apocalypse, we may say of her, "In one hour is thy judgment come." The headquarters of the rebellion are destroyed, and our brave men pursue the flying miscreants from post to post, from stronghold to stronghold; and, despite the croakings of various prophets of evil, we may confidently hope soon to see an end of the terrible struggle that has been raging so furiously for the last few months.

The siege of Delhi was carried on under peculiar difficulties. General Wilson had an arduous task to fulfil. He could not regularly invest the place; he could only hold, with a small army, a fortified position in front of an enemy four or five times superior in numbers to his own brave followers. On three sides of the city the mutineers could come and go as they chose; and every sortie our gallant men were called upon to repulse increased their difficulties and diminished their strength. But with the most praiseworthy energy the operations were pushed on day and night. Not an hour was wasted in doubt and indecision; not a measure was taken but what had been suggested by vigilant care and forethought. So that when at length Sir John Lawrence was enabled to bring up the siege train, the batteries had been already erected, and it remained only to put the guns in position and open a fire upon the rebellious city.

For a week we battered the walls with cannon; then one grand rush made us masters of Delhi. Considering the strength of the defences and the advantages possessed by their rascally defenders, in the way of European arms and discipline, the success is almost unexampled. When Clive won Plassey a hundred years ago, when Wellesley conquered at Assaye, they had indeed to fight against vastly superior numbers, but not against men trained and taught to use their arms and to manœuvre by English officers. There were other circumstances in the case that contributed to the difficulty of our position. Some of the Sepoys fought with the courage of despair. They knew they had nothing but a well-merited death to expect at the hands of the nation they had betrayed, and seemed determined to sell their lives as dearly as possible.

The attack itself gave occasion for one of those displays of heroism of which the Crimean war offered so many examples. The blowing up of the Cashmere-gate, by Lieutenants Salkeld and Home, assisted by three gallant sergeants and a bugler, is an act of daring courage which ought to immortalise the names of all who contributed to the glorious achievement. Full in the face of a murderous fire of musketry, did these gallant men advance. Deliberately, and with the precision of a manœuvre on parade, did they fix the powder-bags on the doomed gate; and not till he had been twice severely wounded, did the noble young Lieutenant Salkeld resign the match with which he was to have set fire to the train, into the hands of a sergeant. Two of the non-commissioned officers, Burgess and Carmichael, were shot dead; Lieutenant Home, seeing the slow match well alight, threw himself on the ground, and, marvellous to relate, escaped unhurt. Bugler Hawthorn blew a stirring blast; and, with characteristic caution, repeated the summons thrice, that there might be no mistake. Then, with a mighty cheer, the British columns advanced. A tremendous explosion shook the earth, and the bodies of forty mutilated Sepoys lay crushed among the fragments of the Cashmere-gate. Then the decisive rush was made; and the siege of Delhi was over.

The loss on our side was very heavy. A third of the number engaged in the assault are returned as killed or wounded. But never was victory more opportune or more important. Coming just when some of the Bombay regiments were beginning to grow unsteady—when a trying reverse might have converted many a doubtful friend into an open foe—the capture of Delhi has been to this war what the taking of Sebastopol was to the strife in the Crimea; the one triumph necessary to establish our prestige, and set the question of the superiority of the British soldier permanently at rest.

With the success we have already achieved fresh in our recollection, and our gallant troops pouring into India, regiment following upon regiment, it would, we think, be more than cowardly to doubt the ultimate result of the conflict. The shout of victory seems still to ring in our ears from Delhi; and if there was needed any stimulus to nerve our soldiers to the work they have yet before them, their arms would be strengthened and their breasts steeled, as they shouted the stern war-cry that rang through Delhi's blood-stained streets,—“Remember the women!—remember the babies!”

A WEDDING GIFT.

So spake the belfry of an old Wiltshire church, on a February day—yes, a Wiltshire church, but not the Soresby one, where Dan and Cicely stopped and looked at the plain stone, beside the gravel-walk. That marriage, they thought, should be delayed—and they delayed it. Dan didn't use the words, but he thought them, I can tell you, that even if he had got work that very hour, when Cicely forgave him, it would only be decent that he should go through a sort of quarantine, before ever he could, with any face, call that ill-used girl by such a gentle, euphonious name as Mrs. Stuggs.

I don't believe, that if he had been offered, that moment, a berth of a thousand a year for reading the Times from ten till four in Somerset House, he would have consented to lead his bride to the altar a quarter of an hour earlier than he did. He would have been ashamed of it.

No; this clang of bells is from the tower of the church which enjoys the high distinction of receiving the worship, once every two Sundays, in a great square pew, of the Honourable Colonel Hugh Latson. The pew is rather more like a tolerably sized staircase landing, than a pew. The carpet is of that order, only rather more worn than you generally see in a great man's house.

For, be it remembered, the colonel made no pretension whatever to any religious anxieties—there was that to be said in his favour. The Blance pew, in the same church, was a different affair. Besides which, they had a private chapel under the castle roof. On the walls of this pew (or rather chapel, for it would have held a small congregation easily), there were the slabs, the memorial slabs of different members of the family.

Here was one who had died, an officer, in action, at the battle of Toulouse. Another had been drowned accidentally somewhere in India. Another (a young lady) had been found dead in her bed, and under her bust in relief, was the motto, "She is not dead, but sleepeth." Another (with a very large tablet and a great number of cherubs) had sunk under his duties, as a private secretary of the great Earl Chatham.

In fact it was a most unexceptionable pew; and the sexton, if he had found anybody inside it looking at the monuments without his own introduction, would have lost all heart, and taken to his bed as a ruined man.

The church was about midway between Latson Towers and the residence of the lady; and the tenantry on both estates had lined the road as the fine grays, pair after pair, rushed (for all wedding horses do rush) up to the church gates.

And now the prayers are said, and the vows uttered, and the names signed; and the first couple appear returning through the porch, taking their happy road over the carpet spread along the walk, and among the very few flowers the season permits the little village girls to scatter in their way.

They do tell us that nothing at a wedding is so unlucky—certainly few things are so unwelcome—as the sight of a funeral.

For our own part, we would rather meet at a wedding of ours, the twelvemonth's funerals of all London, one by one in procession, than meet what that bridal party met that morning.

Just as the first couple were about to re-enter the first carriage, there stepped out from the crowd a bent and withered form, with head uncovered, and straggling white hairs falling over his shoulders. The old man carried with him his trusty staff; and be sure that while he nervously handled the top of that stiff strong weapon, it took all the old man's memory of his promise, and all his love for Joyce that made him keep it, to restrain him from cutting that honeymoon very short, or sending the gentleman to pass it among the doctors.

But the old man did nothing of the kind. A voice came up to him from the next churchyard—

"Promise me that you will never hurt him."

If Latson's heart had been fashioned of the ordinary material, we should have said that this promise, though kept in the letter, was broken by the old man in the spirit of it.

For certainly what followed would have hurt the majority of men at such a time.

Holding both hat and stick in his left hand, the poor old father came and tottered up to Latson's side, just as he was going to place his lady in the carriage, and with his right hand he respectfully held out a gold ring, quite as good and quite as small as the other that had just been disposed of in the church.

"Please to take it, sir," Claymore muttered in the bridegroom's ear. "We didn't like her to go down to the grave with a lie in her hand, so her mother sends it where it belongs. God help you, lady!—God help you, lady!" he added in a louder voice to Ethel, and was gone, before Latson had mustered self-possession enough either to refuse the offering or to reply.

The paleness on his cheek was only for a moment, and then he laughed it off to her, as they dashed along, telling her, with his usual facility in a lie—

"I forgot the old fellow for the moment. He has only brought back, in a tiff, a sovereign I gave his daughter the other day, when I was obliged to send her about her business at the Towers. I gave the girl a sovereign, through the housekeeper, and this worthy Methuselah, it seems, prefers his pride to his pocket—aha!"

And the happy pair went one road, and the broken-hearted father went another.

And while the gondolier is humming low music over foreign lakes, when the milder weather returns,— and while the whip of the diligence cracks and wakes the echoes of the Jura,—and when, amidst loud rejoicings, and through green arches, the happy pair come back, after months of foreign travel,—neither rain nor ice has rubbed out those two letters from the slab in Soreby churchyard. But now and then, a penitent visits it, and a penitent's wife comes, too, and murmurs over it, loving and beloved—

"There the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

CHAPTER XI.

NUMBER NINETEEN.

RUTH WOLFELD would have been the very last person in the world to draw the distinction that was drawn by the charitable charwoman, between "poor folks" and "millionary" people.

It certainly was not any absurd idea that dress-making raised her above her neighbours, that first led her to take to it. She knew better. She knew that, in the books of etiquette, which you cannot buy at the shops, but which are learned by heart, in kitchens and in sculleries, and by hall-porters in their chairs (like sedans with the fronts off), any housemaid, second, third, or fourth, is ranked above the dressmaker, i.e., the dressmaker who "goes out." Nay, Ruth knew very well how her excellent neighbour herself would have spoken, not only of, but as a dressmaker, if she had been scrubbing or washing, where Ruth was gone for a day's sewing.

We cannot explain it—we only know it is so, that a duster and a long broom are just as proud over a needle and a thimble, as a carriage and pair would be over a donkey-gig; and that a little dab of a cap, scoring a ribbon, at the back of the head, or a night-cap with strings that never tie, would as soon associate with the neat side-combs and the humble top-knot of "Miss Wolfeld come for to stitch," as a duke's coronet would with the motto-seal "Keep within compass," or "I envy my letter."

We said we couldn't explain it. We half think we can. The dressmaker is above the cook, and certainly above the charwoman, in the view of the lower half of the middle classes; and this is an offence. And as the dressmaker never complains, she frequently has a hard time of it, where her employers fail to protect her.

Then, besides, the "young woman" stitching in the nursery, or in the spare bedroom, always makes a little extra work, though she tries to make as little as she can. And to clean after a dressmaker is, especially to your London servant, just what you would feel to be shaking hands with a crossing-sweeper.

Let no decent, humble, quiet housemaid—of which class there are thousands in the land—fancy we have overlooked her. We say the same about domestic servants that we have said above about some other classes, viz., that it is a noble thing, a thing to make one proud of dear England, that, with so few comforts and so many trials, in kitchen as elsewhere, humble industry is working away, and serving its Maker.

Meek and quiet Mary or Martha, we don't mean you.

But you have sisters, depend upon it, to whom this part of our narration would look like no fiction, but a cruel tell-tale.

Yes; and we could improve a little upon this statement, and say that there is many a family in this highly respectable country, where the housemaid is the mistress even of the governess.

Many and many a family could we tell of where the well-born young lady whose father's death without a will, gave every shilling to a kind, elder brother, save a little to mamma, has thought it right, and independent, and honourable (all which it is) to go out and earn, rather than make her mother's little less, and be thought a bore by the heir-at-law, who promised her a pound a quarter pocket-money; we say we could tell of many a family where this lady, in every sense a lady, could go to court and bow, without a quaver of discontentment, to the queen of these kingdoms, but who could not ask the housemaid in the family for a flat candlestick, without her heart coming up into her mouth.

This, ladies and gentlemen, we take leave to tell you, is one of the crying abominations of England's social life—an abomination against which we here record our solemn purpose, if ever we have a chance, summarily to deal with and put down. If it should ever happen to us to require a governess, and by careful scrutiny we perceive that she is pilloried by Mary Ann or by John Thomas, from the day of that discovery Mary Ann makes no more beds for us—John Thomas buys no more hair-powder on our account. Besides which, to compensate for the past insult, Miss Lansdowne shall have an advance of salary—and instead of teaching English and five other languages for £9 10s. per year, she shall have 10s. extra; and, missing the languages, be required only to teach our children to love their neighbours as themselves.

We sincerely apologise for saying here a word that may read like patronage of nearly the worst treated class in English society. We disclaim utterly the intention. What we wish is, that managers of households looked more closely after people whom they are pleased to think of as dependents; and as to servants, we wish the mistress looked after their side smirks and petty impertinences, as well as into their boxes when silver spoons are missing, and besides slipping in unawares at the backfloors when followers are suspected; and above all we wish that the entire race of daily governesses, and daily dressmakers too (we only mention them together because they are equally the victims of wrong in the parlour and kitchen)—we only wish they would form themselves into one grand glorious league, and calmly announce to the families of Great Britain, their intention to be regarded, for all time to come, as the sisters of the mistress, and the temporary mistresses of the maid; this denied them, we should like to see an act of parliament endowing them, one and all, with a free passage, and a competency, till they made it for themselves, wherever they liked to settle—in the Canadas or in Australasia.

Now, Ruth, as we have said, was conscious of no social superiority, as compared with her neighbour. She knew that she wrought every whit as hard as the charwoman; and she had only taken to work at home, because of the very treatment we have denounced; treatment which her next door neighbour would never have endured without letting them "know" (as she would have phrased it) "a little bit of her mind."

There was one place, for instance, to which Ruth used to go for a day's sewing, where the two servants were in the habit of setting her to eat her meals from a dresser by herself, and serving her with the scraps that came down on the plates of the family.

On one occasion, the poor girl ventured to ask for an additional supply. She was assisted from the cook's plate; and when, next morning, the mistress inquired for the cold meat that was to serve for another dinner, the answer was—

"Cold meat, m'm!—yes m'm—if you'd please to let us know how much that ere Miss What's-her-name is to have, for, as true as I stand here, Jane and I helped that blessed chit four times yesterday, from the best part of the leg."

So when Ruth went on the next occasion, she was visited by the lady of the house after this manner:—

"I think, Miss Wolfeld, considering the sedentary life you lead, less animal food would really be better for you. At least it would be better for me. I really can't afford it. Suppose we say sixpence a day more, and you bring your own dinner. How will that be?"

"Thank you, ma'am," said the girl, "I'll do so next time I come."

When the lady had taken her departure, Ruth remaining—"Jinny," said the cook, "I say, speak for a bit of that tripe which comes next week: I'm sick at the thoughts on it. You'll bring plates, too, miss, if you please—we're rather short of dishcloths here."

"I'll remember to bring a plate," Ruth said, to the loud amusement of the kitchen ladies.

At another house she was permitted to sit at the table of her employer, which was a very high distinction. And so there was an opportunity for being told, every meal, when to resume work, which was another distinction.

"We will excuse you, I think, Miss Wolfeld." And this, when Master William Henry, aged five, has had two "helpings" of meat and three of pudding, —Miss Wolfeld half a one of each.

Somewhere else, Ruth had gone into the sitting-room to ask a question necessary to her work, and found a fine lady sitting with her mistress, a lady whom the mistress delighted to honour. "Ah!" said the woman to her visitor, "yes, this is the person I spoke to you about, whose father died the other day. Poor thing, her mother is going too, I suppose, eh, Miss Wolfeld? Yes, now, that will do, I'm engaged at present." And before the door was shut, Ruth heard her add, "I would give out the work, you know, my dear, but she comes for a mere song, and eats like a sparrow."

And so it came to pass, that Ruth "went out" no more. She very wisely considered, that a shilling a day and her "keep," were bad terms for twelve hours' hard work, and a dog's life into the bargain. Dog! we should have liked to see anybody speak to Punch or Dash, as this gentle girl was spoken to, equally by vulgar scullery, and by more vulgar parlour.

However, at the time when we made her acquaintance, in the character of another Pharaoh's daughter, Ruth and her mother were just making a living between them. The old woman could sew very little, but she did the rougher work that took less eyesight, and had the charge of the household income and expenditure (save the mark!).

Everybody liked the old woman. She was the very model of cleanliness and neatness, and passed among the neighbours as "little Starchy." Perhaps her shyness at making new friends had also something to do with her title.

Her part in the new arrangements rendered necessary by the coming of little Hugh into the household, was of course that of chief nurse. For Ruth had, more than ever, to ply the needle. But still, it was not a rare thing for those gentle arms to inclose the baby, and yet manage to be doing something at the ends, for their daily bread. In fact, the child never missed its mother, and if Joyce could have lifted that heavy slab in Soresby churchyard, and stolen a watchful look at her little Hugh in the stranger's house, she would have seen that an angel had really found out her Ishmael, and "God had heard the voice of the lad, where he was."

One of the greatest treats the poor woman had in the course of the year, was when old Claymore managed to get up to town, which was very seldom, and paid them a visit to see how it fared with his grandson. They were very high days indeed at number nineteen. It was generally known a week before, when the old man was coming, and it cost Ruth an hour or two's extra hard stitching, that they might have some little better fare than common, when the dear old traveller got in. He always came laden with plenty of presents from Arland—little dresses of the old grandmother's make, and all sorts of nick-nacks that children are supposed to like, both for the palate and for play.

"It's nearly time," said the grandfather, one day when he sat with the child, now nearly two years old, and the slightest, whitest, quietest little creature that perhaps ever was nursed, "it's nearly time we gave thee some name, my lad, as well as Hugh, isn't it?"

"Won't his name be Claymore?" asked the old woman.

"Never!" said the old man. "I'd rather call him Latson than that."

"Then call him Church," said little Ruth, as she went back in her dear, kind thoughts to the little bundle on the stone pavement, that Sunday night.

"Church—Hugh Church—not so bad, not so bad," said the grandfather, taking him by the chin gently, and lifting up his little thoughtful face, so that their eyes met, and kissing, as he always took care to do, that pretty, short, upper lip, all by itself, he named the boy "Hugh Church."

And we hope no reader is ashamed to learn, what certainly we are very glad to tell, that before the old man left that night, for his quiet lodging, and after little Hugh was safe and silent in his cot, those three knelt down round about him as he lay asleep; and the grandfather prayed, heart and soul, for the future of his daughter's child. No worship was ever truer in the temple than that which had just given to the boy his name. They prayed to be forgiven their trespasses, as they forgave those that trespassed against them. They prayed for Ruth, that she might have strength to work for the family, and grace to bring up the child well; for the old woman present, and the old woman alone at home. Yes, and they prayed for Ethel, the great Lady Ethel, that she might live happier than some one else had lived! and then,—was there any one besides? Yes, they prayed for the Honourable Hugh!—prayed, because they thought that some spirit in the chamber was telling them to pray for him—that infinite mercy would not lay his sins to his charge; that he might live long enough to be forgiven, and to make somebody the happier for his living, which he had never done for one moment in his life, yet. And then their hearts went up and their tears fell for the poor motherless boy, who breathed soft responses, though in slumber, as the old man finished, "Lead him not into temptation, but deliver him from evil."

CHAPTER XII.

FULFILLS A PROPHECY.

THERE WAS not one prayer too many offered, in that low London room, for the comfort and the happiness of the Lady Ethel.

Ye who read, from day to day, the newspaper stories of ruffians brought before magistrates, for half-murdering, or quite murdering, the wretched creatures whom the law calls their wives,—beware how ye think, that all the woe of married life festers and bleeds in dark cellars, or in garrets that let in the rain! Pokers and pewter-pots are not the only symbols of human faithfulness to the vow, "for better for worse, to love and to cherish," and a man may knock down a woman in another sense besides that which obtains for him the familiar six months (which ought to be six years) at the oakum-picking.

Ethel had hardly ceased to think herself a bride, when she found all this out.

And yet, we are not going to say that Latson loved her less than he would have loved another wife. He probably loved her quite as much as he could love any one. It was not merely for the sake of the alliance, which was certainly a step upwards,—nor yet to see a pretty woman at the head of his table, that Latson married. No, nor yet merely because Ethel had the reputation of being hard to catch, and because he boasted that he never was beaten in anything he undertook.

No, if you can imagine that Latson could love without himself existing at the same time, then it might be said, that Latson loved his wife. As it was, he loved himself; and nobody found any love from him, or ever would find any, except what was reflected, so to speak, from his own deep self-love. Ethel, at first, made him proud of her, and this served to keep him bearable and her happy, for a little while—a very little while.

It is the evening of the day after the countess's funeral. For she had been gradually growing worse ever since Ethel left, on being married. And at the end of the eighth month, and when the bride and bridegroom had been settled but two or three weeks at The Towers, the old family vault had been opened under the Blance pew; and the bell which had spoken deepest on the wedding day, when the peal fired out, "Joined!" had now spoken all by itself, as the black spectacle drew up where the white one had been, at the church gates, and every minute the muffled tongue said, "Doomed!" as if under its breath, and as if shy at telling the village that a countess was not immortal.

And the crimson velvet is obliged to make friends with the stone shelf down in the vault—and the little oil lamp has done flickering on the brazen handles, and is carried up again—and the flagging and the flooring look all as right as ever, in the great pew; and the old sexton thinks the church looks "quite naytural like" in its black cloth once more, and goes forth among the neighbours to tell the little he knew, and the much he didn't know, of the deceased, "my lady."

It is the evening of the next day.

Outside The Towers, of course, every one supposes there is deep grief within.

And so there is in one room.

For, although Ethel had thought herself long prepared for being left motherless, no one has ever yet been prepared for that black week between a death and a funeral; and, worse still, for the blank when undertakers are all gone, and the blinds are drawn up, as if nothing had happened.

Maude is sitting with her, in a small library—the usual after-dinner room when there was no company; and they are looking over some papers of their late mother's, ready for a conference with the family solicitor to-morrow. They have neither father nor brother to attend to these matters, and many things have yet to be arranged.

Where is Latson?

He is in deep mourning, with three or four like-minded ones, who are not particular about the etiquette of such seasons, in the billiard-room. And Ethel can hear the loud cannons (not of the balls, she is too far off, but) of her husband's laughter. Aye, and they are double-shotted, and are pointed at her; and they hit her, too, as the tender partner of her sorrows joins in a new joke, or hears a new story, for anything she knows by this time, at her own expense.

"Well, but, dearest Letty," Maude said, as they put away the papers for the night, both bursting into fresh tears, "well, but remember how hard it goes with me, when I have just lost my last comfort—at least, last save you. Providence married you just in time, Letty."

For, whatever Maude had said by way of caution, she was not the girl to whisper a syllable of upbraiding now.

And Ethel heaved the deepest sigh she had heaved yet; and then, suddenly threw herself on her sister's neck, and sobbed as if on the verge of violent hysterics, while Maude tenderly checked her, supposing this new outburst to be only the bitterness of filial grief breaking out again.

It was not that just then.

It was that Maude's kind words had sent her, just for one brief moment, to look into her husband's heart for a drop of comfort, and she went, in thought, and looked for it, and came back without one drop, and with this conviction instead:—

"He doesn't love me! I have buried both mother and husband." But she breathed nothing of this to her sister—partly too proud, partly too kind to Latson.

And so they sat, and talked, far on into the night. Each of them alternately comforting the other, but both of them, at very short intervals, bursting out into fresh tears.

"Let me go," said Maude, at last; "one o'clock, Letty! Had you any notion of the hour, my dear child? May I ring, dearest?" And they stood up together against the mantelpiece; and Ethel took up from the table a long piece of jet black hair, which they had handled that evening many a time already, and taking her sister's right hand into hers, Ethel, with her left, twined that black hair in many a fold, in and out, round and round their two hands, and looking up tenderly into Maude's face, through a new torrent of tears, said—

"Come what will, darling, this will hold us to each other, will it not? Oh, Maude—Maude!"

And here broke in upon them a louder roar of laughter than the rest, and Ethel stopped to shudder, and went on, turning very pale—

"What if the only friend left us, dearest, should turn out to be this soft, precious chain? Is it strong enough, dear Maude? Would it bear hard tugs, think ye, if any one tried to separate us, and pulled me back away from you? Would it keep us fast?"

And she made as if she were trying to pull her hand away, to test the strength of the hair.

"Who should pull us from one another, Letty?" Maude asked.

"Who has pulled mamma from us?" asked Ethel.

"Aye, we cannot prevent that separation, dear Letty."

"Oh, Maude—Maude! may you never know that there is a Death that comes in the midst of Life! I feel at this moment not far off it, though the pulse beats just as usual, and there is no outside chill. Not to love, not to be loved, my sister, is to die! Will you forsake me, when I have become careless even to you? Oh, Maude, if I should!"

And Maude, concluding that her sister hardly knew what she said, unstrung as her mind was with the heavy loss still so recent, having rung the bell, tenderly kissed Ethel, and followed her maid to her room; and rejoiced that every step along the gallery took her farther from the coarse mirth of that horrid billiard-room.

Sleep on, fair, gentle sleeper, while another is awake and watching down below! None of the misery in that heavy heart is of thy making. While there was time to turn, thou didst counsel, and plead, and pray. It was well. Now that is too late to speak, thou art silent. Again, it is well. October leaves patter down, slowly, past thy window, as thou liest and forgettest where thou art. And down stairs there is a tree—slight, weak, and without shelter.

From that tree dead leaves are falling just as fast!

When they are all down, and the branches are quite in the mid-winter which is coming on, then, Maude, it will be no time for a sister to be asleep.

For the present, dreaming and hoping, sleep on!

CHAPTER XIII.

FILLS THE CUP TO THE BRIM.

ETHEL sat on in that room for two hours more, all alone. She went over the papers again and again; and had that long band of black hair been curled by some cunning dresser, it would hardly have looked more wavy than it was, after its many twinings around the daughter's fingers as she sat and mused, when the papers were again put away.

Suddenly the wife started up.

She remembered she had heard no laughter for a long while. She listened, and she heard not a single sound.

Half-past three struck by the chimney-piece clock as she rung the bell—gently, for she felt afraid at the silence.

When the servant appeared, Ethel inquired whether the colonel was still in the billiard-room.

The man could hardly conceal his astonishment as he answered—

"No, my lady. The colonel retired about two o'clock."

"To his room?" asked Ethel, choking, as the man himself could plainly see, and mentioned five minutes afterwards.

"Yes, my lady."
 "That will do," said his mistress. "Send Mrs. Glyde—no, no," she added, hurriedly correcting herself; "you may all retire."

And though Maude never knew it, Ethel snatched not one moment's sleep on that same October night.

There she sat on the very night save one of her mother's funeral, never having heard a single word of comfort from her husband's lips, and not even allowed to know when his guests departed, or to see his face for an instant when they were gone.

Then had there been a quarrel?

Not at all.

Did he dislike Maude, or object to her presence in his house?

Not that any one knew. Ethel would have met even her only sister elsewhere, rather than have displeased her husband by inviting her to his house; but she never dreamed of his objection.

Nor had he any. He cared nothing for Maude. He cared just as much for her as for Ethel.

The simple explanation of to-night's indifference is that, no one before whom he needs to act a part is present, and, therefore, he acts no part. He acts as if Ethel were not in the house.

But nothing bewilders or knocks her down in this particular neglect save its cruel degree; neglect itself is altogether no novelty. To sit in the same room without speaking for two or three hours together has become common with the master and mistress of that house. For even the warmest love will cease at last to offer itself: nay, it ceases because it is warm and will not pain the object of it; but, till now, he had always said "Good night."

Ethel sat on and on in that room.

She sat till she heard the first movements of the servants up stairs; and then softly, as if she were a spirit flitting up the staircase, she made her way to her dressing-room.

She started, and her head fell forward on her clenched hands when she seated herself at the table, and saw in the glass the work of that single night.

From that moment the poor creature saw that her dream was over, and that all the happiness of wedded life she was to know on earth was gone for ever.

She merely refreshed herself by a plentiful laving of that burning head and face with cold water, and putting off the evening dress, in which all her woe had been endured, appeared at the proper time, in the ordinary morning robe, with her sister and her husband, at the breakfast table.

Yet you would have seen no severity, no signs of deep-seated anger, not even sulkiness, on the countenance of the Honourable Hugh.

He tapped his egg, and sipped his coffee, without one word or look of dislike, either to Ethel or to her sister; and when breakfast was over, he strode out of the room to a conference with his steward, in that same little chamber where his wife's heart had lain bleeding a few hours before.

And now, go again, Sir Colonel, to the county bench—call up the trembling men and women, who neglect the duties of their line of life; apprentice, housemaid, farm-labourer—aye, and punish the little boy who climbed over into the orchard of one of your tenants, last night, and carried off a peck of sorry apples. Let him go for his fourteen days, and twice let him be privately whipped. It is very wrong to steal the apples of a man, even though he has a thousand bushels. There is no harm in stealing a lady's heart (or obtaining it under false pretences), and then, flinging it down before her face, tread out its love!

I HAVE NO MOTHER NOW.

I HEAR the soft wind sighing
 Through every bush and tree,
 Where now dear mother's lying
 Away from love and me.
 Tears from mine eyes are starting,
 And sorrow shades my brow,
 Oh, weary was our parting—
 I have no mother now!

I see the pale moon shining
 On mother's white head-stone;
 The rose-bush round it twining,
 Is here like me—alone.
 And just like me are weeping
 Those dew-drops from the bough;
 Long time has she been sleeping—
 I have no mother now!

My heart is ever lonely,
 My life is drear and sad,
 'Twas her dear presence only
 That made my spirit glad.
 From morning until even,
 Care rests upon my brow;
 She's gone from me to heaven—
 I have no mother now!

ANNA; OR, COTTAGE DEVOTION.

ANNA FISHER was a farmer's daughter, but her beauty might have been coveted by many a high-born dame. As her father was in comfortable circumstances, and both he and his wife were proud of their lovely daughter, she was allowed to work or be idle at her own fancy, and her only regular duty was attention to the comfort of her blind sister Ella. Still, although preserving her delicate hands soft and white, and her form stately and tall, Anna was by no means a useless member of the cottage family. Her busy fingers shaped the snowy caps, which her mother declared "fitted her head as if they were made for it." Ella's spotless dresses and muslins owed much of their purity to her sister's watchful care; and many a dainty dish found its way to the farmer's table, which he well knew was provided by Anna. So, with light pleasant duties, rendered dear by home affections, the young girl's life sped on. But a change came.

There arrived at the pleasant village, for recreation, a young man, of handsome face and figure, and winning address; one skilled in the art of pleasing. With his time unoccupied, and his fancy struck by Anna's exceeding loveliness, he determined to win the love of the young country girl.

It was just after sunset, one pleasant spring evening, that Anna was walking slowly through one of her father's meadows, on her way home, when she was startled by the report of a gun, from a little thicket near her. With a feeling of terror—for the sound was not a common one in that peaceful neighbourhood—she quickened her pace, and was hurrying on, when a voice calling her made her pause. In an instant the sportsman stood before her, apologising for the fright he had caused her, and pleading the unfrequented spot as an excuse for his having chosen it for sporting.

"But what were you shooting so late as this?"

The young man was unprepared for this question, and stammered something about an accidental discharge.

Accidental! So far as watching for some hours for Anna's return, and then firing in the hopes of startling her, could make it. He introduced himself as Edwin Parker, from London, and she in return told him her name. When they parted at Farmer Fisher's gate, it was with a determination on his part that this should not be their last meeting, and a strong desire on hers to see him again.

Somehow it happened that Anna grew very fond of taking long strolls about sunset; and Edwin, by some unaccountable magic, was always going the same way about the same time.

I will now give my readers the substance of a conversation which passed between the lovers one evening, some four or five weeks after their first meeting. They were walking in the old meadow, Edwin's arm was thrown round Anna's waist in the most natural way possible.

"Anna," he said, in a low tone, "you do not answer me; I say I must return to London to-morrow."

"It is so sudden!" murmured the young girl. "But you will be here soon again, Edwin?"

"That, it is impossible for me to tell. It may be years before I can visit this spot again. Oh, Anna!" he cried, in a sudden burst of passion, "how can I live without you? Why must we part?"

"Hush, Edwin, you are too violent. You will, you must return soon!"

"Soon! A whole year must pass before I can come here again."

There was a moment's silence, then bending over her, Edwin whispered: "Anna, do you love me?"

"You know I do," she answered.

"Do you love me well enough to trust your future happiness in my hands, to be my wife?"

"I do, but my father—"

"Hates me; I know it well," said Edwin, bitterly. "He believes because I am no farmer's lad, but a gentleman, that there is no truth or goodness in me. Believe me, Anna, it is only his prejudice against cities that causes your father's dislike to me."

"But," faltered Anna, "that prejudice is so strong that I fear he will never consent to my wedding you."

"Once my wife, dearest, and he will forgive you. Though he might not be willing to let his child go, still, believe me, if the knot was tied, he would forgive."

It took long, even with Edwin's most subtle reasoning, to win Anna's consent to a clandestine marriage, but it was given at length, and, with a promise to be in the meadow that night prepared for a journey to London, she left him.

When she reached home, she found the family only awaiting her return for the customary evening devotions. Seating herself opposite her father, Anna, listened to the words of Divine truth which he read. After reading a chapter from the New Testament, he read in a clear distinct voice, the commandment: "Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Then rising, he kissed Ella and Anna, and left the room.

Anna sat motionless where he had left her; her mother, the servant, her little brother, and, last of all, Ella left the room, but still she remained.

"Heavenly Father," she murmured, bowing her head upon her hands, "strengthen this poor head, and guide me in the right way!" Heavy sobs choked her voice, and she gave way to a violent fit of weeping.

"Sister Anna," said the low, sweet voice of her blind sister, coming in, "you are weeping! Will you not tell me what troubles you?"

Choking back her sobs, Anna endeavoured to speak cheerfully to Ella; it was in vain; and, after one or two fruitless efforts, she silently embraced her, and sought her own room.

Edwin Parker was early at the appointed rendezvous, and awaited impatiently for Anna. The hour was past, and still she came not. At length, weary with watching, Edwin strode from the meadow to the little country inn where he lodged. On his table he found a tiny note directed to himself.

"Ah!" he murmured, as he tore it open, "detained at home, I imagine; this will explain all."

Within, he found these words—

"DEAR EDWIN,—Could one who forsook her first duty, that to her parents, fulfil the holy duties the name of wife would bring? I dare not come: it has cost me much to write this, but I feel that I am doing right, and that strengthens me. Win my father's consent, and I am yours. ANNA."

"Pshaw!" said Edwin, tossing the note impatiently into the fire, "it isn't worth the trouble."

The next morning Edwin Parker had left the village.

About a month after this, Anna was in the garden, watering some plants, when her father joined her.

"Anna," said he, "do you recollect a young man who was here some weeks ago, named Parker?"

How her heart bounded!

"Yes, father," she said.

"He has been arrested for forgery, and is—Heavens, Anna, how pale you are! Are you faint?"

"I am better now," said Anna, struggling for composure. "Father, I will tell you all, and then pray for your forgiveness."

"Dear Anna, did you think your old father was blind? No, no, my child, you need tell me nothing. The commandment was not selected by chance. I knew all then; and heaven alone knew the joy of your father's heart when he saw you still with him after the tempter had left the place."

"How did you know?" asked the astonished girl.

"I was passing in the thicket when your appointment was made, and overheard all. I watched your chamber door all night, thinking to stop you by force if you ventured out! Thank God, it was not needed."

"Thank God, indeed!" said Anna. "Had I not called upon His name, I should now be either the forger's wife or the wretched, suspected daughter."

CHRISTMAS TREES.

THEY keep up Christmas in Russia with a good deal of rejoicing. That cold climate is not so frigid as to freeze up the sympathy of human hearts.

In the north of Europe especially, Christmas trees are famous. These form one of the leading features of a northern Christmas, and are hung full of apples, gingerbread, and toys.

The birthplace of the Christmas tree is Egypt, and its origin dates from a period long antecedent to the Christian era. The palm tree is known to put forth a shoot every month; and a spray of this tree, with twelve shoots on it, was used in Egypt at the time of the winter solstice as a symbol of its year completed. The palm tree spray of Egypt, on reaching Italy, became a branch of any other tree (the tip of the fir was found most suitable, from its pyramidal or conical form), and was decorated with burning tapers, lit in honour of Saturn, whose saturnalia were celebrated from the 17th to the 21st of December, the period of the winter solstice. The lighted tapers, the presents given (saturnalia), and the entertainment of the domestics on a footing of equality, date from this age. After the saturnalia came the days called the sigillaria, when presents were made of impressions stamped on wax, which still form part of the furniture of a Christmas tree. To the sigillaria succeeded one day called the juvenalia, on which everybody, even adults, indulged in childish sports, and hence the romping close of our Christmas festivities.

With the Germans the greatest Christmas festival is our Christmas-eve, the heilge-abend, which has the more propriety, as, whatever doubt attaches to the date of his birth, it is certain that our Lord was born in the night-time. The festival itself is called weihnacht, or night dedicated to the commemoration. As Christmas-eve always falls on the evening of Adam and Eve's day, an orthodox Christmas tree will have the figures of our first parents at its foot, and the serpent twining himself round its stem. By a bold stretch of theological fancy, the tree, with its branches and tapers, is, with the above-mentioned accessories, understood to typify the genealogy of our Lord, closing in the most luminous apex, the sun of light and life, "the seed of the woman that should crush the serpent's head." The Romans had already affixed as the summit of their trees a representation of a radiant sun, in honour of Phoebus Apollo, to whom the three last days of December were dedicated. In connection with this god, sheep were sometimes exhibited pasturing under the tree, or Apollo himself took charge of the herd, or taught the shepherds the use of the pipe. This was skilfully construed by the Christian clergy to be emblematic of the Good Shepherd, &c.; the sigillaria of the Romans were impressed with the images of saints and holy persons; the lighted tapers, also borrowed from the saturnalia, were retained here, as elsewhere, as portion of the religious ceremony. The giving of presents, another portion of the saturnalia, was understood to be expressive of Christian brotherly love; while the apples, nuts, and gingerbread—equally unmistakable remnants of the northern heathen mythology—have been kept in the service of the Christian festival, as accessories that sufficiently recommended themselves without typifying anything particularly holy.

The accompanying illustration represents the interior of a Russian cabin on Christmas-eve.

THE LITTLE SAVOYARD.

FROM THE FRENCH.

EVERYBODY in Paris still remembers the brilliant wedding of M. Andrew J., one of the wealthiest bankers of the Chausse d'Antin, with Mlle. de V., only daughter of the Marquis de V., former ambassador and peer of France—a wedding celebrated a few years since with so great pomp at the chapel of the palace of the Luxembourg, and in the magnificent hotel of M. J. But everybody does not know the singular and charming episode which attended the entertainments of the aristocratic marriage, and which acquired for the husband in the banking halls a reputation for unequalled originality.

It was the morning of the wedding. The equipages of M. Andrew J. were awaiting him in the court, and he was awaiting his witnesses in a room gilt from floor to ceiling, when a valet de chambre announced the tailors of Monsieur. In fact, ten tailors entered, each bearing a large parcel under his arm, and all, like Roman soothsayers, unable to look at each other without laughing.

These ten tailors bore fifty costumes of Savoyard chimney-sweeps for statures of from eight to fourteen years, which they deposited on the brilliant fauteuils of the saloon. M. J. examined as a connoisseur this collection of waistcoats, jackets, and trousers, declared himself satisfied, and distributed two thousand francs to the tailors, who retired with a stupefied air.

After the tailors came the hatters, with fifty caps; then the chemisiers with fifty shirts, the shoemakers with fifty pairs of shoes, and last of all the musical-instrument maker with fifty hurdy-gurdys. All went away well paid, but more and more mystified, and asking whether all this was done for a wager.

M. J. then summoned all his clerks, and spoke to them in this manner:—

"You will traverse all the quarters of Paris, and invite all the chimney-sweeps you meet to dine with me. You will promise a louis to all those who accept, and when you have found fifty you will bring them here. You will find in my bathing room all that is necessary for washing them from head to foot. This operation ended, you will make them put on these costumes, each according to his stature; then seat them at the table in this saloon, while our other guests dine in the adjoining one."

The clerks were amazed, made him repeat the order to assure themselves that it was not a dream, and went to execute it without understanding it.

It was one of the coldest mornings in winter. Frost had succeeded to snow. A pale sun was illuminating the ice without dissolving it. It was fine weather for sweeping chimneys, and the messengers of M. J. soon found the number of chimney-sweeps required. Imagine their surprise when they were promised a louis each on the sole condition of accepting an invitation to a wedding dinner. The good news ran from chimney to chimney like a telegraphic despatch; and in less than two hours there was scarcely a Savoyard to be met with in the streets. All the chimneys which had to be swept that day were threatened with a conflagration.

Having only the embarrassment of a choice, the emissaries of the banker bravely seized the blackest, dirtiest, and most ragged; and when they made their entry into the beautiful hotel of M. J., one would have thought it the palace of Jupiter invaded by Vulcan. The contrast was the more striking, that our messengers encountered the file of equipages which were bringing back the wedding party from the Luxembourg. On one side, liveries of gold and silver, dresses of silk and velvet, laces and jewels, the most elegant dandies and prettiest women in Paris; on the other, faces covered with sweat and smoke, hair in disorder, rags or half-naked bodies.

While these brilliant guests turned away their eyes, asking what it signified, M. J. fixed on the Savoyards a melancholy glance, and seemed to say within himself, "Is happiness to be found here or there?"

"It is here!" replied his lips, as he pressed them upon the hand of his charming wife. And he introduced her as a queen into his palace, not without having made a sign to his people to take care of the chimney-sweeps.

An hour afterwards, a stream black as ink crossed the court and emptied into the street gutter. It was the washings from fifty Savoyards, who at the same instant emerged from the bath so much fairer and whiter, plumper and fresher, that they had literally new skins, and the latter for the first time saw the air and sun. One would have thought a company of frightful demons had been transformed into cherubs and cupids.

Meanwhile, the hour for the entertainment arrived. A thousand lights, sparkling from gold and bronze, illuminated the hotel. After having traversed the apartments of the newly-married couple, enriched with all which the taste of a millionaire could devise, the guests had just arranged themselves around a table, and had entirely forgotten the apparition of the chimney-sweeps.

Suddenly, the two leaves of the large folding-doors flew open. The adjoining saloon was seen also illuminated, garnished with a splendid banquet, and filled with a throng of joyous guests. It was like a scene at the theatre, or the stroke of a fairy's wand.

Everybody uttered an exclamation of surprise, except M. Andrew J. and his wife, who exchanged a smile of intelligence. But they could scarcely believe their own eyes and ears, or recognise the frightful little Savoyards of the morning changed into pretty children, all in new jackets, new shoes, new caps, dancing and singing to the sound of their hurdy-gurdies, and about to eat from silver and drink from crystal.

It was like a vision of Savoy, as the poets and painters represent it. Nothing was wanting but smoking cabins and snow-covered hills. M. J. pressed his wife's hand, and concealed his eyes filled with tears.

"My friends," said he to his rich guests, "pardon my fantasy. Finding myself to-day the most fortunate of men, I wished to share my happiness with the most unfortunate."

This noble explanation was applauded by all; but they suspected that only a corner of the veil had been raised, and while awaiting the dénouement of the scene, little and great dined their very best. The little ones, especially, made amends in an hour for all the days of fasting which had already marked their short lives. The juicy dishes, the delicate game, the exquisite ragouts, the exotic fruits and even wines, found a ready market. Attended by servants, not one abused plenty; and all had nearly had their fill, when M. Andrew J. arose amid the most profound silence.

"Well, my children," asked he of the chimney-sweeps, "have I attained my object? Are you happy?"

The children replied by applause and joyous exclamations, which left no room for doubt.

"We are amused for our whole lives," cried one of the largest, who did not think he was saying anything sad.

"Not for your whole lives!" replied the banker; "for you may be as fortunate yourselves, and make, in your turn, the happiness of others, if happiness is in wealth. I will prove this to you by relating a story, which will teach you how chimney-sweeps may become millionaires."

At this electric speech, the hundred little ears became erect, like those of young horses ready for the combat.

"Yes, my friends," pursued M. Andrew J., "it rests with yourselves to have also a grand hotel, gilded saloons, rich equipages, and to dine every day as you have just done. Listen to the story of a Savoyard who was more miserable than any of you. This lesson is worth a wedding feast.

"There was a little chimney-sweep of your age. He was called Sans-feu-ni-lieu, because he had neither father, mother, nor home. The people of his village gave him a scraper, a cage, and a sparrow-hawk; put a loaf under his arm, and a staff in his hand, showed him France in the horizon, and said to him, 'March!' Sans-feu-ni-lieu departed contented enough, lost sight of his steeple, was saving of his bread, shared it with his bird, but soon found the end of it. He lived thus from village to village, singing for a sou, dancing for two, sweeping a chimney for a little soup, and sleeping with the cows, or in the open air.

"He had travelled thus more than a hundred leagues, when he was surprised by a snow-storm in the middle of a vast forest. In vain he marched on, on; he could not reach habitations. The snow lay on his path in heaps; hunger was joined with fatigue. He had eaten for three days only roots. In short, he believed himself forsaken of God, placed his cage on the ground, dropped at the foot of a tree, hid his benumbed hands in his breast, and fainted with exhaustion. It was all over with Sans-feu-ni-lieu. The snow was falling and threatened to bury him, when a sharp pain awoke him for an instant; his hawk was biting his ear. He thought the bird was trying to eat him, and this fear revived him. But what was his surprise at seeing suspended from the beak of this bird a quarter of roast hare, still smoking. The affrighted hawk had opened its cage and stolen this prey from the dinner of some colliers. Judge of the feast of the child and bird. Sans-feu-ni-lieu saw that he must never despair of Providence; he thanked him on his knees, resolved to make one more effort, and at last reached a neighbouring city, where he worked so well that he earned a new hurdy-gurdy. With this he earned a new jacket, and joyously entered Lyons. He found there a kind master; he saved twenty francs, with which he learned to read, write, and cipher. Now, one day when he was sweeping a chimney, he saw a boy of sixteen weeping, because he could not do a sum which his father had requested him to do. The chimney-sweep laid down his scraper, did the sum in five minutes, and went singing upon the roof. But, on descending, he found the father, who had discovered all. The latter looked at him from head to foot, and asked him, 'How much do you earn per month?'—'From ten to twenty francs.'—'Well, I will give you a hundred francs, if you will come and work for me.' The next day, Sans-feu-ni-lieu had a nice jacket, and a pretty room. He entered as a clerk with this citizen, who was a great machinist. When he was eighteen his salary was doubled. Very soon he perfected a machine invented by his master, and the latter made him a present of the patent, which brought him fifty thousand francs. Then, at the death of father, he became a partner of the son, and both realised a hundred thousand crowns. You already envy the chimney-sweep, do you not, my friends? Well, the failure of an associate ruined him, and he found himself again Sans-feu-ni-lieu. Would you know what he did then? He returned to the source of his fortune, became a workman with a machinist, and so good a workman that he became a master, and instead of a hundred thousand francs gained a million. With this sum he came to Paris and engaged in financial operations. To-day he has doubled his million, he is one of the principal bankers in Paris; but he has forgotten neither his origin nor his misfortunes. And the proof of this, my children, is, that he has invited you to his wedding to relate to you his history, for Sans-feu-ni-lieu is to-day called M. Andrew J. He has just put the climax to his happiness by espousing the daughter of the Marquis de V."

"And this happiness he owes also to himself," exclaimed Madame de J. nobly, extending her hands to her husband. This public confidence, which was no news to the wife and intimate friends of M. Andrew J., had been made by him with so much dignity and good taste, that his proudest guest embraced the former sweep, and the voices of the peers of France mingled with those of the Savoyards in one common acclamation.

"And now, my friends," resumed the banker, "I must show you, before you take leave, the instruments of my fortune; you shall judge for yourselves whether it is within the reach of all."

Everybody followed M. J. into his study. He opened a great bronze coffer, divided into two compartments.

"These are my millions," said he, "and there is what produced them."

They saw in the upper part thirty portfolios filled with bankbills, and in the lower part a poor chimney-sweep's costume, a stuffed bird, a hurdy-gurdy, and a pair of wooden shoes; then the tools of a mechanic—files, hammers, compasses, and other instruments, all arranged and carefully kept by M. Andrew J. himself.

"Unite with these, my friends," said he, "two other admirable tools, perseverance and economy, and you will, like myself, raise your fortunes, of which here is the first stone."

He gave each child a louis, and an order for five hundred francs; and, after another performance of the dances of their country, the fifty Savoyards withdrew, exclaiming, "Long live M. Andrew J."

From that day all showed themselves worthy of their good fortune. Some entered into business, others learnt trades; several entered as clerks with this banker, to learn more intimately how chimney-sweeps become millionaires. The most skilful has just earned five thousand francs in negotiating some business of the Northern Railroad.

Receipts.

TO DYE RIBBONS.—Such colours as will fade can be dyed and renewed. Many ladies, when their ribbons become faded and soiled, throw them away, without ever thinking that, if they were preserved and dyed, they may serve for other purposes; and, as it takes very little time and trouble, I will give you a few receipts. To dye a piece of ribbon, any small vessel will answer; a porcelain pan, tin cup, or any little vessel that is convenient. These dyes will also answer to dye yarns, silk, and other fabrics.

TO DYE YELLOW.—To a pint of water add one tablespoonful of turmeric. Make a strong lather of white soap; add the turmeric and let it boil; then dip the material. Dip it just often enough, so as to have it as deep or as pale as desired. This will also answer to dye yarn.

TO DYE PURPLE AND LILAC.—The purple paper that we get off loaf sugar will dye a beautiful purple or lilac. A sheet or two is sufficient for a piece of ribbon. If yarn or cloth, it will take more. Put in vinegar enough to cover the material. Boil the material until it is as deep a colour as desired. This makes a durable colour, and it will not rub off. It also combines the advantage of being no expense. A little copperas pulverised, and added, will turn this black.

TO DYE BLACK.—To one pound of extract of logwood allow an ounce of blue vitriol. Dissolve the logwood in an iron vessel containing five gallons of water, and let it boil. Add to the logwood a tablespoonful of pulverised copperas. Pulverise the vitriol and dissolve it in a separate vessel, containing the same quantity of water; let this also boil. Scald the material first in the vitriol water, and then put it in the logwood; let it remain two hours scalding in the logwood. It should be frequently stirred. This is a good and convenient dye for silks and muslins. They can be set by washing in a strong lather of home-made soap, and afterwards dipped in salt and water. To give black silk a lustre, strain some cold coffee from the grounds and add a little gum-arabic.

TO DYE WITH COCHINEAL.—To dye purple with cochineal boil an ounce in a quart of vinegar. To dye brown with cochineal, one ounce of cochineal, a teaspoonful of soda to a quart of water. Boil all together, and dip the material.

SILKS.—No silks look well after washing, however carefully it be done, and this method should, therefore, never be resorted to but from absolute necessity. It is recommended to sponge faded silks with warm water and soap, then to rub them with a dry cloth on a flat board, after which to iron them on the inside with a smoothing-iron. Sponging with spirits will also improve old black silks. The ironing may be done on the right side, with thin paper spread over them to prevent glazing.

TO RAISE THE PILE OF VELVET.—When velvet has a whitened, shabby appearance, owing to the pile being pressed down, it may be renovated by damping the back of the velvet, and laying it on a moderately hot smoothing-iron, and at the same time brushing up the pile, or right side of velvet.

TO CLEAN KID GLOVES WITHOUT WETTING.—Lay the gloves upon a clean board, make a mixture of dried fulling earth and powdered alum, and pass them over on each side with a stiff brush. Then sweep the dust off and sprinkle them well with dry bran and whitening, and dust them well. This, if the gloves be not exceedingly soiled, will effectually cleanse them; but if they are much soiled, take out the grease with crumbs of toasted bread and powder of burnt bone, then pass them over with a woollen cloth dipped in fulling earth or powdered alum.

CURIOUS EXPERIMENTS.

FREEZING MIXTURE.—Mix half an ounce of snow with two drachms of diluted nitric acid. If the thermometer be at 32 degrees it will fall to minus 30 degrees, being 62 degrees lower than freezing point of water.

GILDING IVORY.—Put the ivory you intend to gild into a solution of copperas, and then a solution of nitro-muriate of gold; on withdrawing it from the latter, it will be beautifully gilded.

FUSIBLE METAL.—1. Melt together one part of lead, one of tin, and two of bismuth. The alloy will melt at 170 degrees. This alloy was discovered by Darcey. 2. Take of tin three ounces, lead five ounces, bismuth eight ounces, melt them together, and mould the alloy into bars. This may be kept in a state of fusion on paper over a candle; or if made into spoons by a silversmith, they will melt on being put into very hot tea. This was discovered by Newton.

EXPERIMENT WITH GOLD-LEAF.—Pour nitric acid into a wineglass, and hydrochloric acid (muriatic acid) into a similar one, and lay a piece of gold-leaf on the surface of each liquid. No action will take place; but on mixing the two acids, both pieces of gold-leaf will be dissolved.

TO INFLATE A BLADDER WITHOUT AIR.—Put a teaspoonful of ether into a moistened bladder, the neck of which tie up tightly; pour hot water upon the bladder, and the ether by expanding will fill it out.

MORE THAN FULL.—Fill a glass to the brim with water, and you may add to it spirits of wine without causing the water to overflow, as the spirits will enter into the pores of the water.

THE WATER-PROOF SIEVE.—Fill a very fine wire-gauze sieve with water, and it will not run through the interstices, but be retained among them by capillary attraction.

EXPERIMENTS ON CHANGE OF TEMPERATURE.—1. Take a small phial about half full of cold water, grasp it gently in the left hand, and from another phial pour a little sulphuric acid very gradually into the water. A strong sensation of heat will instantly be perceived. This, by continued addition of the acid, may be increased to many degrees of boiling water. 2. Take a small phial in one hand, containing some pulverised sal-ammoniac; pour a small quantity of water upon it and shake the mixture. In this instance, sensation of cold will immediately be felt.

CHEMICAL ANOMALY.—Fill a thermometer tube with cold water, at about thirty-two degrees, and immerse it in a vessel of water. In this case the water in the tube will contract in volume till it arrives at about forty-two degrees; when it will appear for a time nearly stationary. If the heat be now continued, the effect will be reversed, for the water in the tube will expand as its temperature is increased. This is a curious instance of a chemical anomaly.

OPTICAL EXPERIMENT.—If two pieces of transparent white paper be attached to a window and examined through a prism, fringes of red, blue, and yellow will be produced. Should the light of the sun be very vivid there, a very powerful artificial rainbow will result; but if the paper be increased in thickness, the blue colour will preponderate.

THE INQUISITIVE YANKEE.

A GENTLEMAN riding in an Eastern railroad car observed, in a seat before him, a lean, slab-sided Yankee; every feature of his face seemed to ask a question, and a little circumstance soon proved that he possessed a most "inquiring mind." Before him, occupying an entire seat, sat a lady dressed in deep black, and, after shifting his position several times, and manoeuvring to get an opportunity to look into her face, he at length caught her eye.

"In adliction?"

"Yes, sir," responded the lady.

"Parent?—father or mother?"

"No, sir."

"Child, perhaps?—boy or a girl?"

"No, sir, not a child: I have no children."

"Husband, then, I expect?"

"Yes," was the curt answer.

"Hum! Cholery?—a trading man, maybe?"

"My husband was a seafaring man, the captain of a vessel; he did not die of cholera, he was drowned."

"Oh, drowned, eh?" pursued the inquisitor, hesitating for a brief instant.

"Save his chist?"

"Yes; the vessel was saved, and my husband's effects," said the widow.

"Was they?" asked the Yankee, his eyes brightening up. "Pious man?"

"He was a member of the Methodist Church."

The next question was a little delayed; but it came.

"Don't you think you have great cause to be thankful that he was a pious man and saved his chist?"

"I do," said the widow, abruptly, and turned her head to look out of the window. The indefatigable "pump" changed his position, held the widow by his glittering eye once more, and propounded one more query, in a lower tone, with his head slightly inclined forward, over the back of the seat—"Was you calculating to get married again?"

"Sir," said the widow, indignantly, "you are impertinent!" And she left her seat and took another on the other side of the car.

"Pears to be a little huffy!" said the ineffable bore. Turning to our narrator behind him—"What did they make you pay for that umbrella you've got in your hand?"

Varieties.

AN advertisement in one of the morning papers says: "Wanted—A female who has a knowledge of fitting boots of a good moral character." We suppose boots of a good moral character mean those that are well-soled.

"JOHN, did you find any eggs in the old hen's nest this morning?" "No, sir; if she laid any, she mislaid them."

MEN are more inclined to ask curious questions than to obtain necessary instruction.

It is true that a pun is a verbal equivocation, but, if the highest legitimate wit is only a play upon ideas, why may we not tolerate a play upon words, which are the signs of ideas? Such a recreation is at least dabbling in the elements of wit, whereas a starch and formal gravity is an evidence of nothing but dulness.

DRUNKENNESS.—Some of the domestic evils of drunkenness are houses without windows, gardens without fences, fields without tillage, barns without roofs, children without clothing, principles, morals, or manners.

A MAN out west advertises a wild badger by placard as follows:—"A Bager from the Rocca Mounting—etes rats, et cetera."

TRUE PHILOSOPHY.—Dr. Johnson remarked that a habit of looking on the best side of every event is better than a thousand pounds a year. When Fénelon's library was on fire, "God be praised," he exclaimed, "that it is not the dwelling of some poor man."

A GUARDED ANSWER.—In the Registration Court, Cupar Fife was called on to appear as a witness, and could not be found. On the sheriff asking where he was, a grave, elderly gentleman rose up, and with much emphasis said:—"My lord, he's gone." "Gone! gone!" said the sheriff; "where is he gone?"—"That I cannot inform you," replied the communicative gentleman, "but he's dead."

THE avaricious man is like the barren, sandy ground of the desert, which sucks in all the rain and dews with greediness, but yields no fruitful herbs or plants for the benefit of others.

A HORRID BOY.—Frank: "O, I say, Emily! ain't the sea-side jolly?" Emily—(who is reading "The Corsair" to Kate)—"I do not know, Frank, what you mean by jolly. It is very beautiful! it is very lovely!" Frank: "Ha! and don't it make you always ready for your grub, neither?" (Exit young ladies, very properly disgusted.)

THE DIFFERENCE.—A gentleman having a large six-shooter in his hand, was asked:—"Pray, sir, is that a horse pistol?"—"No, sir," he replied, "it's only a Colt's."

A GENTLEMAN, questioned by a squinting man concerning his broken leg, replied, "It is quite crooked—as you see."

ALL censure of a man's self is but oblique praise; it is only to show how much he can spare.

HEARSAY EVIDENCE.—Two literary ladies were lately witnesses in a trial. One of them, upon hearing the usual questions asked:—"What is your name?" and how old are you?" turned to her companion and said—"I do not like to tell my age, not that I have any objection to its being known; but I don't want it published in all the newspapers." "Well," said the witty Mr. S., "I will tell you how you can avoid it. You have heard the objection to all hearsay evidence; tell them you don't remember when you were born, and all you know of it is by hearsay." The ruse took; and the question was not pressed.

SOME people can't bear to be of the same way of thinking with anybody else. We shouldn't be surprised if the reason why Saturn ate his own children was that he thought they would agree with him.

ANSWERS TO OUR CHESS CORRESPONDENTS.

THOMAS EVELYN.—Your letter of the 31st October has been overlooked until now. Your solution of Problem No. 239 is correct.

No. 9.—We think that with care White ought to win in the position forwarded by you.—2. Staunton's Handbook of Chess.—3. Any bookseller.

C. M'ALLISTER.—The "club size" chess boards are about 22 inches square. The second size would be about 18 inches square.

ISAAC PHENIX.—Thanks for the Problems; the solutions, however, did not accompany them. The Problem to which we referred as solvable in three moves, is the first one with which you favoured us.

JOHN WILD.—The privilege which the Pawn possesses of "playing two squares," is confined to its first move.

F. S.—The games sent are very acceptable, and shall appear.

D. P. S.—The reply to White's move of Kt to K B 6 (double check), in Problem No. 235, is K to Q B 5. How will you then effect mate in two moves?

W. G.—The solution of Problem No. 196 is, 1. Q to K R sq. 2. Q to K R 4. 3. Q to K 7 (mate). It is one of the neatest three move Problems we have ever seen.

ALPHA.—We desire to thank you for your very friendly communication.

T. HOPWOOD.—Many thanks for your communication. The game shall be reported upon very shortly.

J. STONEHOUSE.—We believe that the composer to whom you refer lives at West Boldon, in the county of Durham. Solutions up to the present time by W. Airey, Grapes, F. G. Rainger, D. W. O., Wm. M'K., Douglas, M. A. R., A. Stevens, E. Grant, J. Palmer, Oxon, T. G. D. Rees, W. G., D. P. S., G. Farrow, E. T. (of Southport), G. F., D. W. O., T. Evelyn, J. Stonehouse, T. Simpson, G. B. T. W. S., J. D. T. Way, J. White, G. B. F., T. R., and G. Bailey, correct.

Our Editorial Table.

TO OUR READERS.—As we are continually receiving communications from some of our friends in remote parts of the kingdom, requesting to know how they can be supplied with our Paper when they reside at a distance from any of the Trade, we beg to inform them and the public generally, that they can be supplied with single numbers by post for 2d. each number, or 2s. 3d. per quarter; 4s. 4d. per half year; or 8s. 8d. per twelvemonth; or if three parties in a neighbourhood combine, and have three copies sent weekly to one address, they can be supplied for 4d., or 4s. 4d. per quarter, 8s. 8d. per half year, or 17s. 4d. per year; or those who like to have a single copy of three numbers sent every three weeks, can have them sent at the rate of 4d. for every three numbers, or fivepenny monthly parts can be forwarded for 7d., or sixpenny parts for 8d. In all cases postage stamps or a post-office order must be sent in advance, and double numbers will be reckoned as two numbers. All letters in this department must be addressed to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard, to whom post-office orders should be made payable. Letters requiring an answer must inclose a postage stamp.

WELSH BESSY should not be so impatient. She was answered last week.

ESTELLE.—Our opinion upon the subject of your letter so entirely coincides with your own, that we have no advice to offer. You write so well and seriously, that we think you will find no difficulty in bringing over your admirer to a rational way of acting; but if not, if he should persist in his wilfulness, 'e'en let him gang his ain gate; do not you be silly because he is perverse.

A. O. W. N. S.—Both states are in our opinion equally honourable. For a more authoritative opinion, we beg to refer our correspondents to St. Paul's Epistles.

ONE IN A FIX.—We do not see why you should consider yourself in a dilemma. You cannot bring about an introduction to the gentleman, and if you could, he would not think any the better of you for doing so; but if he wants to obtain one, he will find the means, never fear.

CASTLE HILL.—Voting is the rule, whatever is the custom. R. PIERCE.—The verses are good, but not good enough for our journal. J. B. (The Young Pretender)—what a title for a poet!—Your "Good Bye" verses are not up to the mark. Try again; don't say good bye to your muse.

A. H.—"Boyish ambition" won't do. Poetry must mean something. We can make nothing of the "floating relic of eternity." What is it? What is it floating on? and where is it floating to? Your Leviathan is better; we can understand that it may float. In this case your poetry means something: it is intelligible, which all poetry should strive to be. WINNING.—Very pretty.

C. E. F.—Quite impossible. QUESTOR.—We see no objection. Passable. ZOROASTER.—I. At present we cannot reply to your query about the "Art Treasures." All in good time. 2. We are not acquainted with the system mentioned.

3. Good.

PROVINCIAL, Q. II. B., &c.—Examination lists are issued by the Civil Service Commissioners, and notice is given of vacancies as they occur.

A. B. C.—Any sun the carpenter agrees to take. LIVE AND LEARN.—What is meant by the root of the word, is its original form; and words may be traced to their origin through the various languages of which they have formed a part. The derivation of words is an exceedingly interesting study. The e is pronounced as you suppose.

GLENCARNE.—Benefit of clergy meant the exemption from punishment for felony enjoyed by priests during the middle ages. The privilege was extended to every one si legit ut clericus—"if he read like a priest"—a proof that education was in a backward state among our ancestors. The council of Clarendon, in 1163, set some bounds to this inordinate license.

R. P. N.—Pronounced like O in Orange. JESTER.—Court fools continued to hold a recognised place in England until the reign of Charles I. Muckle-John, the fool of Charles I., was the last who held the office, though in the reign of his successor there were many among the courtiers, who, without being appointed to the position of court jester, fooled their royal master to the top of his bent. Will Summers, the court fool of Henry VIII., has been immortalised by the pencil of Hogarth.

EXCELSIOR.—Try again and again. Few people succeed in obtaining their wish at the first trial; and we seldom value a thing unless we have made some sacrifice to obtain it.

E. H. K.—Draw the outline of your design first on a piece of paper, and then paint on the glass, laying the paper under it, like a copy in a transparent slate.

GREGORY.—In answering our correspondents, we certainly give precedence to questions which possess something more than an individual interest. Our intention, in adopting this course, is to give as much information as we can to the greatest possible number of readers. For instance, if, at the present moment, John Smith and James Smith wrote to us, the one with an inquiry about India, the other with a request for our opinion on his handwriting, we should certainly answer the former letter first—supposing our readers generally to be more interested, at this crisis, in the condition of India, than in the state of James Smith's calligraphy. Still, it is our wish, as far as we can, to satisfy all our correspondents; though, from the multitude of letters we receive, and the nature of the questions asked by some of our friends, it often becomes difficult to do justice to all.

KRECHER.—From five shillings to five guineas. HIBERNIA.—The verses show talent, but are faulty in construction. The Hibernian ear wants cultivation, and the Hibernian orthography likewise.

ROLAND.—A poor lad, sixteen years of age, is too old to begin his career as a drummer-boy. He had better wait another year, and then offer to carry a musket, if he be desirous of military glory.

INQUIRER.—There have been lotteries in England, but we are glad to say there are none now. The first was established in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in 1569, and was drawn at the west door of St. Paul's cathedral. Lotteries continued to be instituted at intervals until the reign of George III., because they were profitable to government. But it was short-sighted policy to obtain money by fostering among the people a propensity to gambling.

A SUBSCRIBER FROM THE FIRST.—No lady engaged to one gentleman can be justified in receiving the portrait of another.

A TRUE LOVER.—The lady's fortune, as it comes first in our correspondent's letter, probably comes first also in his affections. Money is a slippery thing, as every schoolboy knows; nevertheless, we advise this gentleman to wait at least until he is out of his "infancy."

NELLY.—A good knowledge of French, as far as reading and writing the language, may be obtained without a master. Pronunciation and ease in speaking can only be acquired from a native, or person thoroughly conversant with the language. A series of easy and progressive lessons may be found in the new serial published by Ward and Lock—"The Ladies' Treasury."

A MASTER OF ARTS.—The lady may bring an action against you if she chooses, but under the circumstances you mention (which of course you are prepared, if necessary, to prove), we think no jury in the land would give her a verdict. But is it not worth while to consider what happiness is likely to arise from a union with a person who could contemplate or threaten legal proceedings to enforce an engagement, and buy her off? Win the freedom to choose a worthier, more delicate-minded woman by paying this one.

QUESTOR.—Don't dabble in law. Of all experiments, will-making by amateurs is the most dangerous.

SWEET.—We do not see any objection to your engaging yourself as a journeyman, within the two miles you specified.

A. M. J. O.—Some one should certainly light the guest's bedroom candle, unless the economy of the house requires people to retire in the dark; and if so, the form of presenting the article at all might, we should think, be dispensed with altogether. If the visit is made to a house where the caller is not intimate, a card should be sent up; if not, the name is sufficient. What a profound mystery "etiquette" must be, when charming ladies like our correspondent cannot answer such trifles as these for themselves. The common usages of the society in which people move they ought to imbibe with every sense, just as decently brought up children know that it is rude to point, make faces, &c. In the middle station of life—where we have no lord chamberlain or Almoner de Saxe Gotha to regulate our movements, dictate whom we may know and marry, or who shall be asked to meet whom—surely our conduct and civilities may be based upon common sense, Christian politeness, and good taste. We have no imperative laws of etiquette, such as distracted poor Marie Antoinette. Let us then prove our gratitude by being rational, lighting our guest's candle even, if need be, and behaving like sensible people. To these lengthy remarks upon a subject which appears to occupy a great deal of our friends' and readers' time and attention, we beg to refer our correspondents "J. C. E." and "Sir Allan," merely observing to the latter, that slang is always objectionable.

CIPSELM.—Picture dealers are numerous in London. Our correspondent must choose. We can form no idea of the value of the painting from a description. B. C. B.—Declined with thanks. A SUBSCRIBER.—Your first question is answered by the appearance of our New Series. Castling we do not consider a "mean-spirited move." Unstamped newspapers can be forwarded within the United Kingdom, and to most of the colonies, by affixing a penny postage stamp, unless the weight exceed four ounces. A PAUPER JUVENIS.—Emigrate. IRIS.—Yes. CASSANDRA CRESSWELL.—A plain gold ring on the third finger of the left hand means that the woman wearing it is married. What rings on other fingers mean is all a matter of fancy.

MONTBAR.—We think a pigstye forty yards from a dwelling-house may be a removable nuisance under the act.

OMEGA.—Sue for the debt, and prove it by other means than the note, if you can.

T. L.—Undoubtedly you must pay the rent to the new owner of the land, so soon as you have received notice of the transfer.

J. S.—We ought to see the will to advise upon it correctly; but from our correspondent's letter it appears the wife had an estate for life, and the children at her death became tenants in common; that is, entitled equally to the property. Wills of real estate do not require to be administered to.

BANKER.—P. Pro. By procuration; that is to say, by the doing of a third party or agent duly authorised.

AN ARTICLED CLERK.—According to the way in which you put the case before us, if A was living at the time of the testator's death, he would be entitled to the property absolutely; but if he was then dead, his children equally.

R. PETERS.—We have given several good receipts for the destruction of warts. The remedy you recommend is as ridiculous as it is cruel.

H. S. S. wishes us to tell him how he can introduce himself to a young lady, of whose name and place of abode he is ignorant. We cannot assist him.

HELEN.—Can this young lady seriously expect to obtain that for which she asks—a receipt for happiness? Can she really suppose such a treasure to be in outs or in anybody else's keeping, to be doled out like a yard of ribbon or a quire of paper? Surely not. It cannot be now to "Helen" to be told that happiness depends far less upon others than upon ourselves; that it is not the denizen of any particular place or country, the certain follower of rank, beauty, or fortune, but the results of duty well performed, selfishness controlled, evil passions subdued, cheerfulness, usefulness, good temper, contentment, cultivated and practised. We have known many a happy man and woman; history tells us of many a wretched king. External circumstances therefore cannot make or insure the possession of happiness; we must earn it—first, by thinking less of ourselves and more of others; secondly, by earnestly and bravely striving to fulfil the duties of the station in which God has placed us.

A TWO-YEARS' SUBSCRIBER.—Gold ink, as it is called, may be made, first, by mixing precipitated gold powder with a little gum water, or, secondly, by preparing honey and gold leaf in equal parts. These should be ground together upon a painter's slab with a muller, until the gold is reduced to the finest possible state of division, and the mass becomes perfectly homogeneous, when it must be agitated with twenty or thirty times its weight of hot water, and then allowed to settle and the water poured off; this process must be repeated with fresh water two or three times, when the gold must be dried, and then mixed up with a little weak gum water for use. The brilliancy of writing performed with this is considerable, and may be increased by burnishing.

ROBIN HOOD.—Apply to the Under-Secretary of the War Office.

W. MACON.—We are cautious about giving receipts for cosmetics for the removal of freckles, &c., especially unless we know the cause of their appearance. A safe cosmetic is, an infusion of horseradish in cold milk.

INK-FACED GOOSE-QUILL tells us he considers "distilled thought" a good definition of poetry. The verses sent are respectfully declined. The condition of mind described must be exceedingly distressing, the main feature being that of great confusion of intellect. The writer says—

I don't know what I'm doing,
Just one-half of my time;
And like some swain a-wooing,
Continually I rhyme.

Suppose our correspondent were to leave off rhyme and take to reason.

LYDIA.—Your anxiety to be more useful as a housewife is creditable to you; and you will find your wish anticipated in our series of articles entitled the "Matron." Wives and mothers (if not in affluent circumstances) must work, if they wish to have things neat about themselves, and those near and dear to them; but the question is, how are they to do this, and how are they to set about it without spoiling what they venture to undertake? This question is puzzling enough, even to an industrious and well-intentioned woman, if in youth her education has been neglected in what is useful and necessary for women of all ranks to know. She must, in this case, become totally dependent on others, or be forced to make awkward, unsuccessful attempts, when she ought at least to be able to direct and explain what she requires, or, taking scissors in hand, cut out, and fit those things she has not sufficient time to execute entirely herself; but which, under skilful guidance of this kind, she can have made up under her own eye by any tolerable sewing-maid or needlewoman, at one-third or one-fourth of the cost that she must incur if the articles were purchased ready-made or given out. By properly understanding these matters, and superintending and directing work at home, as before described, we have seen some ladies keep themselves and their households (however numerous) better provided than many of those who, with far heavier purses, had carte blanche to order and purchase whatever their inclination might prompt; for there are many little niceties and requisites, that it is impossible to enumerate here, which none but a watchful and experienced eye at home can remark as wanting, and see replenished as soon as wanted.

ADAM SMITH, JUN.—When you read that £20,000 in Australian gold was sold to the Bank of England, it means that the bank bought uncoined gold to that amount, paying for it either in coin or in bank notes. The bank originally commenced operations in Grocer's-hall, on comparatively a very small scale. We are indebted for its foundation to Paterson, the originator of the Darien scheme.

JOHN JORDAN.—The "Educational Course" would answer your purpose.

B. G. H.—Apply to the publishers, Kent & Co., Paternoster-row.

CONSTANT READER.—Don't be in a hurry to invest your money, and eschew schemes offering "large profits." Beyond this, you must judge for yourself.

INDUSTRIOUS.—We think you would scarcely improve your funds so much as you would hurt your eyesight, by copying legal documents after office hours. Advertisements sometimes appear in the papers from tradesmen desirous of the services of a clerk in the evening, to make up their books, &c.; but the demand for such labour is generally much more limited than the supply.

S. C. A.—We cannot pretend to be acquainted with the private affairs of any insurance office. The one you name has a good reputation.

T. W.—The question "at what age should a boy be put to business?" is an important one. The answer depends greatly on the intellect and capability of the boy himself. Really industrious boys learn more at school during the last year of their attendance, than in all the previous time they have spent there; with such as these, an additional half year or two at school, will be a great benefit. Idle youngsters, on the contrary, have generally managed, by the time they are fifteen, to attain just enough proficiency in their lessons to escape punishment, and are content to rest upon their very meagre laurels, wasting their own time and their parents' money. Keep a boy at school till fifteen, and if he is a studious fellow, a year longer. But take him away directly he begins to waste his time.

JAMES.—As we cannot conceive of any proper motive you can have for staining your face and hands of an olive colour, we decline informing you of the means by which such change could be effected.

JAMES (2).—Concertinas vary in price from 5s. to £5 5s. It is impossible for us to say in what space of time you would learn to play upon one.

SPHYNX.—Your lines "composed on the sea-shore" are not suited to our columns.

W. C. B.—The situation you are anxious to obtain requires the recommendation of an M.P., or some person who has influence with the members of her Majesty's government.

DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.—The beautiful engraving of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, in No. 2, New Series, of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, is from a photograph by Mayall, of 224 and 226, Regent-street.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

Some village Hampden that with dauntless breast
The little tyrant of his fields withstood;
Some mute, inglorious Milton here may rest,
Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood.
GRAY'S ELEGY IN A COUNTRY CHURCHYARD.

Should any speculative author feel disposed to write a history of St. Faith's, he will find ample materials for the undertaking in the village churchyard, which we unhesitatingly pronounce to be one of the most picturesque in the kingdom, and singularly rich in an unbroken succession of gravestones, marking the final resting-place of the sturdy race of yeomen who were born, lived, toiled, and died within sound of their native bells. In fact there is scarcely a family in the parish whose genealogy might not be traced by them in a line sufficiently clear to satisfy all but a chancery barrister or a disappointed heir.

The Minters, for instance, for many a generation, may be found clustering as thick as bees in front of the curiously sculptured early Norman porch; the Sparrows, life's twitterings over, sleep in their nests under the wall of the south aisle of the church, and the Gilberts beneath the shadow of the north one; whilst the Whiteheads, Spaldings, and Crashers all repose in neighbourly vicinity in the large open space of ground directly facing the lofty belfry-tower, which, clad in its thick mantle of ivy, stands like some faithful sentinel on guard, braving the storm of ages.

Although some of these memorials of affection and simple worth are exceedingly ancient, but few of them are defaced, unless it be by the chipping hand of time, for so many intermarriages have taken place between the families of St. Faith's, that even the children have been taught to respect them. The younger branches of the Minters still remember kind old grandfather Whitehead; and their companions, Ned Spalding's boys, entertain a grateful recollection of their maiden aunt Crasher, who not only bequeathed them a hundred pounds each, but left her great feather-bed and eight-day clock in trust for the one that should marry first; a proof that the testatrix entertained no very profound admiration for that state of life usually denominated single blessedness.

The gossips of the place, admirable physiologists in their way, can satisfactorily explain why the Spaldings have most of them the Sparrow eye, the Gilberts the Crasher nose, and the Minter girls the fair complexion of the Whiteheads. The fact is, a sort of family resemblance may be traced in most of the inhabitants of the village; the same thing might be said even of the tombstones, the cherubs carved in braces or leashes on the heads of most of them, have all the same fat, chubby faces, whistling mouths, and, considering the weight they are poetically supposed to support, disproportionately small wings. The first rustic sculptor, doubtless, established the type; and all we can say is, that it has been most religiously transmitted down to our days by his successors.

The church, which we conscientiously believe would puzzle Ruskin himself to describe, so multitudinous have been the alterations, additions, and repairs, so ingenious the overlaying of one order on another, the mingling of shafts, capitals, lancet and circular windows, in the improvements as they were doubtless considered by those who perpetrated them, is approached by a fine old avenue of yew trees, planted in all probability when the bow was the national weapon of England, and the memory of Cressy, Agincourt, and Poitiers, a recollection of yesterday.

So much for the exterior of the sacred edifice. The interior, unfortunately, has suffered still more severely. The stalls and rood have been removed as something papistical; the exquisitely carved reading-desk and pulpit of oak coloured white, its dove with distressingly red legs and beak affixed to the back of the latter, just in the centre of a relief of the Nativity, whose delicate outlines are now only faintly visible through the successive coatings of paint!

Arches have been bricked up to prevent the wind from sweeping round the rector's and churchwarden's pews, tracery plastered over, and more than one table monument to the Boothroyds lowered to the level of the pavement. As for the brasses!—we can promise any of our antiquarian friends who may have sufficient interest to obtain permission to scrape the white-washed walls, a treat that will well repay their research.

When discovered, and restored to light, we confidently predict that they will rank with the finest specimens in the kingdom.

A funeral procession was slowly advancing along the centre pathway of the churchyard. Since the interment of the last lord of the manor—whose kindness to his tenantry all had good reason to recollect—such an assemblage of mourners had not been seen in St. Faith's; the principal farmers on the estate, the cotters and villagers, with their wives and daughters, in fact, nearly all the inhabitants of the hamlet were there,—not only to show their sympathy for the poor old bell-ringer, but to protest by their presence against the brutal act by which his brother had been deprived of life.

Nothing could be more quiet and orderly than the demeanour of the crowd: a line of conduct to which the appearance of Mr. Thornton, so justly popular amongst them, as well as the solemnity of the occasion, greatly contributed; for the feeling of resentment against Sir Norman and his keepers was strong as ever, and only required an occasion to break forth.

The Reverend Mr. Poundtext, who read the magnificent service for the dead, felt at first somewhat nervous, when he beheld the entire population of the parish following the body to the grave; the appearance of the magistrate, however, reassured him, for he felt convinced that no riotous or unbecoming manifestation would take place whilst he remained amongst them.

Simon and his wife, holding the orphan Lillian by the hand, stood at the head of the grave. There was an expression of innocent wonder on the face of the child at all she saw and heard. Perhaps she was too young to feel her loss; and yet she must have comprehended its extent, for several times she murmured to herself the words—

"Poor Barny! Poor Barny!"

Hester thought it exceedingly strange she should always speak of her father by his Christian name.

The funeral being over, the same procession reconducted the principal mourners back to their humble cottage. Arrived at the gate, the weaver turned round, and, raising his hat, exclaimed—

"Thank you, friends and neighbours, for this last kindness shown to one who was born amongst you, who loved you all, and would have done any of you a good turn had it been in his power; and thank you too, sir," he added, in a voice of deep emotion, addressing Mr. Thornton: "you have ever shown a kind feeling for the poor."

On any other occasion there would have been a cheer for the popular magistrate; but rough and untaught as most of the hearers were, they seemed to feel that, in the presence of so much sorrow, it would be out of place.

"And now," continued the speaker, "let me advise you to return to your homes quietly. I am sure you understand me, and the reason why I ask it. Don't give those who slandered my poor brother by saying he had deserted"—here the old man's grief once more overcame him—"an opportunity of reproaching his memory."

The last words were so broken by sobs and tears that they were scarcely heard.

"Simon is right," said the gentleman, shaking hands with him. "You have shown your respect for the dead,—do not lessen the value of the tribute by any display of hostile feeling towards the living."

The consequence of this excellent advice was, that the crowd dispersed without uttering a single groan—as they had intended—for Sir Norman Boothroyd.

"It be my opinion," observed Farmer Minter, as he walked by the side of Mr. Thornton through the village, "that Barny Gee was murdered. I do know that lawyers say he was lawfully killed, but I don't believe it; and, poor as I am, I would not change feelin's wi' Sir Norman, tho' he be lord of the manor."

His hearer was mentally of the same way of thinking; although far too prudent to express it.

"He is to be pitied," he replied.

"Pitied!" repeated the farmer, indignantly. "What! take the life of a fellow-creature for a rabbit! but it won't end here. I do know the temper of the lads too well."

"For heaven's sake, if you have any influence amongst them, use it," said the gentleman, "to prevent any outbreak or violence, which can only recoil on themselves."

"That is what I told 'em, sir."

"And prejudice," added the magistrate, "the legal question, which I hear they are determined to try, of the right to shoot over the common."

"There be little doubt of their trying it," answered the farmer. "More than a hundred pounds be subscribed already. I be sadly vexed in myself," he muttered, musingly.

"Why, what can you possibly have to reproach yourself with?" demanded Mr. Thornton, in a tone of surprise.

"It beant exactly a reproach, neither," said the farmer; "only it be so stupid. I wor the first to raise Barny Gee after the shot had riddled un. No wonder I felt flusterated, for I had never seen a human creature bleeding to death afore. He grasped my hand, and looked into my face so mournful, that it quite upset me; for I had knowed him ever sin' he wor a boy, no bigger than my own lad. He wanted to say something to me, but the blood came a-gurglin' out wi' the words. All I remember," added the speaker, "wor 'Tell Simon—papers; then followed the name of some person or place, but I can't be sure which, tho' I should know it agin' if ever I heard it; I be sure I shall."

"Poor fellow," ejaculated Mr. Thornton, "most probably some information respecting the arrears of pay or pension due to him. I will cause the proper inquiries to be made."

"May be," replied the churchwarden, "but I don't think it wor that."

It would be difficult if not impossible to point out a community in which some willing agent could not be found for wealth to work with. Sir Norman Boothroyd had long been aware of this important fact, and though he had not quitted the precincts of his own domain since the day of the inquest, his spies kept him well-informed of everything that transpired in the village, and at the funeral.

The intelligence that the fund subscribed to by the farmers had reached a hundred pounds drove him almost frantic. It was not the sum that alarmed him, but the spirit of resistance it evinced, and he felt as indignant as any Russian boyard could have done, whose serfs had threatened a revolt.

"Ungrateful wretches!" he exclaimed. "Law! They shall have enough of it. I'll ruin, beggar them."

"I had hoped," observed his wife, quietly, "that you had abandoned such ideas."

"Never, madame; never! To think of that fellow Thornton being present at the funeral of a rascally poacher. A man whom I had actually invited to my table!"

"Perhaps it was to keep the peace; and if so, we ought to feel obliged to him."

"Keep the peace," replied her husband. "Are you really so weak, Lady Boothroyd, as to suppose the wretched clowns would venture an attack on Mel-down Park?"

"Such things have been."

"Or attempt anything against my person?" added the baronet. "No. Bad as they are, I believe they would think twice before proceeding to such extremities. They know me too well!"

"Norman," said the lady, repressing her inclination to smile at the vapouring of her husband, which she at least knew how to estimate at its proper value; "I thought you had consented to leave the arrangement of this ridiculous affair in my hands?"

"I have altered my mind," replied the baronet.

"And you will not waive your rights over the common?"

"Not one of them. I should be unworthy of my name if I did so—as ashamed to look the portraits of my long line of ancestors in the face. What Boothroyd," he added, "ever gave up his rights?"

"Till he was forced or frightened out of them?" thought his wife.

"I am about to start," continued the speaker, "for Exeter, to consult Marshall on the subject. Most probably he will return with me."

"For protection," mentally ejaculated the lady, with a strong feeling of contempt.

Lady Boothroyd was one of those persons who, having once made up their minds to achieve an object, adhere with extreme tenacity to their plans. Few real obstacles could shake her purpose, and the opposition of Sir Norman was still less likely to do so; she knew well enough how to vanquish that.

Scarcely had he taken his departure, than putting on her bonnet and shawl, she quitted the house ostensibly for a walk in the park, and after strolling about the grounds for some time, directed her steps towards the preserves where the lodge of the head keeper was situated. To her great satisfaction she found him within and alone.

The man might well look surprised at the unusual honour, the mistress of Mel-down Park not being remarkable, any more than her husband, for condescension to her dependents.

"Well, Fletcher," she began, at the same time seating herself, whilst the keeper stood respectfully before her, "has there been any more poaching on the manor since New Year's eve?"

"None, my lady."

"The death of the soldier Gee, or whatever the fellow's name was, has created an ill feeling, I hear, in the village."

"Dreadful, your ladyship. We can't show our faces in St. Faith's without being hooted and pointed at. It wasn't our fault," he added; "we only did our duty."

"Of course you did," observed his visitor. "But this state of things renders the residence at the hall most unpleasant. The farmers, I hear, are determined to try the question of shooting over the common."

"So I hear, my lady."

"Do you think they will succeed?"

The keeper remained silent.

"Did you hear my question?" continued the speaker. "I ask you, who have known the property these forty years, whether Sir Norman really and truly possesses the exclusive right he claims?"

"His late uncle never exercised it," observed Fletcher.

"That is not an answer."

"It would be presumptuous in me to give an opinion."

"Of course it would," said the haughty woman, "unasked."

"Well, then, my lady, if I were put upon my oath, I don't believe he has. I have heard Sillex say as much a dozen times over, and he knows to an acre how far the manor extends."

"Provoking!" muttered her ladyship: "not only the ridicule of a contest with our own tenantry, but a defeat will be the consequence of this unfortunate affair, unless," she added, fixing her eyes keenly on the countenance of the old man, "you assist me to prevent it."

"I, my lady! What can I do? I am no lawyer."

"But you are an excellent shot," coolly observed his visitor.

Fletcher naturally looked exceedingly astonished. We question if anything in the course of his life had ever surprised him half so much as this simple observation.

"What is the man staring at?" added Lady Boothroyd.

The construction which the keeper had put upon her words struck her, and she broke forth into a hearty laugh.

"No, Fletcher; nothing of that kind," she exclaimed, "nothing of that kind. I will speak plainly with you, for you have lived in the family many years, and ought to feel its interests. I wish to frighten my husband into withdrawing from a dispute which threatens the peace of the neighbourhood. Now, I know of no means so likely as impressing him with the belief that his obstinacy has placed his life in danger."

"That be one way," answered the man, deliberately, "for Sir Norman be mortal timorous."

"He will not return till late," continued her ladyship; "he will enter the grounds by the south lodge. Now, if you could contrive to send a bullet through the carriage window—mind, only through the window—I think I may undertake to answer for the rest."

Fletcher rubbed the back of his head, and regarded his visitor for some time doubtfully.

"I certainly could do such a thing," he said, "and without any danger, but suppose my master should ever find me out?—he be not the most forgiving gentleman in the world."

"I'll take the blame," replied Lady Boothroyd, impatiently. "Remember that it is to prevent the recurrence of such dreadful scenes as the one which has lately taken place, and in terrifying Sir Norman into acting reasonably you are really rendering him a service which it shall be my study to requite. You are the only person," she added, condescendingly, "whom I could trust to make such an attempt, which your skill as a marksman renders not only perfectly safe, but certain of success."

It would be useless to repeat what further arguments the speaker employed before she finally succeeded in persuading the old man to undertake the task. It is sufficient, for the purpose of our narrative, to say that she did succeed, and Lady Boothroyd quitted the keeper's lodge, delighted with the success of her plans.

On her return to the hall, she found a letter bearing the Indian postmark, and sealed with black. Although addressed to her husband, the manoeuvring woman opened it without the least hesitation, and found, to her confusion and astonishment, that it announced the death of Sir Norman's younger brother and his wife, of the yellow fever. The writer, the colonel of his regiment, expressed his own and brother officers' deep condolence with the family for their loss, and concluded by expressing a hope that the child had arrived safely in England.

"Child!" she ejaculated, as the steward's advice to her to visit the cottage of Simon Gee, flashed on her recollection; "my worst fears are confirmed! Ruin, ruin to my hopes!"

This exclamation was called forth by a clause in the late baronet's will, directing that, in the event of both his nephews dying without male heir, as the title would then become extinct, the estate should be sold, and the proceeds divided equally between the female issue of the two brothers; but Sir Norman was to remain the undoubted possessor of the property during his life.

"Is it possible," she murmured, "that that wretched wanderer, even from the grave, has contrived to strike a blow fatal to all my schemes? The brat is his. I must think—think!"

It boded little good to any one when the thoughts of the speaker became intently fixed either upon their past or future destiny: it was something like the mildew—corroding where it fell.

During the rest of the day little Alice was confined to the schoolroom with the governess. Her mother required to be alone with her own evil heart and busy brain. The prattle of her innocent offspring would have disturbed her meditations.

Night was rapidly advancing, when the sound of a carriage was heard dashing up the lawn. In a few seconds voices were heard, and amongst others the mistress of Meldown Park recognised her husband's. In the midst of her reflections she had quite forgotten him.

"To be tied to an egotist—a nerveless, purposeless thing," she sighed, "and at such a moment, too! Well, well; patience, patience!"

The drawing-room door opened as Sir Norman Boothroyd made his appearance, accompanied by his lawyer.

The countenance of the baronet was pale as cowardice, and his companion's of a scarcely less sickly hue. Throwing himself into a chair, he faintly murmured—

"I have been shot at, my love!—shot at!"

"Impossible!" ejaculated his wife, with well-acted surprise.

"In my own park, too!"

"Incredible!"

"There is an end to all security in the country," added the gentleman, "if the life of a man of my rank can be attempted with impunity."

"My dear Norman," said her ladyship, getting up a very excellent imitation of a tear, "deeply as I am shocked at the murderous attempt, it can only be attributed to one cause—the chivalrous firmness with which you have defended your rights. For my sake, for our sweet child's and your own pause," she continued, "before you drive these desperate poachers to further violence. Only reflect what a state of terror and anxiety you entail upon me. Each time you quit the house I shall expect to see you brought home a corpse—terrified if you pass even an open window! A prison, if you persist in your resolution, were a safer residence than Meldown Park."

The baronet winced at the picture so artfully drawn. Like Bob Acres, in Sheridan's inimitable comedy of "The Rivals," he felt that his courage was rapidly oozing away.

"Come, come, my lady!" exclaimed the man of law; "things are not arrived at that pass yet."

"Silence!" replied Lady Boothroyd, at the same time darting at the speaker a look which very much astonished him, for he had hitherto considered her, as every one else who was at all intimate in the family did, as a mere nonentity, an echo of his client's opinions. "You think only of your wretched fees; I of my husband."

"We will remove to London," observed the baronet, getting more and more uneasy. "I shall feel more collected in the morning. It was a narrow escape," he added. "The ball passed through both the windows of the carriage."

"Did not the servants pursue the ruffian?"

"They would have done; I believe, Marshall, they proposed something of the kind," answered the chicken-hearted Sir Norman, "but I insisted on their driving at once to the house."

The glance of contempt which his wife involuntarily gave him brought something like colour into his pale cheek. He declared himself to be seriously ill; ordered the servants to be well armed, the doors of the mansion carefully locked, and Dr. Phrase to be sent for.

Lady Boothroyd saw that her project had taken effect, and that it was perfectly unnecessary to make a display of any further feeling on the occasion. Ringing for the valet, she directed him to assist his master to his room; and remain with him till the arrival of the physician.

Lawyer Marshall had for some been eyeing the lady curiously. The decision with which she both spoke and acted upset all his preconceived notions of her character, and he mentally asked himself whether it might not be advisable to try and conciliate her favour, by showing more deference than he had hitherto done to her opinions in the affairs of his wealthy client. His speculations on the subject were cut short by her ladyship retiring to her dressing-room; where, just as she was thinking about going to rest, Dr. Phrase visited her.

"This is very shocking, my dear Lady Boothroyd," he exclaimed; "very. The gentry of the shire and the home government ought to take it up. My respected patient is in a high state of fever."

"He will be better in the morning, doubtless," coolly observed the exemplary wife.

"Hem! yes—doubtless. I have bled him, and anticipate a favourable result on the increased action of the heart from the blister I have applied to his left side, whilst the cataplasm to his feet will draw the blood from his head, and—"

"Why, you are torturing the poor man!" said her ladyship, with great difficulty repressing a smile.

"Torture!" repeated the son of Æsculapius; "pardon me: torture is not exactly the word. Tomorrow, if the symptoms are favourable, I shall throw in the febrile mixture, which, with a few days' low diet and a series of sedatives, will, I trust, restore my respected and highly valued patient to health. He is most anxious, I find, to leave the country for London."

"Yes—yes," repeated his hearer, musingly; for she had not yet thoroughly arranged her mode of action; "but you must keep him at the hall for some days at least. Dr. Phrase," she added, "are you really devoted, as you assert you are, to the interests of my family?"

"Cruel of your ladyship to doubt it for an instant!" ejaculated the pompous little man, at the same time placing his hand upon his breast and bowing very low: "in fact, I can give you a most convincing proof of it. In the late inquest upon the bodies of the poacher and keeper so unfortunately slain, I concealed a circumstance which, if generally known, would have increased the surmises and ill-feeling of the inhabitants of St. Faith's."

"Concealed!" repeated the mistress of the mansion, with surprise. "What could there possibly be to conceal that either Sir Norman Boothroyd or myself have an interest in?"

Dr. Phrase pulled out his pocket-book, and drew from it a small piece of paper, very much crumpled and stained with blood. There were signs also, of its having been burnt, as if discharged from a pistol or gun, about the edges.

"I extracted it," he said, "from the wound of Springthorpe, the keeper."

The lady took it without the slightest shudder or feeling of repugnance—a fact which the speaker considered a highly satisfactory indication of the state of her nerves—and held it up to the light. After examining it carefully, she discovered, to her great astonishment, the words, "By Lady Boothroyd, June the sixteenth," in her own handwriting upon it.

The date of the year was wanting.

"Singular!" she muttered.

"So I thought," observed the gentleman, "and carefully concealed it."

"When could I have written this?"

"Haven't the slightest idea, my lady."

"Yet it is my handwriting," she continued. "Are you certain—quite certain—that you extracted this from the body of the keeper?"

"Quite," answered the physician. "Perhaps I can assist your recollection," he added. "It strikes me that it has been torn from some book or—"

"Ah! I recollect," exclaimed Lady Boothroyd, in a tone of satisfaction; for, strange as it may appear, that blood-stained fragment of paper presented a clue by which to extricate herself from the difficulty which during the entire evening had pre-occupied her mind, and in an instant she arranged her plans accordingly.

"Dr. Phrase," she said, "Sir Norman must be sufficiently recovered to quit the hall in three days; so no more bleeding or blistering—it will only weaken him."

The little man bowed with an air of intense resignation.

"The sedatives, perhaps, may do him no injury."

"Injury!" he repeated, mournfully; "I should think not."

"You may throw in the febrile mixture," added her ladyship, with a smile. "You see I am not very unreasonable. As for this morsel of paper, permit me to exchange it for one more worthy of your learning and great professional skill."

The speaker placed in the hands of the doctor a note for fifty pounds, and at the same time carefully secreted in the case from which she had taken it the scarcely legible fragment of writing.

It is astonishing, after receiving the unusually liberal fee, how greatly the feeling of interest and devotion for his respectable and highly-valued patient increased. In fact, Dr. Phrase almost reproached himself with not having done enough for him. Some of our readers, had they been in the baronet's place, we doubt not, would have considered that he had done too much, by the blister and cataplasm at least.

"Fortune smiles upon me," thought the artful woman, as soon as she found herself alone. "The scheme required a daring hand to execute, and that is found. The rest will be comparatively easy. All I have left to do is to work upon my husband's terrors, and bend him to my purpose—no very difficult task to one who has discovered the key to his character. O man, man!" she added, "creation's self-styled lord, how pliant is your nature. Heaven may have tempered us of the self-same clay, but the impress differs widely as steel and lead—purpose and vacillation."

The following morning, after a long interview with his wife, Sir Norman Boothroyd sent for Silex, the steward, and directed him to inform the tenantry that their landlord, deeply afflicted at the death of his keeper and Barney Gee, had determined there should no longer be any subject of contention between them: in other words, that he relinquished the long-disputed right of sporting over the common.

The concession was received sullenly. As an act of grace it came too late; the blood so wantonly shed could not be soon forgotten. It had, however, one effect; it put an end to the threatened litigation.

CHAPTER X.

That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat
Of habit's devil, is angel yet in this;
That to the use of actions fair and good
He likewise gives a frock, or livery,
That aptly is put on. Refrain to-night,
And that shall lend a kind of easiness
To the next abstinence: the next more easy;
For use almost can change the stamp of nature,
And either curb the devil, or throw him out
With wondrous potency.

SHAKESPEARE.

NOTWITHSTANDING that appearances fully justified the impression Mr. Bently had received of his son-in-law's conduct, George Markham still continued to wrestle bravely and successfully with the fiend drunkenness, the cause of all his misery and shame. Each new day gave him fresh vigour for the contest, rendered the struggle less painful, the insatiable craving for the bacchanal's poisoned chalice less violent. In his remorse, he experienced a kind of gloomy satisfaction, a savage triumph in every pang that rent his soul in the jeers of his fellow-workmen, at what they termed his milk-and-water spirit.

It was a sad humiliation for one naturally proud to submit voluntarily to the scoffs and insults of such men; but he had brought the punishment upon himself, and that reflection enabled him to endure it patiently. The memory of his past folly, like the sacred bitter of the ancients, had a purifying effect, and helped to cleanse his heart.

Those who have never felt the madness of intoxication, the burning thirst, the utter prostration of mind, the nerveless apathy which follows the sudden and complete cessation from drink, can form but a faint idea of the trials the reformed drunkard has to endure before the victory over his debasing passion is complete.

We have seen reason totter on its throne, heard the strong man howl in his agony, and curse the temptation he longed for, yet would not yield to.

Fortunately, however, this state of madness, like the crisis in a fever of the brain, or any other violent disease, has its limit. Imperceptibly the burning of the gorge, the slakeless thirst diminishes, the craving grows less violent, and a reaction, morally and physically healthy, gradually takes place.

The angel of peace spreads her wings around him, and pours her healing balm upon the ulcers of his heart and brain, till the contest not only loses its bitterness, but ceases to become one, and manhood and self-respect resume their long abdicated empire in his soul.

Morning and evening, since he had obtained employment in the factory, the husband of Rachel had called regularly at the cottage of Peter Mangles to inquire after his suffering wife. And when he heard that the danger was past, that she was slowly regaining strength, he felt the weight of self-reproach lessened at his heart. It seemed as if heaven had smiled upon his efforts to render himself less unworthy of her.

The old housekeeper, Mrs. Lawrence, and his child were the only persons on these occasions whom he saw, for he carefully timed his visits so as not to encounter either the merchant or his clerk. He had made up his mind if ever he rose again in the world to owe it to his own efforts, and not to the pity of others. If a mistaken, there was at least an honest pride in his resolution: for pity is too often akin to contempt, and George Markham's ambition was to win back if possible, not only the love, but the respect of his long suffering wife.

"Respect!" we think we hear some of our over-precise readers exclaim. Not that we believe we have many such.

Yes, we repeat the word—respect. The strength which has broken the chain is quite as much to be admired as the force that has never been fettered. The gold tried in the alembic is not more pure than the soul which has freed itself from an absorbing and degrading passion. Fire and suffering have refined them both.

The repentant husband was waiting as usual after his day's work, at the back garden gate, to see the housekeeper and his child, and learn the progress of his wife towards convalescence. Somehow he felt more than usually depressed; as if the foreboding of an impending ill hovered over him.

"Oh, Mr. Markham!" exclaimed the garrulous old lady; "I have sad news for you; though I don't know that I ought to tell it you, for I only learnt it myself by accident."

"Rachel!" faltered the reformed drunkard, "Oh, speak of her!"

"Mamma is much better," cried little Mary, springing into his arms and kissing him, for she was far too young to comprehend how deeply he had erred. "And I have not told her that I have seen you, since you bade me not."

"It is not that," said Mrs. Lawrence, pitying his distress; "Mrs. Markham is going to be reconciled to her father, and to reside with him for the future. Poor thing, I am not astonished at her resolution, when I think on all she has endured. Neither can you feel surprised at it," she added, "for you have no home to take her to."

George uttered a half-suppressed groan. He understood it all. Rachel had consented to a separation from him.

"Am I not to be permitted to see her?" he murmured, at last.

"Well," replied his informant, "I should say not. Mr. Bently is a rich gentleman, and I can't very well see how he could have a person like you about his house."

"Perish his wealth!" exclaimed the unhappy man; "it has stolen his heart against me."

Without waiting a reply, he pressed his child passionately to his breast, and walked hastily away.

Little did the housekeeper of Peter Mangles imagine the agony she had caused,—how nearly she had scared the young-born spirit of repentance from his side.

For several hours George Markham walked the heath, more like a madman than a reasonable being; he dashed himself upon the snow, upbraiding the folly that had cast life's pearl away at the moment he most felt its value.

"I have lost her!" he exclaimed; "and cannot—dare not blame her, for the memory of the past would seal my lips in shame and silence. The woman said truly. I have no home to take her to—nothing but poverty, pale want, to share with her, and of such companions she has had enough. Fool, fool,—and villain! Oh! I could tear my heart out when I reflect upon its worthlessness! Idiot, to dream of a happy future. For the drunkard there is no future: he must continue to writhe in the fiery circle he has created!"

At times the nature of his feelings changed. Rachel was his wife. The law allowed of no divorce for drunkenness. Her home was his, and he determined to assert his rights. Soon, however, the recollection of his son,—of all the woman he had outraged had endured, rose to his mind, and better feelings stole over him.

"She is right," he murmured. "I was never worthy of her; quite right. What is the love of a being like myself weighed against the affection of a parent—the comforts he can heap upon her? It is nature's instinct," he added, "a mother's resolution to protect her child."

It was singular, that in the depth of his despair the unhappy man should have hit upon the motive which had induced his wife to consent to a separation. Even in his madness, he did justice to the purity of her heart, which he well knew to be free from any selfish feeling.

Whilst wandering in this moody humour, he fell in with a party of his fellow-workmen, who were proceeding to Greenwich to pass the rest of the night as usual at the tavern. The men surrounded him with a joyous shout—most of them had been drinking already—and insisted on his accompanying them.

"Leave me," he said; "pray leave me. I am too unhappy to be sported with."

"Nothing like a drop to drown care," observed one.

"Try a hair of the dog that bit you," added a second.

"But one glass," still more insidiously whispered a third.

The temptation came, as it generally does, at a trying moment; the devouring thirst, the longing for the draught that could steep memory in forgetfulness,—and still the strong pulsations of both heart and brain came over him; still he resisted, although it was but faintly. Soon he found himself half forced, half carried, along, till they arrived in front of the gin-palace, Death's temple, whose gaudily decorated front and blazing gas-lights, formed a hideous contrast with the crowd of ragged, haggard, poverty-stricken worshippers that hung around the doors.

At this moment a number of persons turned the corner of the street; they were following a policeman, who had just taken a boy in charge for robbery.

George Markham shuddered, and thought of his own son.

"Come along, old fellow," cried one of his companions, pulling him towards the tavern.

"An instant," replied the former. "What has he done?" he added, addressing himself to a respectable-looking female, who had followed the crowd at a distance.

"Robbed his employer," answered the woman. "I always said he would turn out a thief."

"How could you foretell that?" demanded one of the workmen.

"Because he had a drunkard for his father."

The Assyrian monarch at his impious feast could not have been more startled when he beheld his doom written in characters of fire upon the wall, than the husband of Rachel felt at these few words. They seemed to hiss in his ears, penetrate to his very marrow, branding on his soul the sentence of condemnation.

With a yell, like a released spirit's cry, it sounded so wild and unearthly, he broke from those around him, and fled ere they could recover their surprise.

"Let him go," cried one.

"A milk-sop! a stingy fool! a save-penny!" chimed in the rest.

He to whom these epithets were applied, was speedily beyond the reach of their voices; had they been shouted close to him it would have been all the same, for the words "because his father was a drunkard" still haunted him; his hearing would take in no other sounds, echo seemed to repeat them.

"Because his father was a drunkard!" he exclaimed, when he had once more gained the heath. "O God!" he added, falling on his knees, "take that reproach from me. I trusted in my strength, and thou hast shown me my weakness. Let me not be utterly lost, for I feel how vain are the resolutions of reason unless thy mercy blesses them,—how fragile is man's strength, unless thy shield be extended over him."

Brief as was his prayer, it had a soothing effect upon the agitated mind and heart of him who uttered it. Like oil poured upon the troubled waters, a calmer spirit came over him, and he retraced his steps towards his humble lodging, a sorrowing, but no longer a despairing man.

The following morning, whilst on duty as time-keeper at the factory, George Markham received a note from his wife, requesting to see him. It was kindly though sadly written. The pen had evidently trembled in the hand that traced the words; and in more than one portion of the page he could detect where tears had fallen involuntarily. He pressed the paper to his lips.

As the punctuality and general good conduct of their new servant had secured the good-will of his employers, the unhappy man found no difficulty in obtaining temporary leave of absence. With a calm far more touching than the violence of despair, he hastened home and dressed himself in the suit of workman's clothes—the one he had purchased by the fruits of his industry. There was a feeling of honest pride as well as deep humiliation in the act.

"Better thus," he thought, "than in the threadbare, faded rags which mark my former state."

In his way over the heath, how many bitter recollections did memory conjure up!—visions of past happiness, opportunities thrown away, trials which prudence might have avoided, suffering which his wife had borne with all the patient sweetness of woman's love.

"I deserve to lose her," he thought. "The punishment is not greater than the offence. Let me not wring her heart by unmanly weakness, but reserve sorrow for the future. There will be time to mourn," he added, "in the long dreary hours of separation. Firmness becomes me now."

In this frame of mind he reached the cottage; and paused for an instant to contemplate the windows of the room occupied by Rachel. The blinds were up. He fancied he could distinguish her form seated behind one of the clean white muslin curtains, and his heart beat violently. "Was it possible," he asked himself, "that she had been watching his arrival?"

Mrs. Lawrence shook her head, as she opened the door to him, and pointed to the staircase.

"The room to the right," she said.

He could not thank her, but slowly ascended to hear, from the lips he loved, the sentence he so dreaded. How his hand trembled, as it turned the handle of the door. There was a moment's hesitation, and the next he stood in the presence of his injured wife; who, seated on an easy chair, made a feeble effort to rise and meet him. In an instant he was at her feet. At the sight of her thin, attenuated form, her features pale with suffering, manhood, resolution, the firmness he had schooled himself to obtain, alike gave way, and he wept long and bitterly.

It was some time before either of them could speak.

"This is a sad meeting, George," said Rachel, deeply moved at the sight of his tears. "I little thought, when our hands were first united, that I should ever witness the humiliation of the man I loved. There is something terrible in manhood's tears," she added; "they distress me—unfit me for that I am about to say."

"Reproach me; I deserve it for my heartless folly, for the wreck I have made!" groaned the repentant man. "I can endure your indignation, better than words of kindness."

"Reproach you!" repeated the invalid, her hand involuntarily falling on his shoulder, "reproach the husband of my youth, the father of my children! No, George, no; in the depths of poverty and suffering, when we have wanted bread, and I have been watching the long weary hours of the night for your return, a curse never rose to my lips. A prayer for your reformation, a murmur perhaps at your unkindness, rose; but reproaches! never, never!"

"Unkindness! call it by its fitting name, madness, brutal madness. I have received your letter, Rachel," he added, "and will spare you the pain of inflicting the wound, the last my heart can ever feel. You are about to be reconciled to your father—"

His wife remained silent.

"To return to the home from which my fatal love exiled you—and you are right; I have not a word, a plea, to offer against your resolution. I admit its justice, its strict justice, for I am no longer worthy of you. I have been too presumptuous," he continued, "in deeming that even penitence could atone for conduct such as mine; but I shall not persevere the less in the path I have chosen."

"For your happiness, I trust?"

Her husband smiled bitterly.

"My prayers," continued his wife, "shall not be wanting to confirm you in it. George, George," she exclaimed, with a sudden burst of grief, "feel for a mother's agony—speak to me of my boy—have you found him? discovered the least trace of my lost treasure? But no—cruel as you have been you would not have concealed from me the only balm to heal my breaking heart."

"I have sought for him everywhere," replied the husband, deeply moved by her distress; "night after night I have wandered through the streets of London—penetrated each den of sin and shame—sought him in haunts where vice spreads her allurements for unfriended youth; but all in vain: heaven has not smiled upon my efforts, my late remorse, my unavailing penitence. Rachel," he added, "could the sacrifice of my heart's blood restore him to you, I'd pour the life-stream gladly forth, and deem his ransom cheaply paid."

"George!"

"I know what you would say: 'tis time we part. I will not annoy you longer by my presence. My future life shall not disgrace you. There is one thing I would ask: my child, do not let her hear the tale of her father's falling; she is too young to comprehend it now. Let me behold her sometimes. I will not speak to her, Rachel, or ask to press her in my arms,—indeed I will not! The drunkard's kiss shall not stain her innocent cheek. By the memory of the love I have forfeited—for our boy's sake—grant me this, my last and only prayer!"

On hearing the motives which explained his presence in haunts which stung her woman's heart and pride, Rachel Markham started from her seat. Twice she essayed to speak; but emotion almost choked her, and the blood came and fled from her wan cheeks with fearful rapidity.

"Answer me, George!" she exclaimed at last, breaking the spell that seemed to chain her lips;—"and truly, as you would not leave a reproach upon my soul."

"What mean you?"

"In frequenting the—scenes of vice you name, were you led there by no other motive than the hope of recovering our lost boy?"

"None," answered her husband, with unfeigned surprise.

"It was not the love of drink, then?"

"No."

"Or a yet more—"

"Rachel," interrupted her husband; "fallen and degraded as I am, do not insult me by a supposition too monstrous for reason to believe, which even madness would reject with scorn. Look on me," he continued: "did you ever know a lie to pollute my lips? a lie, the coward's shield—the shuffling trickster's last resource. Do me one justice; the maddening draught has not drowned manhood and all sense of shame; truth still survives the wreck."

"I am glad to hear this, George, very glad!" exclaimed his wife, bursting into tears, and sinking back into her seat. "I had heard a very different tale."

"From your father?"

"Yes; but do not blame him: he spoke but as he thought, for he had watched you, George, night after night, and imagined—"

"That I had lost both heart and reason," said the unhappy man, "sunk to depth in vice where mercy's self would fail to reach me. I know how charitably he judges me. Doubtless he told you that I was still a drunkard?"

"He was led to think so."

"His wish was father to his thought," replied George Markham. "No, Rachel; since the day which deprived me of both wife and son, the intoxicating draught has never passed these lips. I have been tempted sorely, I confess; but I resisted like one who had man's work to do—to win back his own esteem—the world's respect."

As he spoke, the glow of honest satisfaction flushed his features. His wife gazed upon him in breathless suspense, weighing each word he uttered.

"Last night," he continued, "when told by the officious kindness of the woman who attends you that you had consented to separate from me and never see me more, then, Rachel, I felt myself indeed an outcast: hope abandoned me. In my despair I asked myself the use of struggling with my destiny—of seeking to regain a name you scorned to share—of creating a future which for me could have no joy—a home destined to be desolate. In this state of misery—this utter prostration of nerve, feeling, heart, and brain—I listened to the jeers and scoffings of my fellow workmen—for I am a mere labourer now—yielded to them, and consented to accompany them to the tavern."

"And fell?" gasped his hearer.

"No; God preserved me," answered the reformed drunkard, solemnly. "A word preserved me. On the very threshold of the temple where reason is sacrificed, manhood annihilated, sense, honour, feeling drowned in the excitement of intoxication, I broke from them and fled."

"Thank heaven," murmured his wife; "thank heaven you did so."

"I thought of you, Rachel, and of my poor lost boy. I will not pain you by relating all I suffered as I rolled frantically upon the ground, or stood gazing on the window of your chamber,—the impious thoughts which suggested themselves, till the spirit of prayer came over me. I sought for strength, and found it in that solitary hour. It has not deserted me since."

There was evidently something labouring in the heart of Rachel to which she would fain have given utterance, but the speaker still continued without observing her.

"And now, farewell. Fear not that I shall fall again. Temptation may once more assail me, but I know my strength. The fiend will be resisted. I shall persevere," he added, "though the rugged path of penitence be trod without one hope to cheer me, silently and alone."

"Not alone!" exclaimed his wife, extending her arms to him; "one faithful heart shall share it, George. You cannot cancel the sufferings I have endured, but you can atone for them. The sot, the heartless libertine, I could have rejected, but not the husband who seeks happiness and virtue in the future. Whatever your fortunes, I am ready to share them, live with you, toil with you, die with you; and never shall one look or reproachful word of mine remind you of your errors past."

An embrace, pure as their first young love, set the seal upon a reconciliation angels must have smiled to witness.

Rachel Markham kept her word, and despite the earnest entreaties of her friend Peter Mangles, and the offers of her father, who refused to believe in George's exculpation, she adhered to the decision she had made. The repentant drunkard was not left to tread the uphill path of reformation alone. A ministering spirit, in the angel form of a forgiving wife, smiled upon his task, and bore him company.

NOTHING IS LOST.

NOTHING is lost; the drop of dew
That trembles on the leaf or flower,
Is but exhaled, to fall anew
In Summer's thunder-shower;
Perchance to shine within the bow
That fronts the sun at fall of day—
Perchance to sparkle in the flow
Of fountains far away.

Nought lost, for even the tiniest seed,
By wild birds borne, on breezes blown,
Finds something suited to its need,
Wherein 'tis sown and grown;
Perchance find sustenance and soil
In some remote and desert place,
Or 'mid the crowded homes of toil
Sheds usefulness and grace.

The little drift of common dust,
By the March winds disturbed and tossed,
Though scattered by the fitful gust,
Is changed, but never lost;
It yet may bear some sturdy stem,
Some proud oak battling with the blast,
Or crown with verdant diadem
Some ruin of the past.

The touching tones of minstrel art,
The breathings of some mournful flute,
Which we have heard with listening heart,
Are not extinct when mute;
The language of some household song,
The perfume of some cherished flower,
Though gone from outward sense, belong
To memory's after-hour.

So with our words, or harsh or kind,
Uttered, they are not all forgot,
But leave some trace upon the mind,
Pass on, yet perish not;
As they are spoken, so they fall
Upon the spirit spoken to;
Scorch it like drops of burning gall,
Or soothe like honey dew.

So with our deeds, for good or ill
They have their power, scarce understood;
Then let us use our better will
To make them life with good;
Like circles on a lake they go,
Ring within ring, and never stay;
Oh! that our deeds were fashioned so
That they might bless away!

Then, since these lesser things ne'er die,
But work beyond our poor control,
Say, shall that suppliant for the sky—
The greater human soul?
Ah, no! it still will spurn the past,
And search the future for its rest,
Joyful! if it be found at last
Among the redeemed and blest.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

THE CHOICE OF A PROFESSION.

OUR last paper took up the subject of the formation of character. We would now speak more particularly of worldly objects, for character is not only to be formed in retirement, but in the bustling marts of business. To live, we must labour, must have something to do, some definite and fixed object in view. A lazy man is not a moral man. There is great necessity for action, and much truth in the old Turkish proverb, "The devil tempts all other men, but the lazy man tempts the devil." Every youth should, therefore, early determine on the profession he intends to follow, should prepare for it, and pursue it with vigour. The choice of a profession is one of the most important things in life.

In connection with this subject, several things are to be considered; and, to begin with, we must look at those cases in which a profession is selected for, and not by, the person who is expected to follow it.

NO CHOICE ALLOWED.

Very frequently the individual whose success and happiness are at stake, has no voice in selecting his trade or profession. It is settled for him by his parents or guardians. This boy is to be a preacher, that boy a barrister, and boy number three a medical man. Their fitness for their respective posts is not considered. It may happen that they really turn out successful—right men in right places; but, in the majority of instances, the result is the very opposite, and they are wrong men in wrong places.

We do not insist upon it that a parent or guardian has no right to choose a pursuit for his son or ward. Sometimes it is desirable that such a choice should be made before the lad is old enough to decide for himself. The principal point to be insisted upon is, that the choice be judiciously made—that it is not a blindly assigned function—an arbitrary allotment of a position. We believe that the lack of success—the physician without practice, the briefless barrister, the unsuccessful minister—is attributable in nine cases out of ten to an unwise choice of a profession.

BLUNDERING INTO BUSINESS.

Many persons having no pursuit chosen for them, and not having that irresistible impulse towards some particular pursuit, which is equivalent to a command from heaven to follow that pursuit through all obstacles, allow themselves to fall into any calling that may happen to lie in their way. Some of them, being persons who have no very strong points in any direction, but being roundly and equally developed, can do one thing about as well as another, and are likely to succeed in anything they undertake. Now and then one, having some special fitness, happens to fall into just the place for which he is fitted, and acts efficiently there, of course; but the great majority, having blundered into an occupation, blunder through it and out of it; and finally blunder into something else with similar results.

This should never be. Nothing should be left to what is called chance, when we have power to direct it. The choice of a pursuit is a very important matter, and should be made only after much self-study and mature deliberation.

How many are virtually tied by being in a business which they heartily dislike, and in which they can never excel; but who, if pursuing some vocation to which they are by nature adapted, might hope to rise, whereas they can now never hope even to attain mediocrity. Thus tied to a dead carcass, their pride of character becomes humbled, their ambition blasted, their efforts paralysed, and their prospects cut off for ever by the difficulties attendant on making the required change.

OUT OF ONE'S SPHERE.

Again and again the editor of this journal receives long and pathetic letters from people who have mistaken their calling and are out of their sphere. Correspondents are perpetually pouring into his ear their long complaints. Some are in trades they don't like, some in trades they are not fit for, some in trades that don't pay, and all are anxious to change them for something else. The reluctance with which many callings are pursued is evidenced by these letters; the restless spirit manifested in them shows that the calling has been a great mistake, that the choice of occupation has been unadvised. People are middling preachers who would have made masterly mechanics; wretched retail merchants, who would have been noble athletic farmers; pettifogging lawyers, who might have done the state some service as soldiers or sailors. This sort of thing is so frequent that one is forcibly reminded of that odd system of philosophy which sticks three-cornered people in round holes, and round people in three-cornered holes. This should not be. Why not have three-cornered people in three-cornered holes, and round people in round holes? The "why not" is simply that we are perpetually making blunders in the most important step we take in life.

GENIUS.

There are some who are born with a tendency that drives them. They ask no questions; but with the irresistible power of instinct they struggle forward to their proper and only possible calling, with the same natural necessity as the bird flies northward in spring, and southward in autumn. These are geniuses: the great soldiers, orators, poets, philosophers, inventors, —the chief thinkers and rulers of the race—rulers crowned by the Creator, the true rulers by "Divine right."

But all have not this genius; there are but few gigantic intellects, and there are but few men of gigantic stature. Inferior men can do the work of the world by something better than genius—namely, Perseverance. Genius is a gift, Perseverance an acquirement.

EDUCATION.

Education is of the utmost importance, whatever be our trade or position. There is no honourable calling in life that may not engage the interest and attention of the whole mind, and be adorned and made attractive by the productions of a cultivated intellect.

If a young man is to follow agricultural pursuits, he should be educated for them. His education should be shaped to them. His mind should be fully trained, and its powers developed in the direction of his pursuit. He should be made familiar with all the natural sciences, such as chemistry, geology, mineralogy, botany, and the natural history, character, and physiology of animals; for their breathing forms are all about him, and through his life he must have to do with them. His food, his drink, his dress, his all are within them, and he must draw them out. The touchstone of his knowledge must be applied to their dead and living forms, that he, his wife, and children, may be surrounded with the comforts and luxuries of life. With astronomy, physiology, mental and moral philosophy, and the rudiments at least of a thorough mathematical education, he should be made acquainted, for these he needs every day in the care of his family and in his business transactions with the world. His course of studies, his mental training, should be directed with a wise reference to his avocation. Not only his success, but the happiness and usefulness of both himself and family, depend upon it. Again, not only his mind, but his hand, should be educated for his life's avocation. His physical powers should be made not only strong and vigorous, but should be strictly and practically educated for his profession, so that mind and body will act together for the accomplishment of his end in life. A quack farmer is like a quack at anything else. And an agricultural theorist unsupported by practice, is like a theorist anywhere, a mere puff of wind.

Similar remarks may be applied to youth who have designed to fill any of the honourable callings in which men fulfil their earthly destinies.

First of all, a choice of business should be made, and made early, with a wise reference to capacity and taste. Then the youth should be educated for it, and as much as possible in it, and when this is done, it should be pursued with an industry, energy, and enthusiasm which will warrant success.

NOTHING TO DO.

A man or woman with no business, nothing to do, is an absolute pest to society. They are thieves, stealing that which is not theirs; beggars, eating that which they have not earned; drones, wasting the fruits of others' industry; leeches, sucking the blood of others; evil-doers, setting an example of idleness and dishonest living; hypocrites, shining in stolen and false colours; vampires, eating out the life of the community.

Many of our most interesting youth waste a great portion of their early life in fruitless endeavours at nothing. They have no trade, no profession, no object before them, nothing to do; and yet have a great desire to do something, and something worthy of themselves. They try this and that, and the other; offer themselves to do anything and everything, and yet know how to do nothing. Educate themselves they cannot, for they know not what they should do it for. They waste their time, energies, and little earnings in endless changes and wanderings. They have not the stimulus of a fixed object to fasten their attention and awaken their energies; not a known prize to win. They wish for good things, but have no way to attain them; desire to be useful, but little means for being so. They lay plans, invent schemes, form theories, build castles, but never stop to execute and realise them. Poor creatures! All that ails them is the want of an object—a single object. They look at a hundred, and see nothing. If they should look steadily at one, they would see it distinctly. They grasp at random at a hundred things and catch nothing. It is like shooting among a scattered flock of pigeons—the chances are doubtful. This will never do—no, never. Success, respectability, and happiness are found in a permanent business. An early choice of some business, devotion to it, and preparation for it, should be made by every youth.

SOME PRACTICAL HINTS.

The mass of men have no strong tendency toward any particular pursuit in life; but, at the same time, there are few, if any, who are not better fitted for some special branch of business than for anything else. A more complete development and more extensive opportunities to become acquainted with the practical workings of various kinds of business would draw out their tastes, and determine their true functions in the industrial world. So far as this can be ascertained it should always determine the choice. It will in the end overbalance any temporary advantages that may seem to be possessed by some other calling.

The young man should, therefore, first of all, study himself. He should consider well the comparative development of the various faculties of his mind, his temperament, the powers of his physical constitution, and the tendency given to his mind by his early training. Let him ask himself, "What am I best fitted to do? What can I do best? What pursuit would be most attractive to me?" Let him avail himself of every opportunity to become acquainted with the various trades and professions, and then, observing carefully the impression they make upon him, and looking again at his own mental and physical character with reference to each, let him make his election.

Do not be led away, as many have been to their ruin, by a mere passing whim or fancy. Look to the permanent and general tendencies of your mind, and not to a temporarily excited faculty.

Strength, ingenuity, a good address, and enterprise, are the great cardinal powers of business.

Some occupations require only one of these—others require a combination of them; and others, again, require a combination of some one of these essentials with other qualities, to carry them on with honour and success.

The occupations in which the essential requisite is physical strength, are those of day-labourers, butchers, and farmers. A farmer will succeed best who possesses mental cultivation of the first order; but still, the leading requisite of the business is physical strength, without which he cannot discharge his duties. A strong, healthy boy will soon learn the art of killing and dressing an animal. Strength is also requisite to the success of a bookbinder, or a wheelwright.

The occupations whose leading requisite is mechanical ingenuity are generally called trades. A tailor, a shoemaker, or a brushmaker, does not require so much ingenuity as some other trades; but trades in general require a large share of it, in combination with style, mathematical skill, and other qualifications.

Good address pre-supposes some education, a genteel person, and an obliging disposition. It is the leading requisite in all trading pursuits, and is the basis of successful shopkeeping.

Enterprise is requisite in all kinds of business, especially in speculations, or extensive mercantile operations.

We may add that most kinds of irregular business pay equally well in the long run, to those who have the ability to carry them on, and that all useful employments by which a man can earn an honest living, are equally respectable in the estimation of every sensible person. "There is but one way," says a well-known writer, "of securing universal equality to man: that is, to regard every honest employment as honourable, and for every man to learn, in whatever state he may be, therewith to be content, and to fulfil, with strict fidelity, the duties of his station, and to make every condition a post of honour."

THE quality of turning men into ridicule, and exposing those we converse with, is the qualification of little, ungenerous tempers. The greatest blemishes are often found in the most shining characters; but what an absurd thing it is to pass over all the valuable parts of a man, and fix our attention upon his infirmities—to discern his imperfections more than his virtues.

THE CHAPEL CHORISTERS.

"GLORIA IN EXCELSIS!" rang through the little chapel in a clear volume of sound that rose above the accompaniment of the organ, and was just shaded and softened by the flute-like tenor that accompanied that single female voice.

Many of the sunbrowned seamen who worshipped there knew the voice and the singer, and listened the more earnestly, because of her, to the chants and psalms, and the sermon that followed. It was "English Bessie" who came among their wives and children on many a kindly errand, and had always a cheerful word for the sick and desponding. The men called her "a hearty lass," and wished many a "blessing on her honest face." Their wives, in Sunday dress, and proud of the stalwart arms on which they leaned, "thought it shame" that she had not chosen from among the rough and hardy wooers by whom she was surrounded.

Prayer and chant were over, and the still sermon-time came, when Bessie's duties were ended; and she drew the crimson curtain aside to look and listen with the rest. The warm summer sun came quivering from the water through the lance-shaped windows, and lighted up the pale, grave face of the clergyman in his pulpit and the strangely gathered audience.

Some were boatmen, or hands from coasting vessels, whose occupation allowed them leisure for home and its comforts. They were surrounded by their wives and little ones in all the smartness of their Sunday costume, relieved by scarfs or shawls of bright foreign weaving, the gift of some successful relative on a return voyage. The children sat uneasily on the high benches, and looked at the flies on the window, or studied the pictures in their prayer-books, as children will. These were the more regular attendants of the chapel. Beyond them, the trim blue jacket of a man-of-war's man was the contented neighbour of some "lubberly whaler"—in ordinary intercourse a special aversion. And there were men whose dress had no pretension to Sunday neatness, who scarcely knew one day of the week from another, except that the seventh was, in some sort, a day of rest even with the hardest captains under whom they sailed—who were there they scarcely knew how or why, from idle whim or vague curiosity, to hear the music or "what the parson would have to say," gathered literally from the highways and byways, and compelled to come in.

There were unusual sights and sounds for church-goers without. Now loud oaths or snatches of a sailor song from some group strolling along the wharves, then a hiss of steam, a flitting past of steamers, as the Sunday pleasure-boats left on their crowded hourly trips down the bay. Bells rang and dogs barked, men shouted or laughed with coarse, unseemly merriment at coarser jests, the chapel rocked and swayed in the swell of some arriving or departing vessel, and a steady, glaring heat struck upon the small organ-loft, whose occupants were familiar with all this in the discharge of their self-appointed duty.

Heat and cold were alike to them so long as they could lead in the "common praise" and respond to the "common prayer" of those in whom they thus evinced untiring interest,—to English Bessie, for the sake of the father and brother buried by one wave from the same wreck; and to the blind man at her side, whose white hands drew such noble music from the organ's keys, while he sang the pure, clear tenor of which we spoke.

He sat with his face turned towards Bessie, as if his sightless eyes longed to know the features of this familiar friend, whom he had never yet seen. His long hair, thrown backwards from a forehead that had never known exposure, touched the broad linen collar, turned over a simple ribbon, tied carelessly about the throat. His dress was simple and far from new, but neat, so neat that you wondered to know a woman's hand had not arranged it. Music was at once his passion and his livelihood. For the rest, he had no relatives and no dependence.

It was a singular friendship that had grown up between these two, who met not elsewhere; and when the sermon was done, it was pleasant to see the sisterly care with which she handed him his hat and staff, and led him down the narrow stairs, where he must have groped slowly but for her hand.

"Here is the sill, Richard," she said, "and here the door; and there is the rector waiting to speak with you."

But the quick ear of the blind man discovered another step, and, though he listened to the kindly words of the grave rector, he heard an invitation given and refused where Bessie stood at the door of the vestibule.

"What did he want?" asked Richard, in the quick, excited manner peculiar to him, as his hand was once more placed in that firm, reliable clasp, and she led him over the swaying plank to the shore.

"Steady! There, now you are on the wharf," Bessie said, as she might have soothed an excited child. "Who? What? Allen?"

"Yes, Allen. I heard his voice when Mr. Storey was talking. When did the 'Bess' come in? He has had a quick trip."

"Not very; the usual time. There, now, you do not need my hand any longer."

"Why do you take it away, Bessie? There is a crossing yet, and those piles of lumber."

"Yes"—and she laughed pleasantly—"but you know them as well as I do. You could lead me here."

"I wish I could," he answered below his breath, for the blindness was still a dark horror to him. "But Allen?"

"He only asked about to-night, if I should go to chapel, and—"

"If he could walk with you. When are you going to be married?" he added, abruptly.

But Bessie only pointed out a loose round stone in the crossing, as if she did not hear the question.

"Mother's not so well to-day, and I cannot go as far as usual," she said, as they entered a narrow, crooked street. "How bright and pleasant it must look out at the asylum now, with all the roses in bloom!"

"Yes, if one could see them."

"Richard, you are not thankful to-night for what you can enjoy," said the young girl, earnestly. "You have a cheerful home and fresh sweet-scented air and cheerful society."

"Go on, Bessie. You mean 'while you are shut up in this close street with a sick mother, and your bread to gain by your needle.' But then there is Allen!" and the gloomy tone came back again.

"Let him be there," Bessie answered, decidedly, pausing at her own door-stone. "Richard, you sang 'Benedic, anima mea' this afternoon; remember it on your way home. I shall, so long as my mother has a shelter, and I have health and strength to work for her. Take care now, and look out for the carriages and the crossings. I shall have time for a practice hour on Wednesday evening. You may come to tea if you like."

The blind man's staff rang upon the pavement as he went on his lonely way, not knowing that she stood upon the door-stone, and watched for his safety so long as he was in sight. He did not know what should make him so restless and disturbed about this marriage. It was right and natural, and what he could have wished for Bessie. They would be finely paired—the high-spirited, energetic woman and her sailor lover. He so tall, and bronzed, and stalwart, as Bessie's husband ought to be; frank and generous, as sailors ever are.

Richard Langdon, the blind music-teacher, still lived at the asylum where he had studied his beautiful art, with the love and confidence of pupils and teachers. The rooms were of noble proportions, the grounds fragrant with sweet-scented shrubbery, and cool with the shadow of heavy foliage. Here he walked, that still Sabbath afternoon, and thought upon his aimless, joyless childhood, and what if he had had a sister like Bessie to cheer it. There were many hours when his mind preyed upon itself; it had always been so in the pauses of study, but never so much as now.

So he wandered down the rose-walk, listening to the murmur of voices that rose from the play-ground beyond the garden, and envying the children their Sabbath rest and peace. But his mind would go back to Bessie and their first acquaintance, when she came to offer her fresh, strong, but untrained voice to assist him to lead in the chapel music. His nature was so gentle that her quick, stirring way was not pleasant to him at first; it was not his idea of womanliness. He liked her better when he found how much in earnest she was to improve this one talent, and how grateful for his instructions. Now when they were together, he laid aside the timid uncertainty of step and manner, trusting to her guidance. When she was married, all these pleasant walks and rehearsals must end, for she would have new duties and companionship and pleasures. No wonder he was restless and disturbed.

The pale, gentle widow had a welcome for him when the appointed evening came; and he sat down near her, in the open door, until Bessie should come in. He could feel the neatness of all around him, and heard the cat purring in the door-sill, and the kettle singing its pleasant evening song in the outer room. It was all so still and homelike to him—though he had never known a home, but in his dreams; so different from the clatter of feet through the corridors of the asylum, the opening and shutting of doors, the hum of children conning their lessons, or the discordance of the tortured musical instruments under the hands of unskilful pupils. He wondered if the gay, boisterous sailor would appreciate this quiet rest, so dear to him, and Bessie's invalid mother, with her delicate tastes and instincts.

When tea was over and the household duties were ended for the day, though it was pleasant to hear Bessie go so easily about them, she came, for the first time, and sat down by him on the door-stone, for the house was one of those low, old-fashioned tenements where you step from the street into the dwelling-room at once. The street was still and deserted, save now and then a solitary footstep echoed along the pavement, and died away in the shadows beyond. A massive, but long disused warehouse, built when this narrow street had its great commercial fame and influence, loomed opposite to them, the iron-bound doors and shutterless windows gleaming in the moonlight, an old, decayed, but to Bessie a pleasant neighbour. It was better to sit by her window and imagine the days of its ancient bustle and opulence, than to watch the bad management of some thriftless housekeeper, or her neglected children quarrelling on the pavement. To-night, it was especially pleasant to see it so softly shadowed; and she described it to the blind man as she would have drawn the picture of a friend.

And yet she could not draw a portrait of herself that satisfied him. She always turned away with some jest upon her stout figure and heavy features, which displeased and annoyed him, for he never could make her anything but beautiful in his mind.

"I will ask her now," thought Richard, "before any one has a claim upon her;" and, with quick impulse, he preferred a long-indulged, but unspoken request.

"If you will only let me touch your hair—your face, one instant, Bessie, as I do when I wish to know my friends and pupils better, I shall be more contented when you are Allen's wife. You have been such a dear, true friend to me!"

She took up both his hands, and, stooping, laid them on her bowed head.

"As I thought," he murmured rather than spoke; and his hands shook and trembled, though she was so quiet beneath their touch. "Soft, wavy hair; it is brown, I know, brown, and silken as a child's. The broad, open forehead, that belongs to you, Bessie. I know how your eyes look now, honest and fearless and very truthful; such long lashes, and your cheek so round and smooth! How could you tell me that you were not beautiful!"

"Because I am not," she said, taking his hands again. "And feel how hardened my hands are, while yours are soft and white. It is an ugly contrast, and so are our faces and characters and dispositions," she added, presently.

"I knew—but Allen is manly and hardy and cheerful. I was not always so gloomy, Bessie; truly I was not. But I grew so restless and dependent and homesick—I cannot describe it any other way—yet I never have had, and never shall have a home such as other men win for themselves, who do not know how to prize it as I should."

"It is almost time for the rehearsal," said Bessie, as if to lead him from this hopeless mood, "and mother has fallen asleep there upon her pillows. Come, let us go, Richard."

She drew his arm within hers as they rose, and they walked on towards the river, for the chapel was scarcely a stone's throw. He longed to say more, to tell her all that the touch of that bowed head had revealed to him, how passionately he loved her, how doubly hateful his blindness and dependence were to him for her sake, how doubly solitary his life would always be for having known her and for her care over him; but he struggled with this stormy mood bravely, for he knew he had no right to lay the burden of his misfortunes at any woman's feet, even if she were free to take it up and bear it onward for him.

So, they walked on in silence for a little time until they began to hear the soft splash of the incoming tide against the wharves and the sides of the vessels lying at anchor. It recalled the trim schooner "Bess" and her captain to his mind.

"When are you to be married?" he asked, abruptly. "Soon, I hope."

"Do you, Richard?"

"Yes, it is better to be soon;" and again the strong tide of feeling rushed to his lips. He pressed his teeth into them, so that he should say no more.

"Well, then," said Bessie, her voice trembling a little—he had never known this before—"I am going to make you a strange proposal, not strange, for it is right and best; mother thinks as I do. You are to be my husband, Richard, when I do marry, for you love me as Allen does not and cannot, and you need me more than he, as I told him when he asked me to be his wife."

"I, Bessie! Poor and blind! I your husband!" He reeled as if a sudden blow had been struck, but she upheld him steadily.

"If you do not wish it, Richard, it ends here. You know me well enough in these three years to know that I mean all I say, and that I had only to assure myself of your love before I allowed mine to be seen. You would never have asked this of me: but here I am. I offer myself, my love, and care, and companionship to you, if you will take it. Richard, let me be home, and strength, and sight to you always."

It was well that they had reached the chapel, for the courage with which she had nerved herself was fast forsaking her. By the dim light, she saw their rector bending over his books in the vestry, as was his wont when he expected them there. The blind man heard the advancing step and kindly welcome, as he came forward to the chancel, and the sound of other voices in the loft above them.

"Make it real; it is all a dream," he said, and they knelt down together for their pastor's blessing, for he knew all that was in their hearts, and that henceforth the chant of thanksgiving would come from the innermost depths of Richard Langdon's soul—

"Who crowneth me with mercy and loving kindness."

Inventions and Science.

A NEW PROCESS FOR MAKING BREAD.—It was mentioned some time since that a new process for bread making, patented by Dr. Daughlish, effected great results, by preventing waste inseparable from fermentation. It is now affirmed that the method has been brought into perfectly satisfactory working, and that 10 per cent. more bread is made out of a sack of flour than by the old process.

WATER AS A MOTIVE POWER.—Mr. A. de Polignac has discovered a new system by which the power of a waterfall may be transmitted to a considerable distance at a comparatively small expense. His machine consists of a lift and force-pump, set in motion by the waterfall, and of a series of pipes of sufficient diameter, conducting the water to the place where it is wanted. Here it supplies a "Hungarian machine," and the water may then be allowed to run to waste, or be turned to some useful purpose.

BENSON'S PATENT WATCH BOW AND PENDANT.—This is really an exceedingly useful invention, and calculated to be beneficial to everybody but the pick-pocket. Such an invention as this has long been necessary; we lose our watches, wonder why we lose them, and are satisfied in offering a reward for their return or in prosecuting the thief. Prevention, in every case, being better than cure, Mr. Benson deserves the thanks of the public for the invention of his watch bow and pendant. The bow or handle of an ordinary watch is, as everybody knows (pickpockets in particular), attached to the watch by a very thin piece of wire, which also serves as a hinge, and is easily broken. One of our magistrates recently remarked that it was perfectly scandalous watchmakers did not secure their watches in a better manner. And the justice of the remark must be admitted. An efficient safeguard is now, however, to be found in Mr. Benson's invention; he has produced an admirable contrivance against the thief in the following manner. The watch being wrenched from its bow by the purchase, as it is called, afforded to the leverage of the thief's finger and thumb, the inventor has so altered the bow or handle, by the insertion of a swivel joint, that however often it may be turned it cannot possibly break off from the chain or the watch, while at the same time the spring in the handle, by which, upon being pressed, the lids are opened, is not at all affected. Besides being useful, the improved bow and pendant are exceedingly neat.

IMPROVED COOKING APPARATUS.—J. F. Maire has recently introduced his new cooking apparatus, which possesses the double advantage of saving both time and fuel. It consists in putting the food to be prepared for eating with water in a cooking vessel of the digester kind. The water in this vessel is raised as high as two atmospheres' pressure, which is shown by a valve on the lid. At the moment the valve begins to rise and the steam escapes, the vessel is taken from the fire and completely wrapped up with materials that will not suffer the heat to escape. The caloric that has been produced when the vessel was upon the fire is thus concentrated in the vessel tightly shut up, and the cooking completed away from the fire.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

LORD CAMPBELL. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD CAMPBELL,
CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.

LORD CAMPBELL, the present Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, was born at Springfield, near Cupar, in Scotland, in 1779, and is the son of the Rev. George Campbell, upwards of fifty years minister of Cupar parish. He was educated at the University of St. Andrews, with the view of being brought up to the church. He pursued his studies with much vigilance; but he did not evince a great taste for the profession his father had chosen. One of his contemporaries at St. Andrews was in after years known to fame as Dr. Chalmers. At the conclusion of his university studies, "plain John Campbell" came to London with the determination of becoming a barrister. He underwent the necessary course of legal training with characteristic perseverance; in the meantime employing his leisure, and "keeping the wolf from the door," by the exercise of his skill as a shorthand writer and reporter on the establishment of the Morning Chronicle. As a member of the press Mr. Campbell won considerable distinction, and succeeded in gaining the friendship of many influential individuals. For a long time he performed the duties of theatrical critic of the journal to which he was attached. He was called to the bar in 1806 by the Society of Lincoln's Inn, and was not long before he proved his fitness for the legal profession. From the first he took a prominent place among the advocates of the day, and continued his onward march until he had secured a highly lucrative practice. In 1827 he was invested with the silk gown of a king's counsel; and three years afterwards occupied a seat in the House of Commons as member for Stafford. In 1832 Lord Grey gave him the appointment of Solicitor-General, and two years after that of Attorney-General. In the meantime Mr. Campbell shifted his parliamentary services from Stafford to Dudley, and from thence to the more important city of Edinburgh. He continued to represent the Scottish metropolis till June, 1841, when he relinquished the functions of Attorney-General to accept the Chancellorship of Ireland, the position of Privy Councillor, and a place among the peers of England. He was called to the House of Lords as Baron Campbell; while his wife, a daughter of the late Lord Abinger, was created a peeress in her own right, with the title of Baroness Stratheden.

In the autumn of the same year Lord Campbell resigned his position as Chancellor of Ireland, and for a time devoted himself to legislative work in the upper House of Parliament. In July, 1846, he was made Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and in 1850, on the retirement of Lord Denman, he became Lord Chief Justice of England.

This important post, with a salary of £8,000 per annum, Lord Campbell still continues to hold.

As a judge his lordship has earned a great reputation. He is remarkable for sagacity, common sense, and a thorough knowledge of the law. On the bench he exhibits the dignity befitting his high position. If he finds the law is wrong in any of its branches, he administers it with gentleness, and at once sets about remedying the defect. In his position as a legislator he has this opportunity, and does not fail to exercise it. His recent endeavours to put down a certain abominable traffic were determined, straightforward, and to the purpose. His lordship aimed a well-directed blow at a great social grievance, and as far as possible crushed it. For this and many similar services the Lord Chief Justice deserves well of the English people. We trust he may still live long to enjoy the fruits of a reputation so well earned.

Although considerably above seventy-five years of age, Lord Campbell exhibits the bodily and intellectual vigour of a much younger man. Notwithstanding his age and the arduous duties of judge and legislator, he manages to find leisure for literary pursuits. In the world of letters Lord Campbell has earned an enduring name. His principal work is "The Lives of the Lord Chancellors." The first series was published in 1846. It was in three volumes, and extended to the revolution of 1688. The second series made its appearance in December 1846, and the third at the close of the following year. Since then Lord Campbell has written the "Lives of the Lord Chief Justices." These works are undeniably valuable accessions to biographic literature.

The portrait of the Lord Chief Justice is from a fine photograph recently taken by Mr. Mayall of Argyll-place, Regent-street.

THE FUGITIVES FROM DELHI.

THE dashing bravery which stormed the walls of Delhi, and in the face of fearful odds drove out the mutineers, and planted English colours on the Mogul palace, did not subside with the first flush of victory, but followed up its triumph with promptitude and vigour.

Inside the city the battle was prolonged for several days. The rebels fought desperately hard. They fought like men who knew that defeat must end in death, that for them there was no quarter, that they would not even fall like soldiers, but hang like criminals: so they struggled, with the gibbet full in sight; and when fighting was impossible, they fled like criminals from the gallows.

Our brave fellows have done good work before: to long marching, hard fighting, patient waiting, they have been well used. But wherever they have served, it has been—or has been for the most part—against honourable foes. Our troops in India have been called on to do another sort of work;—to fight against rebels, to hunt down—as so many tigers—mutineers, blood-stained Sepoys, the murderers of women and children. And the British soldiers have set about that work in earnest. Already they have done much: more still remains to be done. Cheerfully they endured fatigue and exposure; patiently waited while trenches were dug and batteries erected; with courage and determination never surpassed, they rushed to the assault, when the hour arrived, of the city of the Moslem, and street by street, foot by foot, inch by inch, fought for its possession, and triumphed over every obstacle.

But it was not enough to seize on Delhi; not enough to occupy the stronghold of the revolt; not enough to drive out the rebels. To permit them to escape, to scatter themselves over the country, to conceal themselves among the peaceful and innocent population, would be to cheat justice, dishonour the dead, and endanger the living. Vigorous measures were therefore taken immediately to follow the fugitives. Here the dire want of a sufficient body of cavalry was severely felt. The mounted troops available were at once employed, and the work accomplished by this mere handful of men, only makes the want of a proper force the more apparent.

Many a skirmish with the fugitive mutineers took place. Our men never stopped to count heads, or calculate chances. Five to one, ten to one, twenty to one,—ay, if it had been a hundred to one, they would gallantly have charged them, and driven them to destruction, like chaff before the wind. The acts of personal heroism performed in this way are worthy of the days of chivalry. No company of crusaders ever charged the Pagans more bravely than have our troops attacked and defeated the mutineers.

Delhi, the blood-stained and defiled city—the city which had witnessed the treachery and cruelty of the old king and the princes—bears witness also to their overthrow and punishment. The old monarch was brought back and paraded through the streets, amid yells and execrations; the bodies of the princes, justly slain, were exposed on the very spot where English blood had been so wantonly shed by their command. Why the old king should not hang for the murderous work done under his direction, is more than we can fathom. Surely he ought not to be permitted to escape.

While it is a matter of satisfaction that the principal agents of the revolt at Delhi have been thus dealt with, we cannot but regret that so many thousand fugitives should have escaped. Notwithstanding the zeal and energy displayed in the pursuit, the main body of the rebels were able to preserve themselves from the point of the bayonet, the edge of the sword. The troubles of Bengal have been thus prolonged, and even the tranquillity of the other presidencies threatened.

Colonel Greathed left Delhi in command of a force numbering about three thousand in all. He was charged with the pursuit of one body of Delhi fugitives which had taken a route for Agra and Cawnpore. At Bolundshithur he came up with the flying enemy, and signally defeated them with small loss to himself. He defeated them a second time on the day following at Allyghur, and about nine days later arrived at Agra in the very nick of time. About Agra we shall have more to say on a future occasion; suffice it that the enemy were repulsed with great loss, pursued, routed, and dispersed. The chase was continued until they had been driven across the Kharee, with the loss of a thousand killed, all their guns, all their baggage, and all their plunder. This brilliant exploit was achieved with very small loss.

Successes so striking leave little room for gloom. The great want appears to have been an adequate supply of cavalry. But skilfully employing that which was at their command, our generals have reduced the numerical strength and crippled the resources of the mutineers. The day of revolt is over, and the day of punishment and, we trust, pacification, has arrived.

LATSON.

BY FELIX STOWE.

CHAPTER XIV.

IN WHICH THE CUP OVERFLOWS.

It was just about the time when old Claymore, from a curious mixed motive of gratitude and whim, dubbed his little grandson after the name of the place where his young foster-mother found him, that an heir of the house of Latson appeared within those ancient towers.

The fashionable paper duly announced one morning the happy and auspicious event; and the belfry was again in requisition, and the dear bells rang it out "fast and loud," and the firing of the peal declared the felicity that reigned in the great man's house.

The peal knew nothing about it. Not one of the ringers up in that old, square, tottering place, with his coat off, and his shirt sleeves rolled up to the armpits,—not one of those ringers would have changed places with the happy father for five minutes if he had known where that father was, and what he was doing, and how he felt, while all the parish was going mad with excitement.

We saw excitement, instead of joy, for, excepting that the Lady Ethel had endeared herself to every family in the place, and whatever was supposed to give her new happiness rejoiced the village, the bells would have had all the joy to themselves that day.

She had passed those months in doing her very best to make other homes happier than hers was, or ever would be. It had been no picture of fancy or flight of fair promises, when she talked to Latson about going round among the cottages, with her basket on her arm. She had done it day by day when her presence was wanted, much to her lord's distaste—at least, it would have been if he had done her the honour to think about her, or to notice her movements.

Many a wife, vexed and wroth at her husband's extravagance or bad habits, had been gently counselled to "bear and forbear," by her who could preach that doctrine with so good a conscience; her heart bursting within her as she thought how she could have endured more easily even curses and blows, than pine on, forgotten and neglected, as she had now done so long.

It is the day after the arrival of little Claude Blance Latson. There has been no want of attention, no neglect lately; for our readers must very often have seen the sad strange sight, of a man suddenly roused to a perception of his cruelty, just when the object of it is on the point of putting reparation beyond his reach.

It is so now with Ethel.

She has kept up, for his sake, by a mighty struggle, during all that weary twelvemonth. She has dreaded nothing more than giving him anxiety; though, poor thing, she learned every day how little need there was for dreading.

There is now no more occasion for her to keep up, and she yields at once.

Latson is with her. The three doctors have just taken their departure, after a faithful announcement to the husband that they have done all they can.

"We can hardly tell," said the great man from Salisbury, "why the patient should sink in her present circumstances. There seems hardly enough in the case itself to account for this extreme prostration. But it is our duty to tell you, that if these strong stimulating measures are not successful, almost immediately, we must be prepared for the most serious results."

You do not, reader, understand very much of human nature, if you think that those words fell lightly even on the heart of the Honourable Hugh.

A man will let a gentle, loving creature go her way, and slowly freeze up her life within her breast, as long as he expects to have thirty or forty years to live with her, and to do his cruel work in. But here is a sudden stop put to a hundred plans, and to the new scenes and prospects of a married life; here is a waste of all the excitement, and the gaiety, and the cost of wedding, and wedding trips, and altered establishment. Besides which, here is the flowing in upon the guilty man's heart, of a heavy tide of self-reproach, with a thousand recollections, similar to that of the billiard party; without the memory of one single word of hers (oh! what would he have given to remember just one look that day?) which could justify unkindness, or excuse neglect.

We have called the infant's name, Claude Blance Latson.

This was one of the arrangements made that day in Ethel's room, at her bedside.

"May his name be Claude, dear Letty, after your father?" said the husband, as he took her hand on returning from the dismissal of the doctors.

"No, no," she whispered, "why not his father's name, dear Hugh?"

"His father," said Latson, "deserves to be forgotten, not remembered;" and Latson covered his face in his handkerchief, gently laying down his wife's hand to do it.

"He must have one of my names, poor little fellow! I suppose; but he shall only have one," Latson said. "I ask you to let our boy's name be Claude Blance. Say yes, Letty!"

Ethel had not had as gentle words as these from her husband for some time, some long time—and she smiled up from the pillow her deep, deep joy, along with a look of wonder, as if to ask what it all meant.

Presently, when she found strength for it, she said—"But we can talk about his name, dear Hugh, by-and-by—I like none so well as his father's—but, by-and-by, by-and-by."

"Letty," he replied, really moved with a perfect agony of remorse—"Letty, you are very ill, dear, the doctors tell me very ill indeed."

It was quite plain she had not at all known this before. A common case, when no suffering warns the patient, or renders illness a burden. The tone in which Latson spoke startled her.

"There is no danger, dearest," she asked, "is there?" speaking very low; not that she looked alarmed, only taken by surprise.

"Letty, I'm afraid, unless this new medicine does wonders, I'm afraid there is danger. Indeed, we shouldn't be talking on thus. It will only make you weaker—lie still, dearest, will you?"

"Dearest! Could it be that she heard him rightly?"

He had scarcely ever spoken thus, even in the months when she thought he loved her.

She did lie still,—for she was afraid to speak again, lest some colder word should come to chill the last he had spoken to her.

So she gathered up her little remaining strength, and took her husband's hand, as he held it to her, and was very, very happy.

"Better to die thus," Ethel thought, "than live without being allowed to touch this hand."

Latson went down stairs;—down to remember,—down to look forward, and to struggle with the wrath of conscience.

There were other scenes than Wiltshire ones that came into that man's view, as he paced his library, or sat down before the fireplace, gazing into the red caverns of burning coal. Looking with a stern stare, while his mouth fell open in the wretched abstraction of that hour of retribution, he thought that a part of the red-hot fire shaped itself into a room that he had seen once before.

Ah! it's the room in London; where he saw—yes, and he sees it again—a slight, lovely figure, seated before him,—turned, in one moment, as into a pillar of stone, at the coarse laugh he has just flung at her, telling her she is not his wife, and never has been.

He sees that pretty upper lip drawn down in deep-clenched agony; and those dark eyes—yet so soft in their expression—looking out upon him, as full of love as ever,—yet so full of wonder and of woe!

And then a piece of the glowing cavern tumbles in, and the scene changes.

And who shall put upon the paper the many sights he sees? When his fancy—(for he knows nothing of her course, save the end of it)—when his fancy tracks her through those weeks and months of wretchedness; when he was leaving her to die, for aught he knew, and rot away,—his bride, and her child and all!

Then the fire settled down a little once more, and the red cavern changed its shape.

And now there is an old man, palsied as much with misery as with years.

And he faces him and his other bride, in the church and in the walk; and there is the white wrinkled face, as if it were yesterday, and the thin gray hairs quivering in the cold February wind, and the crackling of the flames seem to be repeating to him—

"We couldn't bury her with a lie in her hand!"

"Where's that ring?"

And he starts up.

He remembers that he tossed it into a river, on his wedding journey, that very day.

And his hand grasps his forehead, as if he would crush the brain underneath it, for daring to recollect the fact.

But all these memories were so many joys to the Honourable Hugh, compared with others that pointed to a later date.

The live embers gave him out, one by one, fantastic pictures of full many a scene, that went now, like daggers, one after another, into his heart.

Here was one, where Ethel had been ailing for many weeks, and he insisted on a visit, to be paid at once, to a family at the other extremity of the county. She had asked for a week's respite to recover in. He had replied, that she might have had the honesty to tell him he was marrying "into a hospital." She had gone up to prepare, and had fainted on the landing. Yet the visit was persevered in.

The coals revealed to him how gentle her manner was, and how nobly she bore up before strangers, all through that visit; and how, on her return, she was in her sick room for days without his once crossing the threshold, or asking (so far as she could learn) how she was.

Here was another white-heat model of the scene where her little Italian greyhound, very shortly before her illness, had come up to the bedroom door, with a strange pitiful whine, as if it were a cry of foreboding. This was a little favourite of her father's, and a present to her from him when he died. And Latson saw, how that he had opened the door, and kicked his wife's pet to the bottom of the staircase. And the coals showed him, over again, the broken leg, and Ethel trying to put the little limb in a sort of splint; but the little patient had disappeared one day, and Latson saw that Ethel knew the truth, and was too frightened to ask. The truth being, that Latson (not from humanity, but irritated at her attention to it) had put an end to him.

He would have given a year's income to have gone upstairs at that moment, and carried that little favourite, safe and sound, into his wife's presence.

Those pictures, from first to last, could not have been moulded in a fitter substance.

They burnt themselves in upon his heart, one by one, like live coals as they were.

Meanwhile, up stairs, the wife had been trying to think, which was hard work for her, in her extreme weakness.

She managed only to think one thought—yes, two. The first was a thought of tenderest love for little Hugh, as she persisted in calling him to herself. The second was an earnest wish to get better, that she might be called "dearest" again, when she was well enough to tell its full meaning, and be permitted now and then to hold his hand in hers, when she had more strength to retain it.

She thought these two thoughts. And then she went wandering on—who shall tell whither?

Ethel, too, had her fancy pictures. But as Maude bent over her, and watched her tenderly, and saw that she was among different scenes from the present, Maude could tell by the sweet smile on her sister's face that her pictures were among the flowers—the golden-coloured flowers on the curtain at the foot of the bed, all innocence and peace—and that she would have had nothing to remember, in the red-hot coals, of misery and guilt!

CHAPTER XV.

THE CHURCH LOOKS QUITE ITSELF AGAIN.

It is in the middle of the night of that same day.

Maude raps violently at Latson's door. He has gone to lie down for an hour—though he might as well, for all the sleep he got, have sat on learning repentance in the library fire.

"Ethel is worse," cried Maude. "Nurse thinks you should know."

And in a few seconds he is again at the bedside.

Neither the drugs nor the other stimulants freely given have had any power over that sinking strength; and the reason is that her weakness has been collecting, not for hours (then she might have rallied), but for weeks and months.

Broken hearts are not cured by brandy.

"I'm so thankful," Ethel slowly, and with many pauses, murmured up, as her husband bent over her.

"What for?" he gasped; and well he might.

"That—I was—spared to you till little Hugh was born."

"Not Hugh," sobbed Latson: yes, he fairly sobbed now.

"Well, as you like, love. It will not matter much soon what his father calls him. I've been a poor useless wife to you, my dear Hugh," she whispered to him, so that he scarcely heard her.

Latson, who had seen nothing so hot as this in the grate down stairs, clutched both sides of his head, and went into the shadow of the curtain out of view.

She called him back. He could as soon have resisted the last trump as been deaf to the whisper that called him to her.

"May I ask you one thing, dearest?" she said, looking up into his face, while the finger of death was arranging every feature as he would, very fast.

"Anything, my precious."

"That old man, Hugh, when we were married—do you remember an old man—"

And while she stopped to draw breath—breath that had hard work to come when she drew—Latson became, from a burning red, ashy pale.

Their eyes met.

"Do you remember the old man, dear Hugh? the father of some discharged servant?"

"I think I do," he answered. "I just recollect something of it. What of him, my dearest Letty?"

She was glad that, at such a time, he looked at her so firmly.

"Was his daughter, dearest, a discharged servant?"

"Yes!" said Latson.

And he spoke more truly than he meant to speak.

"And was she discharged, dear, for being dishonest?"

"I really," stammered Latson, "have quite forgotten the particulars. But what of her, my love?"

Maude, at this point in the conversation, left the room. She had never heard a word on this subject, and she thought she ought not to know more.

Maude, however, had her own reasons for guessing.

"Have you ever seen her since?" faltered Ethel.

"Never!" cried her husband, greatly relieved by the opportunity for speaking the truth, and yet, as he hoped, comforting Ethel.

He did not succeed in this last attempt. She looked sadly up to him.

"Do you think the housekeeper could remember, dear love, what it was she stole? Would you ask her, to please me?"

And the coal caverns had, it seemed to him, been heated, like the furnace in Babylon, seven times hotter than ever, as she made this request. At last he answered—

"You are not fit, dearest, for this conversation just now. Do let it be, Letty. It can do you no good to hear more about her now, can it, my poor girl?"

And he stooped down and laid his face near hers on the pillow.

But nothing would pacify Ethel.

Nothing ever does pacify the dying when they have something to do, and some one is attempting to hinder them.

"Do you think she is alive, dear Hugh?"

"How can I tell, dearest?"

"Will you make me one promise, Hugh?"

"Yes, twenty, my darling!" he answered.

"That, when I'm gone, you'll make inquiries about her. For, even if she did do wrong, dear Hugh, remember how we all do wrong, and how He whom we steal from every day, never turns us out of His house. Hugh, we have minded Him very little, since we knew each other. Dearest, will you let your wife say, before she goes, what a comfort it has been to her, ever since mamma died, to have a Friend to go to in heaven, when the world sometimes looked dark,—or, at least, not quite so bright. I never knew, till I lost mamma, how true religion could keep one up in deep waters, and I have never forgotten it, since then. I can't say I have not prayed for my husband, but I ought to have been bolder in telling him, how sweet it was to trust in the Man of Sorrows. Do I offend you, Hugh?"

"God forbid!" he gasped.

"Then let it comfort you, dearest, to know that I feel Him to be with me now; and, that if I must leave you and my little boy, I am not going away in the dark. 'His rod and His staff they comfort me.'"

"Would that they comforted me!" said Latson.

"They will, dearest; I will pray that they may. But don't forget the poor girl and her old father. Oh! Hugh, something tells me she didn't steal. The old man looked so good, and yet so very, very wretched. Hugh, for not one single day nor night, since we were married" (and now her voice was scarcely articulate), "have I missed thinking of that old man's face, and I would have asked you about him again and again, if—"

And Latson knew what she would have said; and if she had said it, he must have fallen to the floor at hearing of his cruelty from her lips just then.

So he stopped her by saying—

"Everything shall be done, dearest, that you would wish to be done;—only, don't, don't leave me, Ethel, till I can take a better turn, and treat you as you deserve. Oh, Ethel, Ethel! I've killed you, and I cannot keep you one more poor day!"

And, unless you remembered the red-hot chambers, you must have pitied him, as he sank down into the chair against the bed, and listened to the rattling breath, that was now heard very distinctly when she lay still.

"No, no," she murmured; "don't say that. We were not quite suited, dearest, perhaps, in everything to each other; and I might have done much more, I know, to make you love me. That's all past now. Love little—"

"Claude Blance," he said, coming to her again. "Yes, as my own life, Letty!"

"And see the old man," she faltered.

"Yes, yes, dearest!—everything shall be done."

"And if she was a servant," Ethel tried to say, "will you—will you try her once—"

But Latson sprang upon his feet, and rushed to the door.

"Maude—Maude! Nurse—nurse, I say!"

There was no need for either.

The loving sister, and the gentle patient, was beyond the help of both. She had met already the discharged servant,—the servant who had stolen nothing, but had lost everything! Ethel believed her innocent; she knew it now.

And with that last feeble shudder, she renounced the husband, whose guilt had forced him to profane even her death-bed with a lie!

And so, thus quickly came it again to pass, that the old church was hung in black, and again, as the old pew-opener once more remarked, "looked like itself."

CHAPTER XVI.

TAKES A LEAP.

THERE was another little Church, away in London, that though not exactly hung in black, was always uncommonly sober in its appearance, and was at least original enough to deserve the Wiltshire pew-opener's encomium of being "quite itself," for certainly it was like nothing else.

Little Hugh Church very seldom smiled, and never laughed. At all events, they never saw him laugh who saw him most.

He began speaking by calling Ruth his aunt, and Mrs. Wofield grandmother.

The very names Joyce would have chosen, had she lived to see the little fellow running (if he ever did more than walk) from one to the other.

There seemed to be an air of gloom always on his pale face—not that sort of air which precocious children generally have, as if they were always in deep thought, and could puzzle their elders, any moment, with some outlandish remark—but an air of veritable gloom, as if he knew how much he had lost, and as if it seemed quite uncertain, whether he was not himself lost.

At the same time, as soon, almost, as he could walk, he was a great comfort to Ruth and her mother—he had nearly said an assistance. For, in going little errands to the shop next door but one, or in laying out Ruth's sewing-thread in proper lengths for her, or in holding her skeins of silk on his little hands, and in many a little act of service, neatly and willingly done, he did assist.

Still it seemed, always, as if the shadow of his mother's sorrows hung about him, wherever he went, and whatever he was doing.

His little face said to every by-passer—"I am an orphan,—please not to be too hard upon me!"

Every one of the neighbours soon began to like him, though Ruth didn't encourage any acquaintance with other children. She never forgot, that though Hugh was the memorial of much cruelty and wrong, yet that, on one side at least, he was no poor man's child. But the neighbours liked him; they couldn't help it.

It had been a very exceptional case, when the crabbed charwoman heard him cry. He had never been a crying child; and now, as he went past, the old woman would even run out and give him some little tit-bit or other, returning to her family with some such commentary as this (for the true state of the case had long since been known in the neighbourhood)—

"Drat that queer little chap of Wofield's! but he somehow comes over me like, as nobody else's brats do. I'll lay a shilling he comes of a better sort than Wofield's."

And there, whenever work was a little slack, would Ruth sit down with him and teach her little ward all she knew; and when she had taught him to read, she allowed him to practise and to improve out of the old Bible, from which her mother had read her the beautiful account of Heaven.

Hugh knew nothing accurately, as to how he came to live with the Wofields; he only knew that he had neither father nor mother.

Still, it so happened that as of all the Old Testament stories he read under Ruth's guidance, there was none she liked to hear him read so much as the banishment of Hagar and Ishmael, there was none that little Church himself so much enjoyed and so often cried over.

It was as if he knew how much, by means of that story, he had both gained and lost.

And so time wore on, and Joyce's boy grew more and more like his mother, and less like his father in everything, every week.

One day, instead of giving him a sweetmeat or a piece of bread and treacle as usual, the charwoman gave him, as he was going by, a halfpenny, telling him to go and get himself what he liked with it.

Hugh looked up at her with his old melancholy look, but a little nearer to a smile than was his wont, and said—

"If you please, ma'am, may I do what I like with it?"

"In course," said the woman. "That's why you got it."

"Thank you, ma'am; then, if you please, I'll go and get some coals."

"Coals!" shouted the charwoman; "coals! What in the name o' goodness does the queer little chap want with coals? A ha'p'orth o' coals—aha! ha!"

And the woman's laugh brought out her eldest daughter, and they both looked down at the little solemn face; and the more they laughed the more serious he looked.

"Bless him!" cried the elder woman, catching him up in her arms. "What does he want with a ha'p'orth o' coals, eh? Did ye ever suck 'em, my chicken? oh! they're so good! Why, it must be coal-dust, I'm thinking, to go into that mite's mouth."

And she kissed it in her rough way again and again.

"Ha'p'orth o' coals!" she roared out again.

When her noise and her daughter's was quite over, the little fellow asked her, with a perfectly demure countenance, to be so good as to show him where the shop was.

Whereat they broke out afresh.

At last the daughter said—

"Hain't Mrs. Wofield got enough coals without your spendin' your coppers on 'em?"

"No," said Hugh; "that's why I want, if you please, to get some."

"How do you know?" said the charwoman.

"Because, if you please, ma'am, I heard aunt Ruth, when she got some up this morning, give a great sigh."

"Well?" said the woman, when he stopped, and looked down.

"And she said to grandmother, that there was some coals owing for already, and this was the last; and she said, couldn't we go to bed a little sooner for a few nights—"

"God bless the boy!" said the charwoman. "Tilda!"

"Well," said the daughter.

"Why, true, we work precious hard for what we get, and hain't much to spare—but don't you think we might manage to help this poor creatur a little?"

"Aye, good, in course—"

"Well, suppose you go round to Martin's, and tell 'em to send a hundred o' coal to Wofield's; and tell 'em" (she was speaking quite low to Ma-tilda) "tell 'em to say a friend bid 'em send it for a Christmas-box, and wish 'em a merry Christmas and a happy new year."

"I shouldn't wonder," the woman went on to little Hugh, "if grandmother gets plenty of coals for the present. And here's a Christmas penny for yourself, you little rum 'un—only, don't go and spend it in coals, mind!" and the two women laughed out again at the ha'p'orth of coals.

Hugh took his melancholy little face home again.

He found Ruth very hard at work, and there was not one spark in the grate. It was one of the coldest of afternoons, and the room struck even more chilly than the open air.

His aunt and his grandmother were hard at work.

"Aunt Ruth," said the boy, "I've been to look for little Ishmael—"

"For what?" Ruth said.

"To look for little Ishmael. But I didn't see any bushes, aunt."

The old woman looked at Ruth; and they both coughed at the same moment.

Then Hugh came and took up Ruth's reel of cotton, and began to measure off the thread by his little arm—from the tip of his middle finger to his shoulder—and broke it off at every two lengths.

And, standing by her, he measured off half a dozen of these lengths of thread, and laid them down on the table, close by her.

"I think it's very warm to-night," said the little fellow.

And he looked to the cold black grate, and his teeth (we were going to say) chattered while he spoke. But if they did, Ruth and her mother heard not a sound of it.

They only thought that instead of the angel finding the child, five years ago, the children had found the angel.

Presently, a rap came to the door—

"Please m'm, here's a hundred o' coal, and some wood. A friend says, he wishes ye a merry Christmas and a happy new year."

"Now, mother," said Ruth, "who can this be? Where did you say you'd been, Hugh? Who did you see, dear, when you were out?"

But they could make nothing of the little fellow's story. He half thought that the people next door had something to do with the Christmas-box, and therefore kept his aunt as far as possible from the right scent with the most approved diplomacy.

And as they sat around the fire, Hugh reading aloud the twenty-third Psalm—"The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want"—the mother and daughter looked back to another Christmas time, when they first laid the little bundle down on the bed, and they prayed that they might never love that little bundle less, or feel it any more of an affliction than they had done every day in the last five years.

Hugh's little bed was a shakedown in the corner of the room; and, as every night he said his prayers, not now by instruction, but, as Ruth told him to do, "out of his own head," he knelt down on this particular evening, and, after his usual petitions for his grandfather, grandmother, and his dear aunt, he said, before he got up from his knees, "God bless our dear neighbours and friends! and give them fires to warm them in this cold weather, for Jesus Christ's sake."

And, very soon after, the little petitioner was fast asleep in the corner, with nothing but thin lath and plaster between him and the kind soul whose gift he had just richly repaid by his prayers.

It was, however, about this time that the fortunes of the humble household at number nineteen began somewhat to improve.

And it was now time they should, for the remittances from Arland became now very rare and very scanty; and, of course, their expenses increased as little Hugh grew older.

Ruth obtained two or three new engagements with houses of rather a better order than she had yet worked for. And this, though adding to the amount of her work, enabled them at least to take another room in the little house; and then, after a while, another still; so that Hugh had his little chamber all to himself, and none of them were obliged to sleep in the day apartment.

Thus passed, in very humble comfort, the first ten years of Hugh Church's life.

It may be, that no startling development of genius in their little ward, recompensed those poor women. Their only, and they thought their best, recompense, was in the docility, and the amiability, and the general goodness of the motherless boy.

They lacked nothing which that child knew they wanted, and could procure. In the house or out of it, by day or by night, anyhow and everywhere, he studied to be useful. He could have done not one thing more, had he learned the secret of his first appearance in the church porch, and their compassion towards him.

"Aunt," he said, one fine spring morning, when Ruth was sitting down to her needle, and the old woman, now very infirm, was putting away the breakfast things.

"Aunt, do you know, Tom Brindle at the Sunday-school says he gets half-a-crown a week, and he's only six months older than I am."

"What does he do?" asked Ruth.

"Runs errands, and cleans boots and shoes, at 'The Man in the Moon,'" the boy answered.

"Well," said the old woman.

"I should like to get half-a-crown a week, grandmother."

"Lord love ye! my dear," said Mrs. Wofield, "what should we do without ye?"

"I should come home every night, granny. Tom is home by nine every night except Saturday, and then it's ten."

"Well, to be sure, you both of ye look three or four years older than you are, but it seems very young to go out, don't it, Ruth?"

However, a few weeks saw the little fellow in the back kitchen of a neighbouring inn, polishing away at boots and knives.

And when Hugh Church on that Saturday night laid upon the little round table the first half-crown he ever earned, his heart throbbled with an honest joy, which the great Mr. Dobson, when he pocketed his thousands from the Transparent Summer House Company, never knew.

THE LEARNED BLACKSMITH—ELIHU BURRITT.

THE first lesson which a son of genius has to learn, if born poor, is the conquering of adverse circumstances, and making them subservient to his sublime ambition; and the biographies of the illustrious sons of poverty teach us that this is no easy task. With a broken-down hovel for a birth-place, and parents that have little power to advance their offspring in life, and with the dull monotonous influences of incessant toil constantly depressing their energies, their progress towards the shining goal of fame has been one of extreme difficulty and discouragement. But in innumerable instances hardship has been the school in which the highest characters have been developed, and our self-taught men have made it manifest, that whosoever enters into the sacred temple of knowledge and warms his heart at the holy altar-fire which burns within, comes forth into the cold bleak world again, with a strength of endurance equal to any emergency, and with a faith and hope which grim penury itself cannot shake.

ELIHU BURRITT, the Learned Blacksmith, was one of those who believed that he was born to conquer the outward adversities of life, and not to crouch as an abject slave beneath their power. He was born poor, and, seemingly, the barriers between him and intellectual acquisitions were insurmountable; but at the present time, perhaps, there are few towns in England and America where his name is not pronounced with respectful homage by the wisest and most cultivated; and where the power of his varied attainments has not been generally felt. His journey from obscurity to a well-earned popularity is perhaps one of the most interesting on record. His first memories belong to a lowly shoemaker's shop, with a kind father and mother in it, working hard to support a family of ten children. His parents appear to have formed the pious background of the worth and nobleness which shone with such clear radiance in the character of Elihu. Although poor, their house formed a soothing resting-place for the sorrow-stricken and distressed, and through their influence, silently and unostentatiously expressed, their son learned that benevolence which in later days gave him the loving desire of seeing the whole world linked together by ties of gentle brotherhood. Elihu, in the ripeness of his manhood, and in the fine maturity of his intellectual powers, while advocating the cause of the oppressed ones of the globe, never forgot the father who would go two or three miles out of his way to alleviate the suffering, the mother "who was the best friend her children had on this side of Jesus Christ," or his being taught while yet a lad to set chairs round a hospitable fire for the weary and heavy laden. At an early age, however, he lost this good father by death, and the family, deprived of his self-denying support, was partly broken up, by the members of it who were old enough leaving the paternal roof in search of a livelihood. Elihu chose the trade of a blacksmith, and apprenticed himself to a man in Georgia, where he had a brother already engaged in school-keeping. It does not appear that he evinced any signs of future literary eminence until he had reached the age of sixteen. Up to this period he had read few books, for he could only obtain an interesting one about once every three or four months, and his tastes, leaning towards historical reading, were very seldom gratified. During his apprenticeship, however, he managed occasionally to get hold of a useful book or two, which greatly stimulated his newly acquired thirst for improvement. His brother, the schoolmaster, with fraternal pride, encouraged and directed Elihu's ambition; and becoming aware of his wonderful powers, pointed out more appropriate channels for their exercise. Upon his brother's advice, Elihu left the forge and the anvil to give himself up to study Latin and mathematics for a period of six months. His ambition at this time did not soar very high: if in six months he could read a little "Virgil," and know something of geometry, he would be well content, and not grudge the dollar and a half a day, which he lost by giving up his trade. Stimulated by the thought that his studies ought in some degree to repay him for the sacrifices he was making, he laboured incessantly at his books, and at the close of the appointed time, he found that he had succeeded beyond his utmost expectations. He could read Latin and French with considerable fluency, and began to feel the greatest delight in mathematical studies. But alas, he could no longer afford the time to engage in these pursuits, and at the end of his six months' release from manual toil he felt himself compelled to return to the hammer again, and with the manly resolve of making up for his holiday by doing double work in the blacksmith's shop. He engaged to do the work of two men, in order that he might receive double pay; but although his toil was thus arduous, he managed, nevertheless, to pursue his favourite studies, and even to add to them the Greek language. With a Greek grammar that could be placed in the crown of his hat, and always ready for industrious use, when a vacant moment presented itself, he laboured on with steady purpose for another six months, and at the close of that time, feeling that he had honestly earned a further period of release, to gratify his increasing thirst for knowledge he again left the blacksmith's shop, to devote himself to its uninterrupted acquisition. His labours during this second period were perfectly stupendous. He had betaken himself to Newhaven, and was lodging in a boarding-house there. This is the account which he gives of a single day's life:—"As soon as the man who attended to the fires had made one in the sitting-room, which was at about half-past four in the morning, I arose and studied German till breakfast, which was served at half-past seven. When the boarders were gone to their places of business, I sat down to Homer's Iliad, without a note or a comment to assist me, and with a Greek and Latin lexicon. A few moments before the people came in to dinner, I put away all my Greek and Latin, and began reading Italian, which was less calculated to attract the notice of the noisy men who at that hour thronged the room. After dinner I took a short walk, and then again sat down to Homer's Iliad, with a determination to master it without a master. The proudest moment of my life was when I first possessed myself of the full meaning of the first fifteen lines of that noble work. I took a triumphal walk in celebration of that exploit. In the evening I read in the Spanish language until bedtime. I followed this course for two or three months, at the end of which time I read about the whole of the Iliad in Greek, and made considerable progress in French, Italian, German, and Spanish."

The time will arrive when all men will recognise those who are of real value to a state, and not allow them to want for bread while engaged in pursuits that tend to its advancement and welfare. Meanwhile, honour to those who, like the noble Elihu Burritt, maintain a sturdy independence, pursue knowledge for its own sake, and serve their day and generation without fee or reward.

Returning once more to the forge for bare subsistence, the patient blacksmith bared his sinewy arms for work without a murmur. In proportion to his knowledge, as is always the case with true students, did the magnitude of his ignorance appear to him; but unfortunately in the neighbourhood in which he lived he had no means for further improvement. What was to be done? To remain stagnant was impossible to such a mind, equally impossible the thought that he had acquired enough; and on hearing of a celebrated library in a town of about a hundred and twenty miles' distance, he boldly set out thither, and engaged himself to a blacksmith as a journeyman for a very small pittance per month. So hard had he to work in this new place, that the library was of very little value to him, access to it only being possible during the time when he was engaged in toil. He nevertheless contrived to keep up his old studies, and to add to them the Hebrew language. He economised time with a miser's avarice; he rose while it was yet night, and had always a book at hand in case of any delay in the serving up of breakfast or dinner; he even pursued his studies while eating his food. He does not seem to have had the slightest idea of the pecuniary value of learning, or to have laboured as he did for any worldly emolument, but simply and purely for its own sake.

The following extract from his diary reveals almost an incredible amount of labour; it is the record of a week's gigantic work:—

"Monday, June 18. Headache; forty pages 'Cuvier's Theory of the Earth,' sixty-four pages French, eleven hours' forging.—Tuesday. Sixty-five lines of Hebrew, thirty pages of French, ten pages 'Cuvier's Theory,' eight lines Syriac, ten ditto Danish, ten ditto Bohemian, nine ditto Polish, fifteen names of stars, ten hours' forging.—Wednesday. Twenty-five lines Hebrew, fifty pages of astronomy, eleven hours' forging.—Thursday. Fifty-five lines Hebrew, eight ditto Syriac, eleven hours' forging.—Friday. Unwell; twelve hours' forging.—Saturday. Unwell; fifty pages 'Natural History,' ten hours' forging.—Sunday. Lesson for Bible class."

It is not to be supposed that Elihu Burritt was thus grandly climbing the sublime height of knowledge without being known to fame. Without any desire or effort on his part, he began to attract the attention of the world; to be admired by men of genius and scholarship; and to be called "the Learned Blacksmith." But he was one of the few men who remain unspoiled by fame, as they were uncrushed by adversity and obscurity. He was a true son of toil; and added a noble dignity to the order which he adorned by his industry and independence. To all offers of pecuniary help, when his talents became known, he returned a modest, yet dignified, refusal: his old craft had supported him hitherto, and would no doubt support him to the end; and he would not sell the Divine birthright of labour for the most luxurious ease which money could purchase. Strange to say, he deemed a journeyman's life to be the most advantageous for the acquisition of knowledge.

Brave Elihu! when last we saw thee, thou hadst left the blacksmith's craft, and with glorious eloquence thou wert swaying a mighty audience in England: thousands stood up to do thee reverence, and as thy voice rolled through the room in which they were gathered, their hearts swelled under thy fire-tipp'd words, and bade thee God speed in bringing round the time—

"When man to man the world wide o'er, Shall brothers be, and a' that!"

Since then, he has scattered the blessings of peace everywhere; and, says one who has written of him—"there is something beautifully appropriate, that such a man, whose life has been spent for the most part in the accumulation of many languages and tongues, should offer all these upon the Altar of Peace—should be desirous of fusing all nations into one: so that if not one language be spoken, yet that one heart shall beat, and one humanity be recognised, throughout the globe."

THE NATIVE ARMY OF INDIA.

APART from the terrible interest excited by the slaughter of our countrymen and countrywomen in India, public attention is drawn towards the organisation of the native army of our Eastern empire. The Bengal army has ceased to exist; the armies of the other two presidencies are more or less infected; and nothing can be more natural or proper than the inquiry as to what changes are to be introduced into our military system, to insure the consolidation of our government and the supremacy of our power in India.

That there has been something rotten in the system hitherto practised is but too evident. That something must be done to remodel the Bengal army on a surer footing, and to weed out any symptom of revolt in Bombay and Madras, is also obvious enough. In what the fault consisted, and how a remedy is to be applied, and what sort of remedy it should be, are questions which agitate the public mind, and which demand a careful, painstaking inquiry.

Previous to the late disastrous revolt the numerical strength of the Indian army never exceeded a quarter of a million. Of that comparatively small body all but 20,000 were natives of the country.

A separate army, separately commanded, recruited, and enrolled, belonged to each of the three presidencies. The general officer of the Bengal army, however, took precedence as commander-in-chief in India.

The annual expense of the combined armies averaged ten millions sterling; the pay and allowance being on an exceedingly liberal scale.

The Bengal army consisted of three brigades of horse artillery, composed of Europeans and natives, six battalions of European foot artillery, three native battalions, one engineering corps, eleven regiments of light cavalry, two of English Fusileers, and seventy-four regiments of Sepoys. Besides these there were thirty-one irregular regiments, eighteen local corps, and twelve regiments in her Majesty's service.

The Bombay native army, although the smallest, some efficient service; but the Bengal army has taken precedence of all the rest, and been more highly privileged in every respect; while its ingratitude, baseness, and treachery have afforded a sad contrast to the fidelity of the other sections of the army.

Various opinions are entertained with regard to the chief cause of the revolt in Bengal. It is urged, with a good deal of probability, that the Hindoo Sepoys were mere tools in the hands of the subtler Mohammedans, and that Mohammedan rancour had been only biding its time for revenge. That, jealous of English authority, chafing under British dominion, the Mohammedans of India aroused the Hindoo Sepoys by an appeal to their superstition. The report about the greased cartridges is said to have originated with the Mohammedans, and by them to have been laboriously spread in the ranks of the Sepoys.

It is urged again by others that the want of sympathy between officers and men in the Bengal army called forth a spirit of disaffection, that had slumbered for many years, but was aroused, at length, by a supposed attack on their religious prejudices. There was not, it is argued, that feeling of fellowship between the men and their officers which does exist in English regiments; that the officers cared little for their men and the men still less for their officers, and that neither men nor officers cared about the service, except as it furnished the means of a livelihood or a fortune.

But, whichever view we adopt, the ostensible cause of the revolt turns on the religious question. The Sepoys revolted because their faith was attacked.

Admitting this, we naturally ask how it is that Madras and Bombay do not share in the alarm, how it is that Bengal alone should be so tenacious of any interference with its superstitions. Inquiry shows us that the obvious reason of this is the fact that in Bengal, beyond and above either of the other presiis the most ancient of the three Indian forces, Sepoys having been disciplined in Bombay towards the end of the seventeenth century. The army has long borne an excellent character for bravery and patience. It is capable of bearing fatigue, and has a high character for fidelity. It has always been readier to volunteer for distant expeditions than the armies of the other presidencies.

The Madras army, next in extent to that of Bengal, has borne a very good character, and has rendered dencies, we have pampered this spirit of superstitious prejudice; that in Bengal—not in Madras or Bombay—we have recognised that distinguishing feature of Hindooism—caste, have bowed before it, have acknowledged its claims, have taken the utmost pains and trouble to avoid anything like offence, or that which might, by any possibility, be construed into offence, against a principle subversive of all proper feeling, or against a religion the most corrupt and degrading under heaven.

Whatever other alterations, therefore, may be made in the construction of a new native army in Bengal, whether greater opportunity is given for the promotion of native officers, or whether promotion be exclusively conferred on British officers, there is one element that must be left out. We have had enough of caste; we have suffered too much from its recognition: it is high time that it was swept away, that the law of the stronger be brought to bear on the native soldier of Bengal, and that he should no longer possess those privileges which he has so shamefully abused.

The Matron.

NO. III.

I PROPOSE in this number to furnish a few more plain and simple directions as to cutting and contriving various articles necessary to constitute a baby's wardrobe; just premising that the quantity of each article as well as the quality must depend upon the resources of the parent. As to quantity, there should be provision made for as frequent change as possible, and for sudden exigencies; and as to quality, generally speaking, the better the materials the more service they will render, and the cheaper they will be in the end.

THE FLANNEL is an important article, and it will be necessary to have two at least. Two yards and three quarters of flannel of the ordinary width will be required for a couple. For the bodies, tear off two pieces, each five inches and a half deep, and the entire width of the flannel; then divide the rest of the flannel into three equal parts. Tear one of the widths down the centre, to form the two backs, and gore each of the others along the middle, sloping altogether four inches—that is, two inches from the middle of the breadth. Thus the three pieces will be made into six. Run a gored piece on to each side of the half breadth, and herringbone it down, remembering that as the cross-cut piece is the longest, that is the one that must be held nearest to you in joining the seams. The fronts will thus be straight. The engraving shows the form in which the body should be cut. The body should be lined with a fine long cloth, turned over to form a binding to the flannel in every part, except where the shirt is put in. The shoulder-strap may be made of narrow pieces of flannel, lined and bound with long cloth, sewed on at one side, and with a button-hole on the other (see engraving). Bind the sides and bottom of the skirt with white galloon, or, as some call it, flannel binding. This should be sewed with white silk. The skirt, it will be seen, is to be plaited up, except about seven inches at each edge, and set in the body between the flannel and the lining. Besides the strings shown in the engraving, two pairs are put to the skirt. They are to be placed at the edge on one side, and on the other—the right side—about five inches within, so that the skirt may fold over nicely.

NIGHT-FLANNELS are usually made without any lining, but with two broad plaits down the back of the body, and others under the arm. They need not be made of quite so fine flannel as those used in the day time, but they ought to be made of pure wool. One end of the body only is sloped.

THE FIRST PETTICOAT is usually made with a plain body, and shoulder-straps instead of sleeves. It may be tacked inside the frock, so that they can be slipped on together. It may, however, be made of exactly the same form as the flannel.

FLANNEL ROLLERS are simply strips of flannel (the finer the better), five or six inches wide, and long enough to wrap twice round a child's body.

BINDERS are generally made of stout webbing, woven the proper length; but knitted ones will be found much softer, while equally firm.

THE MONTHLY GOWN.—Here is a very pretty pattern for an infant's gown. Do not be startled at it, as if it were too "fine," or too "costly" for ordinary use. It is at once neat and inexpensive. In fact, it is only an ordinary night-gown, made of somewhat finer material, with a little ornamental work. It may be made of cambric muslin, or of any fancy muslin, and trimmed with a little neat work. The proportions are much the same as in the night-dresses, only the front of the body had better be made separate from the skirt, the backs only being made in one piece. The top should be put in a narrow band, with a running to draw the back of the waist. The engraving will convey an idea of the neat and simple manner in which these gowns should be made.

The middle of the front is muslin, narrowed towards the waist, and ornamented with fancy stitches, and with insertion on each side. A little of the same kind of work may be placed on the sleeves, and at the bottom. If a false piece be put on each side, from the shoulder, it will give the appearance of a jacket. This may be trimmed with edging and stitches, to correspond with the front.

THE FIRST PINAFORE.—This is a very pretty shape, and is easily made. It may be made of thin, soft diaper, trimmed with simple work.

The front should be twelve inches deep, by sixteen in the widest part, which allows for ample sloping in the front. The back should be quite detached, joined only on the shoulders, which should be considerably sloped. A piece of soft tape, sewed on the wrong side of the pinafore, will form the running for the string. There must be a hem along the top, and at the bottom of the backs. The tape to go under, to form the arm holes. A depth of about four inches will be quite enough for the body. The engraving shows where the trimming is to be placed.

This pinafore, on a larger scale, is an extremely pretty pattern for girls, of from two to six years of age. It is not so suitable for boys. For children of four years and upwards, pinafores may be made of fine holland (the light-brown sort), and trimmed with a little coloured braid and narrow fringe. They look very neat, however, without such trimming, if the outer edge be bound with fine white tape.

TO PUT IN STRINGS NEATLY.—The neat appearance of a child's dress depends much upon the way in which the strings are put in. One end should have the string drawn through it; but at the other an eyelet hole may be neatly made, half an inch from the extremity on the inside, and through that the string may be run. This should be fastened in the middle, to keep it from being pulled out. A small loop should be placed at the end of the band, and a button at the other side, which will completely secure it.

The waists, as well as the tops of frocks, should have runners: this will save much trouble.

BUTTONS.—Mother-of-pearl buttons will be best for the outer parts of children's dresses, and linen ones for the under clothes. As I hinted in No. 2, care must be taken to avoid everything hard or lumpy in the fastenings.

I have spoken of certain decorations, ornaments, &c., in the shape of trimmings, braid, inlet, &c. These are, of course, matters of taste, and may be done without. But, really, these sort of things are now so cheap, and may be so easily made at home, that few mothers will like to be without some portion of them. And though these ornamental articles may be bought, ready made, for a moderate sum, they may be made still cheaper at home; and, after all, nice crochet and knitting, which the wife or daughter can generally do, is more enduring than cheap embroidery, and quite as handsome. By employing little remnants of time, and by working while engaged in conversation with neighbours, or while watching a sleeping child, a sufficient quantity of these ornamental works can, in most families, be manufactured, at the same time that it affords a pleasant occupation. In this case, as in many others, fragments of time may be usefully employed, and every sixpence saved is a sixpence gained.

In a future number I shall be able to furnish a few plain and easy patterns of fancy stitches.

FACTS IN NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

THE BASIN OF THE ATLANTIC OCEAN.—The basin of the Atlantic Ocean is a long trough, separating the old world from the new, and extending, probably, from pole to pole. This ocean-furrow was probably scored into the solid crust of our planet by the Almighty hand, that there the waters which he called sea might be gathered together so as to let the dry land appear, and fit the earth for the habitation of man. From the top of Chimborazo to the bottom of the Atlantic, at the deepest place yet reached by the plummet in the Northern Atlantic, the distance in a vertical line is nine miles. Could the waters of the Atlantic be drawn off, so as to expose to view this great sea-gash, which separates continents, and extends from the Arctic to the Antarctic, it would present a scene the most rugged, grand, and imposing. The very ribs of the solid earth, with the foundations of the sea, would be brought to light, and we should have presented to us at one view, in the empty cradle of the ocean, "a thousand fearful wrecks, with that fearful array of dead men's skulls, great anchors, heaps of pearl and inestimable stores, which, in the poet's eye, lie scattered in the bottom of the sea, making it hideous with sights of ugly death." The deepest part of the North Atlantic is probably somewhere between the Bermudas and the Grand Banks. The waters of the Gulf of Mexico are held in a basin about a mile deep in the deepest part. There is at the bottom of the sea, between Cape Race in Newfoundland, and Cape Clear in Ireland, a remarkable steppe, which is already known as the telegraphic plateau. The great circle distance between these two shore-lines is 1,600 miles: the sea along this route is probably nowhere more than 10,000 feet deep.

COLOUR OF THE ATMOSPHERE.—The colour of the atmosphere is only apparent when we look at the sky, or at any distant mountain or forest; and a very simple experiment will explain the cause. If we take any large glass vessel, which contains a deep-coloured liquid, and have several glass tubes of different diameters, from an inch to a tenth or twentieth of an inch, and fill these tubes with liquid out of the large vessel: though we have the same liquid in all, it will be seen that the tint will gradually become more faint in proportion as the diameter of the tube is less, until, in the smallest, the liquid is clear and colourless like water. Hence, it will be observed, the intensity of the colour is in proportion to the mass; and that a very small quantity of that which in large quantities has a strong colour does not present any colour at all. This is the case with all semi-transparent substances: a small quantity cannot transmit to the eye a sufficient body of its peculiar colour to make an impression, and hence appears colourless.

NATURE OF COMETS.—M. Barbinet, of the French Institute, in the course of some remarks which he has published concerning the comet which is expected by astronomers in the year 1858, says:—"With regard to one of the questions to which this comet has given rise, I must protest against the idea that a comet possesses the power of imparting a perceptible mechanical shock. I can prove that the collision of a swallow, intent on suicide, and flying with full force against a train of one hundred carriages, drawn by ten steam-engines, would be a thousand times more dangerous for the train in question than would be the simultaneous shock of all the known comets against the earth. What is a comet? It is a visible nothing."

PHOSPHORESCENCE OF THE SEA.—Dr. Poeppig, in his voyage to Chile, saw from the topmast a dark red streak, estimated at six English miles broad; then the colour changed to the brilliant purple, and the foam at the ship's stern was roseate. The water taken up in a bucket appeared transparent; but a moderate magnifying-glass showed little red dots, consisting of infusoria of spherical form, but destitute of external organs of motion. The ship sailed for four hours through this streak, the superficies of which must have been 168 English square miles; and if we add that the infusoria may have been equally distributed in the water to the depth of six feet, their numbers surpass the conception of the human understanding.

NATURE OF THE SUN.—The most recent observations confirm the supposition that the Sun is a black, opaque body, with a luminous and incandescent atmosphere, through which the solar body is often seen in black spots, frequently of enormous dimensions. A single spot, seen with the naked eye, in the year 1843, was 77,000 miles in diameter. Sir John Herschel, in 1837, witnessed a cluster of spots including an area of 3,780,000 miles. The diameter of the sun is 770,800 geographical miles, or 112 times that of the earth; its volume is 1,407,124 times that of the earth, and 600 times that of all the planets; and its mass is 359,551 times greater than the earth's, and 738 times greater than all the planets.

Small Change.

GIVE ME THE PEOPLE.

SOME love the glow of outward show—
Some love mere wealth, and try to win it;
The house to me may lowly be,
If I but like the people in it!
What's all the gold, that glitters cold,
When link'd to hard or haughty feeling?
Whatever we're told, the nobler gold
Is truth of heart, and manly dealing!
Then let them seek, whose minds are weak,
Mere fashion's smile, and try to win it—
The house to me may lowly be,
If I but like the people in it!

A lowly roof may give us proof
That lowly flowers are often fairest;
And trees, whose bark is hard and dark,
May yield us fruit, and bloom the rarest!
There's worth as sure, 'neath garments poor,
As e'er adorned a loftier station;
And minds as just as those, we trust,
Whose claim is but of wealth's creation!
Then let them seek whose minds are weak,
Mere fashion's smile, and try to win it;
The house to me may lowly be,
If I but like the people in it!

If you would have a faithful servant, and one that you like, serve yourself.

SOME people seem as if they can never have been children, and others as if they could never be anything else.

A CHARITY SETON was once commenced by the Dean of St. Paul's as follows:—"Benevolence is a sentiment common to human natures: A never sees B in distress without wishing C to relieve him."

It has been said that a chattering little soul in a large body is like a swallow in a barn—the twitter takes up more room than the bird.

SCANDAL is what one-half the world takes great pleasure in inventing, and the other half equal pleasure in believing.

A LADY, of gentle and humane disposition, gave, in our hearing yesterday, the following cruel order:—"Katy," said she, "tell Molly to strike a match, and burn those papers, and then to beat the carpets, and singe the chickens; and then, Katy, you can whip the seams you sowed yesterday, whilst I crush the sugar, squeeze the lemons, and mash the spice; and oh, Katy! ask Jane if she bruised the orange-peel, and skinned the lemons, as I told her to."

"MARIA," said a lady to a coloured chambermaid, "that is the third silk dress you have worn since you came to me; pray, how many do you own?" "Only seven, miss; but I's saving my wages to buy another." "Seven? What use are seven silk dresses to you? Why, I don't own so many as that." "Specs not, miss," said the smiling darkey; "you doesn't need 'em so much as I does. You see you quality white folks everybody knows is quality; but we bettermost kind ob coloured pussons has to dress smart to 'stinguish ourselves from common niggers." So, critics, who denounce the present extravagant style of dress, be lenient! and when the paraphernalia of hoops and flounces, silks, velvets, and laces is very astounding, think—Well, poor things! they must do something to 'stinguish themselves from common folks.

GLUTTONY is the source of all our infirmities, and the fountain of all our diseases. As a lamp is choked by a superabundance of oil, a fire extinguished by excess of fuel, so is the natural health of the body destroyed by intemperate diet.

The following sentiment was given at a recent railroad festival in Cleveland, Ohio: "Our mothers—the only faithful tenders who never misplaced a switch."

DR. JOHNSON once dined with a Scottish lady who had hotch-potch for dinner. After the doctor had tasted it, she asked him if it was good. "It is good for hogs, ma'am," said the doctor. "Then pray," said the lady, "let me help you to some more."

WHEN Mrs. Macaulay published a pamphlet called "Loose Thoughts," several ladies who happened to be in company with Foote, reprobated the title as very improper for a woman. "Not at all, ladies; the sooner a woman gets rid of such thoughts the better!"

OUR fashionable ladies would seem to be growing smart, for it was never before so hard to get round them. They would seem, too, to be growing prudish, for they never before kept the gentlemen at so great a distance.

A BAD thing put into the mouth has been known to bring a good thing out of it. An epicure, eating oysters, swallowed one that was not fresh. "Zounds, waiter!" he ejaculated, with a wry face, "what sort of an oyster do you call this?" "A native, sir," replied the wielder of the knife. "A native!—I call it a settler, so you need not open any more."

CONS. If a person were looking at a conflagration, by the names of what three great British writers could he express his emotions? Dickens, How-itt, Burns.—The name of what class of persons in Rome might a bear be supposed to say when he was licking his paws after having eaten a little girl? Gladiator.—Glad-I-ate-her.

A SECRET is like silence—you cannot talk about it and keep it. It is like money—when once you know there is any concealed, it is half discovered.

It is a rule of the inhabitants of certain islands not to allow a young man to get married till he can cut a sponge at a depth of forty feet. We do not think a man is fit to be married till he can cut a sponge no matter at what distance.

PEOPLE are now too diffident by nature, but we know a great many who throw overboard a portion of their modesty, and take in an additional cargo of impudence at every port they touch at in the voyage of life.

INSANITY seems catching. An extraordinary number of persons have recently, like the money market, gone deranged.

"FRANK, where have you been? You are in a perfect glow." "I've been playing at an old game—chasing a hoop in Chestnut-street."

"GOOD-MORNING, Jones, how does the world use you?" "It uses me up, thank you."

An old lady of our acquaintance believes every calamity that happens to herself a trial, and every one that happens to her friends a judgment.

AN Irish cook, when told by her mistress to dress a sweetbread in drawn butter, brought up a most detestable-looking mess. When asked what it was, she replied: "Sure, it's the swate bread I took off the closet-shelf." The mistress remembered a loaf deposited there, and said so. "Well, mum, I tasted all the bread in the house, and not a bit was swate barrin' that lump; and didn't I mash it all up, and dhrav the butter all around before I put it on, just as ye told me? though meself couldn't see the sinse of dirtying up the victuals in that way."

(a) If Q B to K Kt 5, Black might play Q takes B, followed by K B to R 3 with an even game.—(b) Better, perhaps, than Q to Q 4, e.g.:

16. Q to Q 4 17. R takes Q 18. R to Q 2
19. Q takes Q 20. B to K Kt 2 21. Kt takes Q R P
And although White has the better position, there is as yet, nothing decisive in the game. The move adopted by White leaves him a fine attacking game after his 19th move.

Solution of Problem No. 4.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. R to Q Kt 4 (ch)	1. P takes R
2. R to K 5	2. Any move
3. Mates accordingly

S. P.—Had Black taken Q with R in Problem No. 241, White would have mated next move.

H. MAYO.—White had an excellent opportunity of retrieving his game after Black's 24th move, by playing Kt to Q Kt 6, followed by B to Q R 4. Again, at Black's 29th move, surely the quickest road to victory was R to Q 7. The game is not sufficiently interesting for publication.

E. GRANT.—Problems Nos. 2, 3, and 4, are creditable as first attempts, but considerably below our standard. Problem No. 1 cannot be solved in five moves. Black at his fourth move can escape by playing K to K Kt 5.

MARKMONT (Clifton).—The game of draughts will not in the slightest degree assist you in learning chess.

A LADY WHO IS ANXIOUS TO LEARN THE GAME OF CHESS.—We could refer to numerous chess players who have acquired a knowledge of the game without the aid of any assistance beyond that derivable from books.

—We beg to inform our Chess contributors that on their favouring us with a postage stamp, forms on which their Problems can be submitted, will be forwarded to them.

* Owing to the great increase in the number of our Chess correspondents, it is sometimes difficult to find room for answers to their communications, but they may rest assured that each will receive attention in due course.

Our Editorial Table.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.—The second volume of "Cassell's Illustrated History of England," by W. Howitt, is now ready, price 6s.

ADOLESCENTS ASPIRANTS.—The course of study varies so much at different universities, that you should apply to a member of the one at which you are going to study for advice as to books, &c.

PERSEVERANTIA must use only a very small quantity of sulphuric acid in preparing the skeletons of leaves, or he will find the framework very imperfectly preserved.

ANXIOUS.—We think games depending entirely on chance occasion a sad waste of time, and are, therefore, best avoided. As old Heath says:—

"Some play for gain; to pass time, others play
For nothing; both do play the fool, I say;
Nor time or coin I'll lose, or idly spend;
Who gets by play, proves loser in the end."

LONGTON.—Mr. Smith may have been quite correct in both his assertions, which do not necessarily imply a contradiction. Tears may relieve the heart, and under some circumstances there is no doubt they have that effect. But, nevertheless, there are times when it would be worse than weak to sit down and weep. When action is demanded we should moderate our grief.

TIMID.—The rules in almost all arithmetic books are given in the same or nearly the same way. Proficiency depends upon the amount of study bestowed on the subject.

RICHARD III. wants to know whether an author who writes plays, "puts down every particular movement of each character." If he did, we fancy he would have to give two hundred pages of stage directions to each separate page of text. We have, however, seen a play in which, at a particularly interesting part, the heroine is directed to blush. How she is to manage it does not appear. The second question, "Where is the best place to sell comedies?" we are really at a loss to answer. If Richard has any to dispose of we should advise him to look to the spelling, which is very defective in his letter.

MERRIOTT.—Some derive the word Sepoy from Sip, a bow and arrow; others, from Sipahi, or Spahi, a soldier.

BLUE COAT.—Specimen No. 3 is the best.

WALTER WILLIAMS should apply to a saddler for the information he wants. He writes a very good letter, and seems to be a most intelligent man.

JAMES T. writes us a quiet, sensible letter, and is evidently in earnest when he asks for advice. He has been bred to a mechanical employment, but recent inventions have taken away the demand for the article he produced. He, therefore, wishes, very properly, to change his occupation before the bread has been entirely taken out of his mouth; and having between £100 and £200 to receive, looks towards Canada. He has a good constitution, and seems a steady, self-reliant man. He evidently hopes to succeed in Canada, but tells us regretfully that he has had no experience in farming. Never mind that, James T. We know, as a fact, that the three most successful tenant farmers on a nobleman's estate are retired tradesmen. Keep your eyes open, and see and judge for yourself. One year of close observation may give you more agricultural knowledge than an idle fellow would obtain in dawdling through a seven years' apprenticeship.

E. H. B. W. asks us two questions. Taken separately, these would mean nothing, but occurring in combination they look suspicious. First, E. H. W. B. asks the minimum height for drivers in the Artillery, "as he is anxious to join them;" and then he asks if a master has a right to prevent an apprentice from joining quadrille parties, "provided he is in to his time." It seems to us that E. H. B. W., discontented at some restrictions put upon him by his master, probably with the best intentions, wants to run away. If so, we beg him to consider that it is his duty to obey his master while there is a bond between them. Perhaps in later years he will be thankful to his employer for what appears to him now as harshness.

JEHU complains sadly both of the London cabmen and the provincial fly drivers; he suggests the application of a kind of pedometer as a remedy for extortion, but this expedient has been tried without success. After all, if you are firm with cabby you will not find him such a very formidable fellow; and if there should be a doubt about an extra sixpence, give him the benefit of it. The chances are ten to one that you are richer than he.

X. Y. Z.—The Volumes of the old series of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER are on hand; cloth boards, price 7s. 6d.

DON.—Three or four years' experience in a solicitor's office would not entitle you to become a lawyer. There are sundry little expenses; among others, £120 for the stamp for your indentures.

INDIA.—We cannot better answer your question as to the theory of annexation, than by reminding you that—

The nations, to the present hour,
Preserve the good old plan,
That those shall take who have the power,
And they shall keep who can.

GALUS.—We really think our correspondent ought to advertise in the papers offering a reward to any one who will find his temper for him, he having evidently lost it most completely. He asks us a question which has been answered a dozen times, and becomes very rude because he does not get an answer at once. We think he had better take a week or two to cool.

W. F. Q.—We know of no institution that has advertised to take a child under its care, on condition of a million postage stamps being sent. A million cancelled stamps would be worth nothing; a million uncanceled stamps would cost £4,166 13s. 4d. Neither do we know who has ever offered an immense reward for the discovery of perpetual motion.

LOVAT.—We decline giving you any advice, unless it be to consult a skilful surgeon.

HANNIBAL.—The Carthaginians certainly had a bad name for treachery in times of old; but we must remember that the accounts we have of them were "edited" by the Romans, their enemies from age to age. The cause of the decline of Carthage was, firstly, general neglect of their maritime defences; and secondly, internal dissension.

T. C.—The circumstance you tell was related by Mr. Thackeray in one of his lectures. He came as a child from India, and the ship touched at Saint Helena. A native servant took the little boy for a walk into the interior of the island. In a garden they saw a stout man walking to and fro. "That is he," said the native, eagerly pointing to the stranger—"that is Bonaparte. He eats three sheep every day, and as many children as he can get hold of." The opinion in England respecting the Corsican monster, was not unlike that expressed by the black servant.

EVALINE CLIFFORD.—The list of applicants for the government free passage to Australia is so large that we are afraid you would have to wait a considerable time before your request, if entertained at all, was fulfilled. The expense of the passage varies according to the accommodation required, from £20 to £50. Besides this, there is an outfit necessary.

A CONSTANT ADMIRER.—The Emperor Louis Napoleon is the third son of Louis, ex-king of Holland.

BILHOOF.—The observations we made on the letter sent by "Marion and Frances" will apply also to "Bilhoof's" communication. We think, moreover, that if our correspondent has lived for fifty-nine years without marrying, the want of a wife must have sat lightly upon him.

NEWSAGENT.—Apply to Kent and Co., 51, Paternoster-row, for parts and numbers.

LOCAL AGENT.—You are not eligible as a candidate for a tidewater's berth after the age of twenty-five. Formerly the maximum age was thirty.

AN AMATEUR CHEMIST.—We would rather not tell our correspondent how to make gunpowder, as we should not like to have a shattered hand or a ruined eye ascribed to our teaching. We really hope the "Amateur Chemist" will be careful in dealing with explosive mixtures.

J. H. is thanked for the verses he sent. They are good, but not suited to the FAMILY PAPER.

A. B. C.—We cannot furnish the information.

ULRICK CRAWFORD.—We would recommend you to follow your mother's advice.

ONE INTENDING TO EMIGRATE would be more likely to succeed in America than Australia; but, in either place, he must expect hard work. Gardening is a trade.

DUMAS should apply to a foreign bookseller.

QUADROONA.—An operation is sometimes attempted for the cure of squinting; but it is liable to fail, and the eyesight is not unfrequently endangered. It is rather injudicious to attempt the operation unless it is recommended and performed by a very first-rate oculist.

ANXIOUS is an artist, and evidently an educated man. He wishes to help in avenging the atrocities perpetrated by the Sepoys in India, and rather than not go, would enlist in a cavalry regiment. All very laudable; but we think "Anxious" should have carried his intention into effect at least a couple of months ago. By the time he can get to India we confidently trust the mutiny will have been both suppressed and avenged. The idea of raising a volunteer corps has been definitely given up. Recruits are so plentiful, that numbers are turned away every day.

CHEMISTS.—Please repeat your question.

ONE IN DOUBT.—The decanters should be placed on the table before the host. The other question we can't answer.

SHEPPARD.—You have no chance of obtaining such a situation without interest with one of the contractors or directors of the company under whom you wish to take service.

R. P. M.—The incident illustrated by our engraving forms the subject of one of Phædrus' fables. A similar circumstance is related of Diogenes the Cynic.

GARRULOUS (who has, by-the-by, adopted a very appropriate signature) must excuse us for saying that his letter, with its many compliments and its very trivial question, reminds us of the Spanish Hidalgo's dinner, which consisted of a very little meat, but a great deal of tablecloth.

W. B. (Exeter).—Your application should have been made to the Secretary of the Board of Works.

A MEMBER OF THE TRY CLUB has accused us of neglect "very unjustly." The inquiry about the colours used for painting slides for magic lanterns has been answered several times, and especially in No. 205.

THOMAS.—The Campus Martius was a large plain at Rome dedicated to Mars, where the Roman youths were taught to wrestle, box, hurl the javelin, &c.

ALFRED.—In your present position of age and circumstances, we should think you little better than insane to marry. How in the world is an attorney's clerk of nineteen to support a wife and family?

BRUNETTE.—Reconciliations should be entire, otherwise the word is a mockery. To tease and torment a penitent lover with a show of displeasure that is not felt, and the full consequences of which the tormentor would not hazard, is a pettiness only worthy of a spoiled child. We think, however, "Brunette's" amiability is little likely to be tried, the truant lover of such a disposition, once free, not being very likely to resume his bonds voluntarily.

RICHARD SISSON.—The lady is only acting with proper decorum, for which you ought to value and respect, instead of upbraiding her. If you are satisfied of her love, as you say you are, wait until after marriage for a more vehement demonstration of it.

N. J. B.—It is impossible for us to supply you with all the information you ask, without sacrificing scores of inquiries from other correspondents. It would take up too much space to teach you how to bind books, even supposing it possible to teach that art by a description of the process. What you want is practical instruction; somebody to tell you how to procure your tools, and how to use them when procured. We cannot undertake that office.

AGNES asks what she should think of a young man who, after asking her for her company, is constantly sending some excuse or other, instead of meeting her. Think? why, that she had better occupy her time in some other way than in wasting it upon such a recreant.

JULIA NORMAN wants something to make her arms white. Flour them as cooks do geese.

A QUERIST.—There is no law which demands the presentation of gifts to a bride, on the part of her sisters-in-law. The custom, however, is a kindly one, and generally observed. The same remark applies to the second question asked.

PERR.—Young ladies who, without any encouragement, "manage to get madly in love" with gentlemen, who only notice to ridicule them, must, if the object of their indiscreet affections discover their folly, expect to be somewhat less respectfully treated than their neighbours. By your own account, you have no right to be jealous of any one. The gentleman is free to pay attention where he chooses, and if, during existing circumstances, he likes to be civil to your handsome sister, and she does not object, you certainly have no title to do so.

BEDFORD.—The phrase should be "I had previously accepted," not I have.

BLUE TRE.—You must be a very fascinating fellow thus to bewitch young ladies into such a disregard of propriety and decorum. How to help you we really don't know; you would not like to part with any of the attractions which make you so irresistible, and unless you do, we fear there is no safety for you. Honey jars will be beset by flies.

A CORRESPONDENT wishes us to furnish him with a receipt for water gliding, but we can assure him that the process is both difficult and expensive, and at the same time detrimental to health. No written description, without being exceedingly long and minute, could give you an idea of the process, and we really have not space for such a purpose.

J. C. GREVILLE.—We decline your verses with thanks, feeling sure that the sentiment—

"We all are apes from first to last," would find few admirers, and is certainly devoid of truth.

THE BUTCHER. If he wants to purchase a commission, had best apply to an army agent; if he wants to get a commission gratis, we think he will have to wait a weary while—always supposing he has no friends at headquarters.

BENGALÉE.—We have not space in the Editorial columns to discuss the question between the East India Company and the royal family of Oude; but we can refer you to a book just published on the subject by Mr. J. R. Taylor, of 54, Chancery-lane, and entitled "Dacoitee in Excelsis; or, the Spoilation of Oude." The author enters minutely and elaborately into the whole question; his book is evidently the result of much laborious research. Many readers of this book will be not a little startled at the histories it unfolds.

W. S. B.—We cannot undertake to find situations for our correspondents. "W. S. B.'s" common sense might have told him as much.

A. B.—In the year 1815 George IV. was Prince Regent of England. George III. was at that time an old, white-haired man in Windsor Castle, sitting alone, "a solemn mark of the frailty of human greatness," with darkened eyes, and darkened mind. St. Helena is correctly pronounced with the accent on the first syllable.

IGNORAMUS.—The signs placed over each division of the 19th Psalm are letters of the Hebrew alphabet, aleph, beth, &c. They are used to divide the long Psalm into portions, as we in English might divide a long argument or demonstration by using the letters A, B, &c.

LOYOLA'S poem, "Temple Bar," is decidedly not up to our mark. When "Loyola" sends us a production a little more correctly spelt, we shall be glad to give him an opinion thereupon.

MARION AND FRANCES seem to suppose we keep a matrimonial agency office. We cannot open our pages to such folly as that contained in their letter to us.

DJALMA.—There can be no impropriety in offering your escort to the ladies in question. As to the other query, we would strongly advise you to remain in your present employment. Matters abroad are not in such a state as to invite a change on the part of any one already tolerably placed here.

FLORETTA.—Never heed what other people tell you. If the sailor really loves you, he will tell you so himself; and until he does, you should neither suffer your thoughts to dwell upon him, nor encourage your companions in talking nonsense to you on the subject.

AMY RETTOR.—The word is pronounced as written, not as if taken from the French. We cannot venture an opinion as to the cause of the ladies mentioned being proverbially distinguished by the epithet you quote. We must also beg to decline answering the personal inquiries made in your letter.

R. S. D.—Your property is liable to the tax, nor can you justly complain, as the amount has been paid in improving the property in question.

A. B. C.—Undoubtedly illness is not a sufficient ground for abatement of wages, unless a provision to that effect was inserted in the apprenticeship indentures.

ZENOBI.—We should say fifty or sixty pounds would be about the premium required. The firms are, of course, included in the ordinary Directories.

ARTIST.—The frescoes to which you allude were painted by order of the celebrated Council of Basle, in commemoration of the fearful plague, which during the years 1431-3 raged in that city. They are called "The Dance of Death," and represent Death showing himself to persons of all ages and conditions, and their frantic struggles to escape his bony clutch. The series goes through various phases of horror, and ends with the Day of Judgment. The originals were placed in the churchyard of the Dominicans, where they remained until about forty years since, when a mob broke into the inclosure of the convent, and tore them from the walls. Copies of the frescoes had, however, been taken, and were to be found in many places—on the bridges in Germany and Switzerland, on church windows, in cloisters, and every place where such a subject was admissible. There was one in the cloister of old St. Paul's in London, but destroyed by the Protector Somerset, when he pulled down the chapel for the sake of the building materials, which he wanted for the erection of his palace in the Strand.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TABLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

Muse not that I thus suddenly proceed;
For what I will, I will, and there's an end.

SHAKESPEARE.

We once heard a very respectable widow lady, who had been thrice married, declare, in a little wholesome advice to her niece, who was on the eve of bestowing her hand upon an exceedingly worthy fellow of our acquaintance, that after an established recognised grievance, or a handsome income settled on herself, the next best advantage a wife could obtain was a cue to her husband's character—a key to unlock the innermost recesses of his heart, and deliver his secretly-cherished weaknesses and failings, bound hand and foot like so many helpless captives, to her discretion.

"Not that any right-minded woman," she judiciously added, perceiving that we had laid aside our book and were listening to her lecture, "would ever think of abusing her knowledge of them; certainly not, my love; still it is advisable to obtain it, on the same principle that an experienced general takes up a strong position in front of an ally whose intentions he is doubtful of."

That same day we came to a conclusion—mentally, of course—never to place our affections upon any girl, be she ever so fair, who had a widowed aunt in her family, and have adhered to it ever since.

We know not whether Lady Boothroyd had been blessed with one of these experienced advisers, or if the intuitive perceptions of her sex led her, by a course of natural logic, to the same conclusions; but certain it is she practised the lesson just recited as successfully as if it had been inculcated in her girlhood's years. Her husband's weakness—unmanly fear for his personal safety—was cleverly acted on. Fletcher declared that he had seen and fired at a man concealed in the branches of the great elm directly opposite his master's chamber window; but before he could load again, the villain escaped.

Cowardice is proverbially credulous. How could Sir Norman do otherwise than believe him? Had he not heard the report of the gun himself?

Her ladyship's maid next gave notice to quit. The room she slept in fronted the park, and her nerves were delicate.

"The wretches!" exclaimed the chicken-hearted baronet. "I'll let the place; they are unworthy of having a resident landlord amongst them."

The inhabitants of St. Faith's were pretty much of the same opinion.

This was exactly what the artful woman required. It confirmed her husband in the resolution of quitting Meldown, which the raillery of Squire Blundell had somewhat shaken. She had long detested the country; it presented too narrow a field for talents such as hers: London was their natural sphere; there they might find scope.

ROSE RAYNER DEFEATED IN HER STRUGGLE WITH LADY BOOTHROYD.

Orders were given to prepare for their departure.

A day or two before quitting the hall her ladyship announced her intention of taking a walk through the village. Sir Norman heard it with astonishment.

"What!" he exclaimed; "trust yourself in that den of poachers, assassins, and monsters!"

"I have no fear," replied his wife. "They entertain no feeling of animosity against me; it is your blood they thirst for."

"Miscreants!" ejaculated the baronet, with a shudder.

"Besides," added the lady, "we must not let them triumph in the idea of having driven or frightened us out of the place."

"Certainly not!" exclaimed the gentleman, emphatically. "Driven!" he repeated. "Who ever heard of a Boothroyd being driven! and as for fear, I trust that no ridiculously erroneous impression will be entertained respecting my motives in leaving Meldown."

His wife smiled.

"It is to spare the misguided wretches the perpetration of a horrible, unheard-of crime," continued the speaker, "that I consent to it. To show how little personal consideration has anything to do with it," he added, "I would willingly accompany you, but Dr. Phrase has insisted on my keeping my room."

"I require no escort," answered her ladyship, who had her own motives for going alone; "and repeat that I have nothing to dread: my terrors are for you."

As the speaker quitted the apartment, Sir Norman mentally asked himself whether it was the unsettled amount of his wife's jointure which caused this unusual anxiety. And if not that, what other motive could possibly have led to it; for even his vanity was not sufficiently egregious to attribute it to love—a dream from which they had both long since awakened.

Lady Boothroyd's first visit was to the cottage of the weaver. She wished to judge with her own eyes whether the hints of the old steward arose from vague surmises, the whisperings of a startled conscience, or were founded on any positive resemblance between the orphan Lillian and the unfortunate Allan. Not that the result in either case would affect her plans; which were founded on certain principles, or rather the absence of all principle—her evil passions and the ambitious views she entertained for the future establishment of the fair and innocent Alice.

As we before observed, the lady of the manor was rather popular, than otherwise, with the inhabitants of St. Faith's. They looked upon her as a meek-spirited creature, completely crushed by the iron temper of her husband. If ever any little act of kindness was vouchsafed to the poorer cotters or tenants, it was invariably attributed to her entreaties; and, by the same rule, every harsh step placed to the account of Sir Norman. In fact, so general was this impression, that even the servants were frequently heard to declare that things would be far different if their mistress had her way. The artful woman had evidently studied Pope to advantage; her married life being a practical commentary on his advice—

"And if she rules, she never shows she rules."

We question if Machiavelli ever crowded so much mischief in so few words. How well did the poet know the weakness of his own sex. How ready we are to sacrifice the substance for the shadow; to yield, whenever we find an excuse for yielding.

"Never shows she rules." It is the gilding of the pill; the cheat which induces the overgrown baby of a husband to open his mouth and fancy it a sugar-plum.

Although Simon Gee and his industrious little wife both possessed a very proper spirit of independence, yet, somehow, they felt flattered at the honour of a visit from the lady of the manor. The weaver rose from his loom on her entrance, doffed his red worsted nightcap, and smoothed down his scanty locks of gray hair; whilst Hester, very unnecessarily, every article of furniture in the cottage being scrupulously clean, dusted the seat of the great arm-chair with her apron before presenting it to her visitor.

"I did not call upon you sooner, my good friends," said her ladyship, speaking in her habitually mild accents, "feeling that in the first moments of sorrow such as yours, even kindness might appear obtrusive."

"Oh! my lady," answered Hester, with a curtsy, "we all know that it is not your fault: not a creature in the parish blames you for what has occurred."

"I am happy to hear it," was the reply. "Of course neither Sir Norman nor myself can permit the child to become a burden to you."

"She is no burden, my lady," exclaimed Simon Gee.

"That she isn't, heaven bless her!" added his wife.

"At least you will permit me to contribute towards—"

"Not a penny," interrupted the weaver, without waiting, as he generally did, for his wife's opinion, or even to consult it by one of those little telegraphic looks, so well understood in married life; "I would rather work my fingers to the bone, than the child of my poor murdered brother—for he was murdered, my lady—should be beholden to Sir Norman for bread."

"And so would I," added his better half, emphatically.

"But surely from my hand the same objection cannot exist," observed their visitor. "I comprehend your honest pride, and respect it. We will speak further on the subject on my return from town. At present, I merely came to see your niece."

"Certainly, my lady," said Hester; "and many, many thanks for your kindness. Lilly is at Farmer Minter's, playing with his children: it be lonely for her here. Simon shall run and fetch her."

Her husband, without exactly knowing why, donned his cap with a feeling of reluctance, and rose to depart, saying he would back in a few minutes.

We have no great faith in presentiments—that is to say, in preternatural ones—or we might imagine it a warning that he was about to present the helpless innocent to her most bitter enemy.

As a matter of course, such an idea never entered the head of simple, honest Simon. Why should it? Lady Boothroyd's mask required keener eyes than his to penetrate it.

When the heart is full, it is astonishing how loquacious the tongue becomes. Hester no sooner found herself alone with her visitor than she broke forth into praises of Lilly, describing her beauty, which was really remarkable, and her winning, affectionate ways.

"One might take her for the child of real born gentlefolks," she said, "instead of poor Barny's daughter, she is so pretty and genteel; such beautiful black curling hair, just like Miss Alice; and eyes—well, I do declare if her eyes are not the same colour as Miss Alice's, too! How singular, isn't it, my lady?"

"Probably her mother was an Indian woman," observed the mistress of Meldown Park, greatly annoyed, "and they are invariably dark."

"No doubt, my lady," replied the simple-minded woman, her ideas at once directed into another channel; "it must be so. Lilly speaks but very little English, and has such an odd way of pointing to anything she wants, just as if she had been used to servants to wait on her."

Although in some degree prepared for the resemblance to her husband's family, Lady Boothroyd could scarcely suppress an exclamation of surprise when Simon Gee returned to the cottage, leading the orphan by the hand.

The likeness to the portrait of Allan was most striking, and she mentally resolved the canvas should be removed or destroyed, blaming herself that it had not been done before.

Instead of appearing bashful and overawed at the sight of a strange lady richly dressed, the child walked fearlessly up to her, looked earnestly in her face, and uttered a few words in Hindostani; then, seeing she was not understood, turned sadly away.

"You must speak English, my love," whispered her aunt.

Lilly shook her head; she did not care about speaking English.

"She is indeed a sweet little creature," observed their visitor, who had her own reasons for not wishing the object of her fears and hatred to be questioned too much, "and I feel deeply interested in her."

These words were accompanied by a kiss which, to the vexation of Hester, was coldly received. She could not understand it; the child returned her kisses warmly enough.

Not being a mother, the kind-hearted woman never once imagined that children can generally tell when the marks of affection lavished on them are real or affected.

"Do speak to the lady," said the weaver, coaxingly.

The child raised her large lustrous eyes till they met his, and then she smiled.

"Did she love mamma?" she asked.

"This is Lady Boothroyd," exclaimed Hester, secretly vexed; "a very great and rich lady, who never saw your mother. Pray excuse her, your ladyship; she is so young."

At the name of Boothroyd, Lillian looked as if she were trying to recollect something. Just as she was about to speak again, the visitor rose to depart.

"On my return from London," she said, "I trust to hit on some means by which to benefit your niece without wounding your feelings. Feelings," she added, with a sigh, "which I can too well understand. I need not bid you be kind to your niece, for I perceive that she has already wound herself around your hearts."

Once more kissing the intended victim of her treachery, the evil-minded woman quitted the cottage.

"That's a good lady, if ever there was one!" exclaimed Simon Gee, as he watched her departure from the window. "She is going to Mark Rayner's—on some kind errand, I'll warrant."

"No doubt," repeated Hester; "his wife was always a great favourite with her ladyship. Mark, by all accounts," she added, "is not as steady as he should be, and the neighbours do say, that he will be obliged to give up the cottage and land to Sir Norman. He is fonder of his gun than the plough."

"Sorry to hear it," said the weaver, resuming his seat at the loom, "for there be worse men in the world than poor Mark, though he be a sort of ne'er-do-well."

The subject of these commentaries was a tall, strapping, good-looking young fellow, the very model of an English yeoman, who two years previously had married one of the prettiest girls in St. Faith's. The prudent ones all wondered how Rose Mayfly, the best scholar in the village school, who had a hundred pounds left by her grandfather in the bank at Exeter, should throw herself away on such a man. And yet there was nothing positively bad against him, beyond the fact of his being an idler, that is to say, an idler after his own fashion; for although he detested labour on his own account, he was ever ready to assist a friend at his work, and thought nothing of walking twenty or even thirty miles in a day, provided he carried a gun. Sporting had grown a passion with him, and the consequence was that more than one awkward affair had taken place between himself and the keepers.

Like most of the tenants on the Meldown estate, Mark Rayner, thanks to the liberality of the last baronet, held his cottage and two or three fields on very easy terms. Perhaps their very easiness had been the principal cause of his idleness; for whenever his wife ventured gently to remind him of the necessity of attending more to the crops, or alluded to the rent, he invariably answered that one good year would set all to rights, and Rose, woman-like, believed him.

Since New Year's eve a decided change had taken place in the conduct of her husband. He rose early, worked all day, and seemed earnestly bent on retrieving his past folly; yet, strange to say, the improvement so long and ardently desired did not bring unmitigated satisfaction to his wife, for he not only appeared fitful and moody, but had grown restless at night, and muttered strange words in his dreams—words that caused her cheeks to turn pale, and her heart to beat with terror.

"I have called to see you, Rose, before quitting the hall," said Lady Boothroyd, as she entered the cottage; "for you are aware that I take an interest in your welfare. Sit down: you seem uneasy. I guess the cause."

"The cause!" faltered the startled wife.

"Yes," answered her ladyship. "I heard the steward tell Sir Norman that your husband had not paid his last half-year's rent, and now another term is all but due. Silas is no friend to Mark: but do not make yourself unhappy. I came to—"

"O! thank you, my lady,—a thousand times!" interrupted Rose, with the air of a person suddenly relieved from an oppressive fear. "The money will be paid in time."

"From your portion?" observed the artful woman: "I thought that had been squandered long since."

"From my husband's labour," replied the woman, proudly. "He now works as hard as any one in the place; he is in his fields early and late."

"Since when?"

"Since—O, for a long time now, my lady!" answered Rose, confusedly.

"I am happy to hear it," said the mistress of Meldown Park; "for I had heard a far different tale, and a sad one. They told me, not only that the money left by your grandfather was spent, but that you had parted with many things you never ought to have parted with; amongst others, the Bible I presented you with when you quitted the school."

"They told you falsely—very falsely, then!" exclaimed the unsuspecting woman, eagerly. "Who could have been so cruel? Believe me, I have done nothing of the kind."

An incredulous smile appeared on the features of her visitor.

"I can convince you, my lady," added the speaker, joyfully, at the same time going to an old-fashioned chest of drawers, and producing the sacred volume. "Here it is."

She placed it on the table with a triumphant air. Lady Boothroyd opened it at the title-page. As she expected, part of the opposite one, on which she had written her name at the date of presenting it, had been torn out. All that remained of the writing was—

"Given to Rose Mayfly, as a reward for good conduct."

The rest was wanting.

"Who could have been so cruel?" exclaimed Rose, deeply mortified when she saw the mutilated leaf.

"Shall I tell you?" replied her ladyship, fixing her keen gray eyes upon the countenance of the unsuspecting wife, to watch the effect of her words. "Your husband."

"Mark! Oh, my lady, what should he tear it out for?"

"To load his gun with on New Year's eve," answered her ladyship, deliberately, "the night that Springthorp was murdered."

The speaker, who had acted throughout with the skill and tact of an experienced detective, drew from her note-case the blood-stained, half burnt fragment of paper, and compared it with the mutilated leaf in the Bible. There could not be a doubt that it had formed a part of the same page. The words, "by Lady Boothroyd," completed the inscription. The evidence was perfect.

"I am exceedingly sorry for you," she continued. "Mark is the murderer of the unfortunate keeper, and this the terrible proof of his guilt."

For several moments the unhappy woman stood, like one stunned by some unexpected blow, confused and only half comprehending her misery; but when its full extent became apparent—when she felt that the life of the man she so devotedly loved was forfeited, a cry of agony escaped her, and, falling on her knees, she grasped the dress of her visitor.

"Spare him, my lady!" she exclaimed, half choking with her terror; "spare him, in the name of Him whose mercy the best of us must one day ask. He did not do it designedly—he could not, for cruelty is abhorrent to his nature. Ask whom you will, there is not a neighbour in St. Faith's to speak an ill word against poor Mark: he is my husband—we have been only two years married, and I love him. Oh, yes, with all his faults, I love him dearly, for I know his heart. Spare him, and I will bless you night and day, pray for you and yours, be your slave. Oh, trample on me, crush me, kill me, do anything you please!"

These words, the promptings of nature's eloquence, broken by sighs and tears, produced one effect upon the hearer. If they failed to touch her heart, they at least convinced her that to screen her husband Rose would consent to any act, however desperate.

"It is a serious thing," she said, "to conceal a murder."

"But this is no murder," sobbed the wretched wife, wringing her hands. "It must have been accident."

"The coroner and jury have pronounced it one," added her ladyship, with cold deliberation, "and if once Sir Norman obtains this proof in his hands—"

"But he will not obtain it," interrupted Rose, renewing her supplications. "Give me that fatal paper. A life, a human life, depends upon it. You are a rich and noble lady," she added, "I am poor and very humble. What good will it do you to bring poor Mark to justice? It can't restore the dead, but it will condemn me to shame, to years of misery so sad and hopeless that death compared with it were mercy."

"I cannot part with this paper," observed her visitor, at the same time replacing it in her note-case, which she returned to her pocket, a precaution not altogether unnecessary, for Rose, in her desperation, looked very much as if she felt inclined to take it from her by force.

"On one condition I may feel disposed to give it up to you, or, rather, to your husband," continued the speaker.

"Condition—name it! That we give up the cottage and fields? Willingly! anything, only speak, my lady, and release my breaking heart."

"Send Mark to the hall, and he shall learn it," answered the mistress of Meldown Park, at the same time rising to depart. "He can easily invent an excuse for requesting to see me. The arrears of rent—my intercession with Sir Norman; anything will do."

Rose saw her intention of quitting the cottage, and instinctively placed herself between the speaker and the door. She had no definite purpose in doing so; terror prompted her.

"Would you dare to offer violence?" said Lady Boothroyd, drawing herself up with dignity.

"Violence!" repeated the half frantic woman. "Such a thought never entered my heart, till you suggested it. But I shall go mad, unless you leave me that fatal paper. We will do all you wish; indeed, we will be humble and submissive. Do not drive me to despair!"

"Girl!"

"I am no longer a girl, but a wife," interrupted Rose, strong in a wife's love. "I must have that paper; it is mine, and I will have it. Oh, my lady," she added, once more casting herself at her feet; "have some compassion on my tears and agony. Do not tempt me to forget the respect I owe you for your past kindness, the difference of our stations. As you are human, listen to my prayers."

"I hear you," observed her visitor, scornfully.

"I will bind myself in any oath you please, and Mark shall do the same, to perform your bidding. You know that I am truthful. You are a wife yourself; only imagine what I shall endure till that dreadful evidence is destroyed. Sleep will not visit me, peace be a stranger to my mind, fear follow my footsteps like their shadow; in every sound that approaches my cottage door I shall imagine I hear the voices of those who come to drag my husband to justice—to the scaffold! O God! I see him there. Mercy! mercy! give him time to repent, for his soul's sake, and mine."

Although these touching entreaties produced no effect upon the heart of the cold and haughty woman, the despair of the suppliant began to alarm her for her own personal safety.

"Rose," she said, in a milder tone, "can you not trust to me?"

"Trust you," repeated the excited creature, "with the power of dragging Mark from his home to a prison—of sending him to death! What wife would trust an angel with such a power? Even in her own hands—a secret locked in her heart—it must be a terror to herself," she added. "The paper—I must have that paper!"

"Never!"

Rose sprang towards her and a protracted struggle ensued: the fingers of Lady Boothroyd became twisted in the luxuriant hair of her assailant, which she tore up by the roots, whilst her nails committed fearful ravages on her neck and face. The woman never once retaliated, although she easily might have done so: for conscience whispered she was acting wrongly. All her endeavours were to obtain the fatal proofs of her husband's crime.

It is difficult to say how the contest might have ended but for the appearance of a third party, Sillex, the steward, who in passing by the cottage heard the cries of her ladyship for assistance. Although an old, he was still a powerful man—all bone and sinew—with nerves like cordage—and a hand of iron. To release his mistress from the frantic grasp of Rose was the work of an instant.

"Well," he exclaimed, with a grin that displayed his shark-like teeth, "things are improving in St. Faith's! Are you hurt, my lady?"

"Not much," replied his mistress, coolly arranging her disordered dress. "Don't harm her," she added; "she must be mad, for she is not naturally vicious. I am sorry for her."

The unhappy wife, who still lay sobbing in the corner of the cottage, where the strong arm of Sillex had dashed her, caught eagerly at the words, and still more at the tone in which they were uttered. Both seemed to imply a hope.

"Forgive me!" she murmured. "Oh, forgive me!"

"Forgive you, hussy!" repeated the steward, shaking her roughly by the arm. "You must have more than the usual effrontery of your sex to expect or ask such a thing. Forgive you, indeed! A pretty example to the rest of the village. Shall I send for the constables?" he added.

"Do nothing of the kind," replied her ladyship, hastily. "It is my particular desire that you keep strict silence on what has taken place. Rose," she continued, "my intentions in your favour are unchanged: neither your ingratitude nor violence have altered them. Send Mark to the hall the instant he arrives."

"Trample on me—kill me!" exclaimed the still trembling wife, her heart overflowing with gratitude at such unhelped-for mercy. "I am unworthy of pardon."

"I should think so," muttered the old man, spitefully.

"When you can pardon yourself, Rose," observed Lady Boothroyd, with an air of dignified benevolence which none knew better how to assume than herself, "you may ask mine."

With these words she quitted the cottage, accompanied by Mr. Sillex, who was not in the slightest degree the dupe of her affected generosity, although he secretly wondered, perhaps, at the motives which could induce her to forego her naturally vindictive feelings.

Both walked through the village in silence—the lady erect and stately, as if returning from some visit of charity and mercy, and the steward obsequiously following her. It was not till they had passed the lodge gates, and found themselves in the park, that he gave utterance to his thoughts.

"Your ladyship is not dealing fairly by me," he said.

"How so?"

"You have secrets which I have no share in."

"Simply because I have not had an opportunity of consulting you," answered the crafty woman.

Her companion shrugged his shoulders doubtfully.

"You may believe me," she added, "for I require your assistance."

"Then I do believe you," exclaimed Mr. Sillex, fixing his keen gray eyes upon her.

"I have discovered that Mark Rayner is the murderer of Springthorp," said Lady Boothroyd, "and, like a simpleton, allowed his wife to see the proofs in my possession, instead of at once sending for the man. You witnessed the result. In her desperation she attempted to force them from me."

"Bold, but imprudent," ejaculated her hearer, who had a peculiar habit of keeping up a kind of running commentary on all he heard.

"Now, I want to employ Mark."

"In what way?"

"Confidentially."

"Of course."

"I have seen the child."

"Allan Boothroyd's child," said the old man, with a chuckle; "and you want Mark Rayner to remove her, steal her. It will be the better way," he added, musingly, "for you can rely on him. No instruments work so well as those who do our bidding with the rope round their necks and the scaffold staring them in the face. Besides, he will have to give up his house and land, and quit the country. No one will suspect him. But you said that you required my assistance."

"It is indispensable."

"In what way?"

"You must find me some person in London," answered her ladyship, "who for money will take charge of the girl."

"And treat her kindly?"

Despite her usual hypocrisy, a deep flush suffused the countenance of the artful woman, not so much at the question, as the look that accompanied it.

"Most certainly," she answered.

Mr. Sillex chuckled, gave one of his peculiar glances, and muttered something about his being a fool for making such an unnecessary inquiry.

"At one time I could have done what you require without much difficulty," he observed; "but it is many years since I was in London, and, to deal candidly with you, I scarcely care to visit it again."

"Remember," urged the mistress of Meldown Park, "that if the child be really the daughter of Allan, and the secret of her birth should be discovered, your safety may be compromised."

"I shall be dead long before that event takes place," observed the steward, philosophically. "However, pay me well, and I will go."

"We will not quarrel on the score of money," said his mistress; "but remember, I must be repaid with the address of the person I require at once."

"You shall be."

"And when will you start?"

"The instant your ladyship furnishes me with the means—in an hour, if necessary; my preparations are easily made. But I must have the money; in transactions such as ours I give no credit."

"Money!" repeated his confederate,—"always money!"

"Do you imagine I sin for the pleasure of sinning?" demanded the old man, tartly.

"Sometimes I think you do," answered Lady Boothroyd. "You are one of the few persons whom I never yet could thoroughly comprehend. You are aged—childless, and yet continue to heap up wealth without use for it, or pleasure."

"Without pleasure!" exclaimed the steward, with a sarcastic smile. "Name me the pleasure I do not possess: a stately mansion, a fine domain, horses, equipage, a luxurious table, luscious wines, the world's respect, or that which is akin to it—its cringing homage—I grasp them all! concentrated in one essence—money—carry them in my pocket! Mine are enjoyments that neither diminish my fortune nor affect my health. My excesses leave no rapid aching of the brain; on the contrary, it never feels so light and elastic as after a debauch. The fools of the world might envy me! The motive is the same in both of us: we each prize wealth as a means to a certain end."

"But I forget myself," he added, starting like one awaking from a reverie. "It is not often that I relate my dreams."

"Follow me to the house," said her ladyship, struck by his manner, and still more by the singularity of his words, "and I will arrange for your departure at once."

"In an hour I will be there," replied the old man. "I will but leave certain directions at the home farm."

So saying he walked away.

"A very odd person," thought Lady Boothroyd, as she gazed after him. "He has been useful in his time, but I shall feel more satisfied when he is dead."

It was not the first time that a similar reflection had struck her.

CHAPTER XII.

Against the head which innocence secures,
Insidious malice aims her darts in vain,
Turned backward by the powerful breath of heaven.
DR. JOHNSON.

WHEN Mark Rayner returned to his cottage at the usual noontide hour, he was both surprised and alarmed at the state in which he found his devoted, faithful wife, who threw her arms around his neck the instant she beheld him, and wept upon his shoulder like a suffering child.

Too well did the unhappy man divine the cause of her sorrow; for since the fatal night of the keeper's death he had never known a moment's peace. Not that he felt assured his was the hand which fired the deadly shot, for several guns had been discharged on the occasion; but the dread that it was so, the uncertainty, haunted him. Hence the remorse, the sudden resolution to labour, the unwearying toil by day, the restless nights, broken by dreams, that made sweet sleep a terror.

"I never harmed poor Springthorpe willingly!" he exclaimed, when Rose had related to him the visit of Lady Boothroyd, and the discovery she had made, "and yet peace is a stranger to my heart. Why did I not listen to your entreaties," he added, with a burst of passionate regret, "and remain at home that fatal night? But Sanders was here; you recollect how he jeered me about not having a will of my own, threw petticoat government in my teeth, and—in short, I yielded, and lost happiness for life rather than encounter a sneer."

Mark's case was not an isolated one; men are frequently more easily laughed than reasoned out of what is right, and yet they designate themselves the stronger sex.

"How you must despise and hate me," he murmured, without venturing to raise his eyes to those of the woman whose peace of mind he had so cruelly trifled with, whose heart he had disappointed.

The kiss which her pale lips imprinted on his brow, was not only the seal of her forgiveness, but the pledge that the love he had won was unchanged. Had his crime been less, it is possible that the resentment of his wife might have been greater, but in presence of danger, threatening the very life of the man on whom she had bestowed her affections, his errors were forgotten.

What a wondrous thing is woman's love! The line that fathoms ocean cannot measure its depths, or the imagination which rises to the stars paint the strength and purity of its devotion. It is the one link left, the golden thread uniting earth with heaven.

"When I think what a villain I have been to you," said Mark, "I detest myself. That I should drag you down to shame—you of whom I felt so proud! you whom all the village loved and respected! Rose, Rose, the neighbours were quite right when they said I was unworthy of you."

There was one part of her narrative which the unhappy man could not comprehend—the leaf torn from the Bible, and used as wadding for his gun; he had not the slightest recollection of having used it.

"It would do me no good to deny it either to you or on my trial," he observed; "but knowing how highly you prized the book, I am not so heartless as to have defaced it. You must be in error."

Rose went to the drawers to produce the sacred volume in order to convince him.

It was gone! Lady Boothroyd had taken it, and the evidence was complete.

No sooner did the anxious wife perceive her loss, than the hope, which had hitherto sustained her, vanished; she lost all confidence in her visitor's promises of mercy.

"You must fly, Mark!" she exclaimed.

Her husband shook his head mournfully. Without money it was impossible to fly, and he had none; the portion Rose had brought him had long since been expended. Bitterly did he regret, when too late, the reckless improvidence which chained him to his destiny.

"Fly!" he repeated; "and what would become of you?"

"I will accompany you," answered his wife, firmly,—"share your hardships and console them; toil with you for our daily bread; if driven to it, beg for it;—any misery rather than see you dragged to a prison, to death perhaps; oh, there is madness in that thought! Let us fly to the remotest corners of the earth. There must be kind hearts," she added, "to pity and assist those who struggle patiently against misfortune."

Mark drew his arm gently round her waist and pressed her to his bosom. Never had he so fully felt the value of the prize he had won as at that moment; never had she appeared so beautiful.

"Listen to me," he said, "my own true-hearted girl. Lady Boothroyd did not visit our poor cottage without a motive; you say it is humanity; she spoke of conditions."

"She did!" exclaimed Rose, eagerly. "I recollect."

"But refused to name them."

"Except to you, Mark—except to you!"

"I must see her," exclaimed her husband, thoughtfully. "It is my only chance, for flight without money is impossible."

It was in vain that the anxious wife attempted to combat his resolution. He listened to her kindly and gratefully, but remained firm in it; and he was right.

Rose, in her simplicity and ignorance of the world, fondly imagined that any quiet nook in a distant part of the country might conceal them. He knew that the ministers of justice once set upon his track, Europe could not hide him.

Having come to this decision, Mark laid aside his working clothes, and dressed himself for his visit to the hall.

If his adieus to his wife under such circumstances were painful to her feelings, our readers can imagine what the agony of her suspense must have been till his return.

As the poor fellow—for, despite his past misconduct, there were many good and redeeming qualities in his nature—quitted his house by the front door with the desperate determination of a man who has set his all upon one stake, his companion and fellow poacher, Sanders, crept stealthily away from the back of the house, where he had been listening to the conversation. He, too, had been out on New Year's eve, and fired on the keepers like the rest of the party; and conscience, possibly, had alarmed him, for, on seeing Lady Boothroyd and the steward leave the cottage of Rose, he had concealed himself till the return of her husband, in order to overhear what had passed.

"It be all right," he muttered to himself, as he withdrew. "I be safe enough, seeing her ladyship has got the proof that it wor Mark. She won't hurt un," he added; "his wife be too great a favourite for that."

In his joy at having the weight removed from his mind—not his heart, for it was fear, and not remorse, that had haunted him—the speaker adjourned to the public-house, instead of returning to his labour.

Although Mark Rayner was only absent three hours, they appeared so many ages to the trembling, anxious wife, who, with her pale face glued, as it were, to the window which commanded the road leading from the Park, awaited his return.

"Will he return?" she repeatedly asked herself; "or is it but a snare to draw him to the hall and deliver him up to justice?"

At one moment the conviction that such was the case plunged her in despair; the next, the parting words of her visitor yielded her consolation. Several times she repeated them, dwelt on the promise they implied, and they inspired hope.

"She cannot be so cruel," she argued with herself, "to hold out a gleam of mercy, only to make the blow fall heavier. She is rich, happy, and must be good."

To the surprise of Rose, a strange feeling of calm gradually fell on her. The present, the hideous present, seemed only like a dream; whilst the past returned with startling freshness on her memory. Her girlhood's thoughtless days, the happy ones of courtship, and the brief ones of her wedded bliss, when life appeared full of bright promises, rich in smiles that make the heart's content.

A cry of joy broke from her lips at last. Mark was returning. She could not be mistaken; although the distance, and the tears which dimmed her sight, rendered his features indistinct, she recognised his form, his air, his walk. Affection seldom errs.

In an instant her reveries were forgotten.

"His step is quick," she murmured. "Is it good or ill news that he brings with him? Oh, this suspense is painful. It must be good," she continued, after a pause, "for sorrow's pace is laggard. He sees me; he waves his hand to me. Then there is hope. The kind, good lady has not deceived me. Bless her! bless her!"

When Mark entered the cottage, his wife's agitation was so great that she could not speak; but her eyes were more eloquent than words.

"Saved!" he whispered, as he folded her in his arms. "Saved!"

Never did a more grateful prayer rise from the suffering heart, than the silent one which Rose offered to heaven for her benefactress, as she deemed her.

"You saw her ladyship?" she exclaimed at last.

"Yes."

"And she has given you back the terrible proof?"

"Not yet."

"But she will do so?"

"When the conditions are fulfilled."

"Conditions!" repeated Rose; "true, true, I had forgotten them. What is it she exacts? That we give up our home and quit the place? Willingly, for here sad thoughts and vain regrets would ever haunt us."

"Wife," said Mark Rayner, taking her by the hand, "I promised to fulfil them, but it depends on you whether I do so or not. Had I refused, I should have left the hall a prisoner. Her benevolent ladyship," he continued, with a bitter accent on the word benevolent, "exact that we leave St. Faith's, and fly to a foreign land."

"To the end of the earth!" exclaimed the grateful woman; "for there is safety."

"It is not the only condition," added her husband, slowly.

His wife regarded him uneasily.

"I must at the part of a thief, to escape the doom of a murderer."

"A thief!"

"And steal Lilly, the child of my old companion Barny Gee."

"Steal Lilly!"

"Such are the terms on which I may be permitted to hide my shame and repentance in another land. It will break old Simon's heart."

"But why commit such a heartless, useless crime?" demanded Rose. "I cannot understand it. I see no motive."

"Lady Boothroyd declares that it will be impossible to forget the events of New Year's eve as long as the child remains at St. Faith's; that her presence will be a continual source of irritation, and keep up the ill-feeling between Sir Norman and his tenants."

"And you consented?"

"I did," replied Mark, colouring with shame, "for the love of life was strong. I thought of you, Rose."

"It could only have been to try you, Mark," exclaimed his wife, to whose clear and upright mind the crime seemed dark and villainous, as the reasons alleged for perpetrating it were trivial and insufficient. Had she lived more in the world, society would have taught her one great truth—that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the pretext masks the motive.

"You do not know her," observed her husband, bitterly. "Her heart is as completely a stranger to every sentiment of humanity as yours is to crime. I pointed out to her how poor old Simon and Hester loved the child; the misery its loss would inflict upon them; the doubt, the agony of years it must entail. I might as well have preached to stone."

"Did Lady Boothroyd make you no reply?" demanded Rose, still more and more surprised.

"Yes, one. The gallows or obedience."

The fearful shudder which ran through the frame of his hearer denoted the violence of the contest between love and her strict sense of right.

"Poor Lilly!" she murmured. "It is dreadful, but there is no other alternative. If love can atone the crime, I will atone it," she added, "by proving a mother to her."

"She is not to remain with us," said Mark, avoiding the gaze of his wife. "I am to deliver the child to her ladyship in London. She has promised to educate and provide for her."

Reckless and dissipated as the speaker had been, no pecuniary consideration could have induced him to commit the act demanded of him, or his wife to sanction it; but terror did. Both were young, and in nature's course had years of love and happiness before them. If Rose fell, it was not without a struggle.

Pause, gentle reader, ere you condemn her—remember the inducement was her husband's safety: angels have fallen before.

It had so long been known in the village that the Rayners were behind-hand with their rent, but little surprise was expressed when at an early hour the following day, the bailiff took possession of their cottage and land. More than one friend stepped forward with offers of assistance. They were declined—Mark and his wife had determined to emigrate; and, in answer to numerous questions respecting Sir Norman, stated that he had acted liberally to them.

We need scarcely add that the seizure had been arranged between Lady Boothroyd and the unwilling instruments of her evil design.

Nearly all the inhabitants of St. Faith's came to bid them good-bye; some marvelled at the suddenness of their departure, others regretted it; all offered advice, a few consolation.

"Somehow, I don't think I shall be long after thee, Mark," observed Sanders, "for I have taken a dislike to the place—it will be mortal lonesome when thee art gone."

The severest trial was the parting with the weaver and his wife, who forced upon them numberless little tokens of kind feeling and good wishes, which husband and wife would fain have declined.

"Take 'em," said the old man, "don't 'ee be proud; they will remind thee of home and friends. Keep up thee courage in a foreign land till thee has earned the means to come back to us. To be sure, I shall be dead before that day. But Lilly here," he added, holding up the child for them to kiss, "will, please God, be alive to welcome you."

Rose could only reply by her tears.

Many of the villagers accompanied them for several miles on the road, and only took leave of the wanderers when the coach, which was to convey them to Exeter, drove up. Little did they imagine how soon Mark was to revisit his native place, or the errand that would bring him back. Had they even guessed at such a thing, their adieus and kind wishes had been changed to curses.

It was past midnight when Mark Rayner, who felt the full enormity of the act circumstances urged him to commit, approached St. Faith's. He had disguised himself so effectually, that had he met any of his late boon companions in idleness, recognition would have been impossible. And yet he trembled at every sound. The moaning of the wind through the leafless branches of the trees, the slightest rustling in the hedge, filled his soul with terror. There was something even in the crispness of the snow, as it yielded to his heavy tread, that added to his uneasiness.

He was but young in crime.

Arrived at the brow of the hill where the narrow footpath leads through the churchyard to the village, he paused with his hand upon the turnstile which he had leaped over a hundred times when a boy, like one unable to proceed.

"Not that road," he muttered. "I dare not take it now. Bad as I am, I can't pass poor Barny's grave on my way to steal his child."

There were other graves there. The simple turf-bound resting-places of those who had loved him in his youth: the mother who had bore him, the father who had left a spotless name, which he was about to dishonour.

No wonder that Mark Rayner could not pass through the churchyard of St. Faith's, but took the common route.

Never had the unhappy man felt so wretched as when creeping stealthily into his native village, gliding like a shadow under the walls of each well-remembered dwelling, whose inmates had so lately bade God speed him on his way.

More than once he felt tempted to renounce his project and fly; but the thought of Rose restrained him.

"I might suffer alone," he argued with himself; "but I have no right to bring disgrace and misery upon her."

He should have thought of that before.

On reaching the cottage of Simon Gee, Mark—to whom every step of ground was familiar—turned down the narrow lane which separated the old man's garden from Farmer Minter's orchard; and, leaping over the hedge, crept cautiously to the back of the house.

It required no great skill to take out a pane of glass, open the old-fashioned casement, and enter the room where Lillian was sleeping. Once there, a terrible thought flashed suddenly upon his mind: Should the child awake, and alarm the aged couple by her cries?

With the speed of terror he wrapped the unconscious innocent in the coverlid of the bed, and sprang with her through the window. This haste produced the very thing he felt most anxious to avoid: the shock of the descent startled the orphan from her slumber, and she uttered loud piercing cries. The voices of Simon and his wife were heard, and the noise of their striking light.

The alarm once given, Mark felt assured that he should be pursued. But even that danger had been foreseen and provided against by the calculating fiend who had urged him on to crime; Lady Boothroyd had given him the keys of a private entrance to the park, and of an old pavilion, situated in a remote part of the grounds, which had not been used for years: in fact it had been closed so long that the ivy had grown over the worm-eaten shutters, and half buried the portico and roof in its rank embrace.

The guilty fugitive scarcely drew breath till he found himself safe within the shelter of its walls.

Great was the consternation of the weaver and Hester when they rushed, half-dressed, into the little chamber of Lillian and discovered their loss; the open window betrayed the means by which the cottage had been entered and their niece carried off.

The old man clasped his hands in despair, as he regarded the vacant bed.

"It is still warm!" exclaimed his wife. "The robber cannot be far off—besides, we heard her cries. Rouse yourself," she added, shaking her husband by the arm; "run to Farmer Minter's! call up the neighbours! he may be overtaken yet!"

It was no time to ask why the child had been stolen from them, or speculate upon the motives which led to the crime. Simon Gee ran, as he was directed, to the house of the farmer; whilst the distracted Hester alarmed the rest of the neighbours. In a few minutes the village was astir. The news of their loss excited the utmost surprise and indignation: such a thing had never before been heard of in St. Faith's, and long ere dawn a dozen horsemen, at least, were scouring the country in every direction, so great was the sympathy felt for the orphan of poor Barny.

It is almost needless to say that Farmer Minter was one of the most active in the pursuit, or that it was fruitless. The plan had been so artfully laid, that even his intelligence was at fault. And on the return of the villagers, as a last resource, he resolved to consult Mr. Thornton.

Poor old Simon accompanied him to The Elms.

The worthy magistrate listened to their statement with astonishment. He could perceive no motive for the outrage. And his visitors had to repeat their tale more than once, before he could bring himself to believe its truthfulness.

"I will seek my murdered brother's child," exclaimed the heart-broken weaver, "if I beg my way, and tramp the country through."

"I scarcely know what to advise," observed the gentleman; "the features of the crime are so unusual. All that I can do, I will do. A description of the child shall be sent to the police, both in the rural districts and the neighbouring towns. A reward must be offered."

"Let it be a handsome one," said the farmer; "I will guarantee that it shall be forthcoming. There is not a man in St. Faith's but will contribute, for Lilly in some sort belongs to us all."

"I will see to that," answered the magistrate. "Have any gipsies been lurking in the neighbourhood lately?"

Neither of his visitors had either seen or heard of any.

"It bea'n't the gipsies' work!" exclaimed the honest farmer. "They have nought to do wi' it."

"Have you any suspicion?" demanded Mr. Thornton.

"Yes," replied the farmer, resolutely.

"It is your duty, then, to speak out."

"Well, then," answered Mr. Minter, deliberately, "it be my belief that Sir Norman Boothroyd had a hand in it."

The gentleman reflected for several instants before making a reply, and weighed the circumstances well over in his mind. No wonder that in the absence of any ostensible motive or reason, he exonerated the baronet from all participation in such an act; for though he knew him to be both proud and vindictive, he was also aware that prudence was, to say the least of it, quite as strong in him as courage, and the act was a decided felony.

"Impossible," he said; "nay, almost impossible. Sir Norman, to my positive knowledge, has not quitted his room for several days. He has been ill, exceedingly ill. Besides, why should he descend to a crime that would not only disgrace him in the eyes of the world, but render him amenable to the laws of his country?"

The accuser shook his head—he was silenced, but not convinced.

"I can't think it be the baronet," said Simon Gee, "for it wor only two days sin' her ladyship called at our poor cottage, kissed the child, and offered to assist us in providing for it, though Hester and I both declined her help."

"Lady Boothroyd is too estimable a person," observed Mr. Thornton, "to lend her countenance to any such unworthy act."

"That she be," exclaimed both his visitors;

"things would be different at the hall, poor lady, if she had her will."

The magistrate, with all his shrewdness, was of the same opinion—a proof that the little conjugal drama performed at Meldown Park had been well acted, since it had deceived even his penetration.

THE UNBEARABLE CROSS.

ROBERT HOPE and Samuel Hullins had lived neighbours for more than twelve years; and it is probable they would always have been on good terms, had not Samuel, who had served under Admiral Nelson, gained at Trafalgar a small pension, which he had paid for by the loss of one of his legs. This leg less, and this pension more, were for Robert a continual source of jealousy; he accused fate for having left him his two feet, and complained bitterly that he had not been able, as he said, to sell his legs at the same price as Hullins had done. Every time he went to pay his rent, he repeated, grumblingly, that his neighbour was very fortunate; that he was in a condition to settle his bills, since the king gave him a good pension; while he, poor fellow, had hard work to make both ends of the year meet, without taking into the account his creditors.

Robert at first contented himself with making these reflections inwardly, but, by degrees, his dissatisfaction was expressed aloud, and became his habitual and favourite theme of conversation.

One week that his rent had fallen behind-hand, and he was sadly advancing towards the house of Mr. Taylor, in order to make his excuses for this delay, he met neighbour Hullins, who was as regular as a clock in paying his rent, and had just been for that purpose.

The very sight of Samuel produced on Robert the effect of a fit of sickness; so, when he bowed in reply to the salute of Hullins, his glance singularly resembled that of a bull shaking his horns at a dog.

Arrived at the house of the proprietor, Hope did not fail to be reprimanded. The example of his neighbour was cited, who always paid punctually, and to the last penny.

"Yes, yes," murmured Robert; "some people are born with a silver spoon in their mouths. Hullins is very fortunate, and I am not surprised that he pays punctually with such a pension."

"Hullins has a pension, it is true," replied Mr. Taylor; "but his infirmity is a heavy cross, and if you were afflicted with it, I should pity you much more."

"Not so," said Hope. "If I had been so fortunate as to lose a leg like him, twenty years ago, it would have been a productive day for me. I would sell all my limbs at the same price. Do you call his oak leg a heavy cross? I think his pension should render it light. The heaviest cross that I know of, is to be obliged to labour incessantly."

Mr. Taylor was a man of joyous humour, but a close observer. He had for a long time noticed the envious disposition of Robert, and resolved to convince him that the lightest cross might become unbearable to a discontented mind.

"I see," said he to Hope, "that you are disposed to do nothing. Well! I will exempt you from this obligation to labour of which you complain so bitterly. If you think the cross of your neighbour, Samuel, so easy to bear, will you accept a lighter one, if I will engage to give you your rent?"

"That depends upon what kind of a cross it is," said Robert, anxiously, for he feared that the proposition would not be acceptable.

"This," said Mr. Taylor, taking a piece of chalk and tracing a white cross on Robert's jacket. "During the time that you wear this, I shall not demand a penny of your rent."

Hope thought, at first, that his landlord was jesting; but being assured that he spoke seriously, he exclaimed—

"By George! you may say that you have seen my last money, for I am willing to wear this cross all my lifetime."

Robert immediately went out, congratulating himself on his good fortune, and laughing all along the road at the folly of Mr. Taylor, who had let him off so cheaply from paying his rent.

He had never been so joyous as at the moment of returning home. He found nothing to complain of, and his dog came to sit down at his feet without his punishing him for his familiarity.

As he seated himself on his arrival, his wife did not, at first, notice the white cross which he had on his shoulder; but having passed behind her husband to wind up the clock, she suddenly exclaimed, in a shrill voice—

"Why, Robert, where have you been? You have on your back a cross a foot long. You have been to the tavern, and some drunkard among your friends has played you a trick to make you ridiculous. Get up and let me brush off this cross."

"Away!" exclaimed Hope, hastily; "my clothes do not need your brushing. Go knit your stockings, and let me alone."

"That shall not be!" exclaimed Mrs. Hope, in a voice more shrill. "I will not have my husband become the laughing-stock of the whole village, and if I tear your jacket to pieces, you shall not wear that ridiculous cross."

As she spoke thus, the wife attempted to brush Robert's shoulder; and the latter, who knew that resistance would be useless, walked off, shutting the door after him violently.

"What a fury!" muttered he, as he went away. "If she had been more gentle, I would have told her of my good fortune; but she does not deserve to know it."

"O! O! Robert," exclaimed old Fox, at the moment when Hope turned the corner of his house, "what is that white cross on your back?"

"Take care of your own clothes," insolently replied Hope, going on his way.

"Mr. Hope," said little Patty Stevens, the grocer's daughter, "stop one moment if you please, that I may rub out that great white cross you have on your shoulder."

"Go and sell your herrings, lazy girl," replied Robert, "and do not concern yourself about the passers-by."

The little girl, silenced, hastened to re-enter her mother's shop.

At this moment, Hope arrived at the house of the butcher, who was conversing on the threshold with his neighbour, the blacksmith.

"You are just the man I wanted," said the latter, stopping Robert; and he began to speak to him on business; but hardly had he commenced, when old Peggy Turton arrived, in her plaid gown and blue apron.

"Mercy! Mr. Hope," exclaimed she, taking up her apron, "what is that on your back?"

Robert turned to tell her to let him alone, but the blacksmith then perceived the mark made by Mr. Taylor.

"Heavens!" said he, laughing, "he might serve for a sign to the White Cross."

"I suppose," said the butcher, "that his wife has marked him thus for fear of losing him."

Hope felt that there was for him but one method of escaping at the same time from the apron of Peggy, and the jokes of the butcher and the blacksmith, so he hastened to leave the spot, not without some abusive language to his neighbours; but the cross had begun to weigh more heavily upon his shoulder than he had at first supposed.

The unfortunate Robert seemed destined this day to provoking encounters, for he had gone but a few steps when he found himself opposite the school-house. School was just out, and the scholars were at this moment issuing from the door, ready for any fun that might present itself. Hope was terribly uneasy, and imagined he already heard cries behind him. His fears were soon realised; he had scarcely passed the school-house door when a loud shout was heard, and fifty scholars at least began to pursue him and point at him, throwing up their caps in the air.

"Look, look!" exclaimed one; "there is a sheep marked for the butcher."

"Don't you see?" replied another; "it is a crusader just setting out for Palestine."

And the shouting and laughter recommenced more loudly.

Hope became pale with anger; he turned like a cross dog pursued by children, and, perhaps, would have cruelly revenged himself on his young persecutors, had not Mr. Johnson, the schoolmaster, suddenly appeared at the door of his house.

Robert advanced towards him, complaining of the insolence of his pupils. Mr. Johnson replied that he would not for the world encourage impertinence in them, but that the white cross which he had on his back might make wiser people than boys laugh.

"What is this cross to you?" replied Robert, crossly. "Is not my back my own property?"

The schoolmaster smilingly assented, and Hope went on his way. But the cross was growing heavier and heavier.

He began to think that it would not be so easy to pay his rent in this manner. So much railery had already been heaped upon him, what would it be if the cause were known? His landlord might as well have written on his back a receipt in full.

As he reflected thus, Robert arrived at the tavern. He was passing by when he perceived Mr. Taylor himself at a few paces' distance, and on the other side his neighbour Hullins, dragging his wooden leg, and conversing with Harry Stokes, the carpenter. Harry Stokes was the wit of the village, and Hope would not have encountered him before Hullins for the world. He therefore took refuge in the tavern.

But the place was not long tenable. The drinkers did not fail to perceive the cross, and to rally Hope, who grew angry; the quarrel became violent, and the innkeeper, fearing some serious result, turned Robert out of doors.

The latter had left home with the intention of examining some work which had been offered to him in the neighbouring village, but his mind had been so disturbed by old Fox, Patty Stevens, the blacksmith, the butcher, Peggy Turton, and the school-boys, that he resolved to return home, thinking that would be, after all, the most peaceable place.

Have you ever seen, in the month of September, a young partridge, the last of the brood, fluttering along through the fields, with a wounded wing? Such was Robert on his way to his home, at the other end of the village. Now he walked rapidly lest he should be overtaken, now slowly, lest he should meet some one; now in the road, now in the fields, gliding behind the bushes, climbing the walls, and shunning glances like a gipsy who has stolen a chicken from a farmer's poultry-yard. At this moment the white cross was an unbearable weight.

At last he reached his dwelling, and this time hoped to find a little rest. But as soon as his wife perceived him she began to cry out:—

"Are you not ashamed to come back as you went? Five or six of our neighbours have asked me if you had lost your senses! Quick, let me rub out that cross."

"Away, woman!" exclaimed Robert, exasperated. "You shall not remain so, Hope; I will not have any one belonging to me so ridiculous. Take off that jacket! take it off this minute, I tell you!"

As she spoke thus, Mrs. Hope attempted to seize her husband's arm; but the latter rudely repulsed her. Mrs. Hope, who was not remarkable for patience, replied by a blow, and the result was a scuffle between the two, to the great scandal of the neighbours, who ran to separate them.

Everybody blamed Robert, who, when he became calm, understanding that there was no hope of rest or peace for him otherwise, effaced the cross of his own accord.

The Monday following he carried his rent early to the house of his landlord.

"Ah! ah! Robert," said Mr. Taylor, on perceiving him, "I thought you would soon repent of your bargain. This is a good lesson for envious and impatient dispositions, who are incessantly complaining of God and of life. Remember this, Hope; He who has created us has proportioned our burdens to our strength. Do not complain of being less fortunate than others, for you know not the sufferings of your neighbour. All crosses are heavy; the way to render them light is to bear them with patience, courage, and good-will."

THE DEAD YEAR.

HERE I will sit and muse. The midnight skies
Are weeping silent tears, as if they grieved
For the old year, and the pale stars look sad
And tremble, as if living, sorrowing hearts
Were throbbing in their breasts. In vain! in vain!
The faded year is nothing now. The flowers,
The birds, the waves, the streams, the melodies
Of vernal life and nature will come back,
But he returns no more. The winds may search
For him in their far journeyings; the grand Old ocean with its thunder-tones may call
For ever to him in its ceaseless dash
Beneath the heavens; the bright and burning stars,
With their high tones of Eden minstrelsy,
May speak his name in their eternal sweep
Along their flaming paths; the comets wild
May seek him by the baleful glare they spread Through realms of ancient night; but none of these Shall ever find him, for he liveth not
In all the universe of God. Years die,
And centuries die, and there will come a day
When the dread angel of the apocalypse
Standing on land and sea, will lift his hand
And swear aloud that time shall be no more.

TRUE BEAUTY.

It is a pearl—a priceless gem,
That proud Sultana may not wear;
It is not seen in diadem,
Nor e'en in queenly form so fair.

Nor does it deck the fairest brow,
Where youth and beauty are entwined;
But ah! it is the early vow
Of Christian love, within the mind.

THE WHITE SPARROW.

Sleep, he is the worst of thieves:
He steals the half of life.

No more common complaint is to be heard now-a-days, from the lips of housewives, than that of the laziness and untidy habits of domestic servants. Mothers and grandmothers are often wont to tell the young housekeeper that matters were otherwise in their days; and it has sometimes occurred to us whether the fault may not lie as much in the degenerate habits of the masters and mistresses of the present generation, as in any defect peculiar to their dependents. Were the lady of the house more frequently to rise at five or six in the morning, as in the "good old days lang syne," perchance she would not so often have to complain that rooms were carelessly swept, that work was left undone, or fires lighted too late.

A useful hint on this subject may, we think, be gathered from a proverbial tale, related by a favourite German writer, and entitled—

"He who would thrive Must the white sparrow see!"

The meaning of the proverb is not at first sight so apparent as that of some others which circulate amongst us, such as "Early habits make the man," or "Honesty is the best policy," &c.; but the moral signification it is intended to convey is not the less true and important. I will, therefore, here relate the story connected with its origin, even as I received it myself from the lips of an old friend.

There was a certain farmer, with whom everything seemed to grow worse from year to year. His cattle died one by one—the product of his land was not half what it ought to be—in fact, all his property was, to use a familiar expression, "going to the dogs." Scarcely a week passed by that either the tax-gatherer or a creditor did not come to his window, and, addressing him with a courteous bow, say, "I am really very sorry, Herr Ruckwarts, to put you to inconvenience, but I am compelled to do my duty." The old friends of Herr Ruckwarts also tried their best to do their duty by him—they advised, they entreated, and they helped him, but all in vain; and one after another gave him up in despair, declaring with a sigh that, "as for poor Ruckwarts, there was no use in trying to help him,—he was past being helped."

He had one friend, however, whose heart was in the right place, and who was not only a good man, but a very prudent and clear-sighted man. This friend thought he would not give Herr Ruckwarts up altogether, without making one more attempt to save him; so one day, as they were drinking their glass of beer together, he led the conversation, as though accidentally, to the subject of sparrows, related many anecdotes of these birds, and observed how much they had multiplied of late, and how very cunning and voracious they had become.

Herr Ruckwarts shook his head gravely in answer to this observation, and said, "They were indeed most destructive creatures—for his part, he had not the least doubt that it was entirely owing to them his harvest had been of late years so very unproductive."

To this conjecture the good friend made no rejoinder; but after a moment's pause he continued the conversation by inquiring: "Neighbour, have you ever seen a white sparrow?"

"No," replied Ruckwarts; "the sparrows which alight in my fields are all quite gray."

"That is very probable," rejoined his friend; "the habits of the white sparrow are peculiar to itself. Only one comes into the world every year, and being so different to its fellows the other sparrows take a dislike to it, and peck at it when it appears amongst them. For this reason it seeks its food early in the morning, before the rest of the feathered tribe are astir, and then goes back to its nest for the rest of the day."

"That is very strange!" exclaimed Ruckwarts. "I must really try and get a sight at that sparrow, and if possible I will catch it too."

On the morning which followed this conversation, the farmer rose with the sun, and sallied forth into the fields; he walked around his farm, searched his farmyard in every corner, examined the roofs of his barns, and the trees of his orchard, to see whether he could discover any traces of the wonderful white sparrow. But the white sparrow, to the great disappointment of the farmer, would not show itself, or stir from its imaginary nest. What vexed the farmer, however, still more, was, that although the sun stood high in the heavens by the time he had completed his rounds, not one of the farm hands were astir—they, too, seemed resolved not to leave their nests. Meanwhile, the cattle in their stalls were bellowing with hunger, and not a soul was near to give them their fodder.

Herr Ruckwarts was reflecting on the disadvantages of this state of things, when suddenly he perceived a lad coming out of the house, carrying a sack of wheat on his shoulders. He seemed to be in great haste to get out of the precincts of the farm; Herr Ruckwarts soon perceived that his steps were not bent towards the mill, but towards the public-house, where Casper had unhappily a long score to pay. He hastened after the astonished youth, who believed his master to be still in the enjoyment of his morning nap, and quickly relieved him of his burden.

The farmer next bent his steps to the cow-house, and peeping in to see whether the white sparrow had perchance taken refuge there, he discovered to his dismay that the milkmaid was handing a liberal portion of milk through the window to her neighbour, to mix with her morning cup of coffee.

"A pretty sort of housekeeping this is!" thought the farmer to himself, as he hastened to his wife's apartment and roused her from her slumbers. "As sure as my name is Ruckwarts," he exclaimed, in a somewhat angry tone, "there must be an end of these lazy habits. Everything is going wrong for the want of some one to look after them! So far as I am concerned, at all events, I will rise every day at the same hour I rose this morning, and then I shall soon get my farm clear of all those who do not intend to do their duty properly. Besides, who knows but some fine morning or other I may succeed in catching the white sparrow?"

Days and weeks passed on. The farmer adhered to his resolution; but he soon forgot the white sparrow, and only looked after his cattle and his corn-fields. Soon everything around him wore a flourishing aspect, and men began to observe that "Herr Ruckwarts (Backwards) now well deserved to be called Herr Vorwärts (Forwards)." In due course of time, his old friend again came to spend the day with him, and inquired in a humorous tone, "Well, my good fellow, how are you getting on now? Have you succeeded in catching a glimpse of the white sparrow?"

The farmer only replied to this question by a smile; and then, holding out his hand to his old friend, he said "God bless you, Herder! you have saved me and my family from ruin."

Often, in after years, when Herr Ruckwarts was a prosperous man, respected by his neighbours, and beloved by his well-ordered household, he was wont to relate this history of his early life; and thus, by degrees, the saying passed into a proverb—"He who would thrive must see the white sparrow."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

THE ACQUISITION OF KNOWLEDGE.

To "get knowledge" is a Bible precept, as old as Solomon. The importance of the duty was felt long before the days of Solomon; for in all times and in all nations a cultivated intellect has been respected and valued by the human race. Men of great intellect have been regarded as demi-gods. The multitude have looked upon them with awe-struck wonder. An impression has been felt, as of the presence of a grand and solemn agent of spiritual majesty and power. With cheerful and reverent hands the world has crowned intellect with its richest honours. This universal adoration of intellect is proof at once both of its transcendent worth and power. Egyptian sages knew its value, and Chaldeans knew it also, long before the pyramids were reared. At all times the acquisition of knowledge has been the grand end and aim of the best and bravest of mankind.

To "get knowledge," then, is no new idea. Arguments in support of the theory that knowledge is worth having are numerous.

Knowledge is pleasant. Light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun. This is intellectually as well as naturally true. As the eye was made for light, and light was made for the eye, so truth was made for the mind, and the mind for truth. And the mind destitute of knowledge is the worst sort of destitution. As it would be misery to keep one or more of our limbs in unbroken inactivity, so it is the worst of misery to keep the mind idle; and as it would be dangerous to deny the system proper nourishment, so is it fatal to refuse food to the mind. The gnawings of hunger, the weariness of constrained posture, the misery of indigence, have all loud voices—a destitute, weary, hungry mind is often dumb. The cry for help is not heard, until the mind at last loses its energy, and becomes thoroughly torpid, if not dead.

But knowledge is pleasant to the mind, if it be in health. The mind craves for knowledge. It will use the note of interrogation. It is never content with the present acquirements; and every new discovery gives new pleasure. It is not a question of barter—it is not what the knowledge is marketably worth; but knowledge is loved for its own sake independently of anything beside. There is an intense delight in its acquisition; which those only can know who have experienced it. So strong is the passion, that in order to gratify it men have given up everything else. When Erasmus was a student, he was very poor; and he wrote to a friend, "When I get a little money, I shall buy Greek books, and then some clothes." The Greek books were pleasanter to him than the bravest raiment a tailor ever stitched.

There is another motive. Lord Bacon, or Lord Bacon's index-maker, uttered the aphorism, Knowledge is power. The remark was as old as Solomon (for he had said, "Wisdom is strength"), and perhaps a great deal older; but the truth it taught was valuable, and truth being no man's indefeasible possession, it belonged neither to Solomon, nor to Bacon, nor the index-maker, but to everybody. Who discovered it first is of no particular importance.

That knowledge is power, does not of course stand good in every case; the aphorism is of general application. Thus a man knows letters, and he has power to become the intimate associate, the friend and companion of all the great men whose writings are preserved in the language he understands. Every new acquisition of a foreign tongue gives him an introduction to those foreign worthies whose books are untranslated and makes him grow more intimate with those who have been "done" into his native tongue. Again, a knowledge of the elements of nature, their properties, and characteristics, and their action on each other, gives him the ability to employ them in his service,—to harness these four ancient coursers, fire, water, earth, and air, to the car of his inventive genius.

Knowledge is power in another sense—with the money-maker, to wit. He whose speculations are the result of careful thought and well-digested information, is scarcely to be considered a speculator, after all. A neophyte on 'Change, with the learning of all the schools in his head but that of the school of life, would be at the mercy of the jobbers. A knowledge of the world, in men and things, is the grand secret of success in commercial enterprise. Such knowledge is power—the power of accumulating wealth and building up a fortune.

In any way you please the aphorism is true,—true of the engineer building his battery, of the statesman in his political schemes, of the speculator in his dashing enterprise, of the murderer compounding his subtle poison, of the analytical chemist outwitting the poisoner,—of all, everywhere.

Then knowledge is ennobling. This, of course, is only to be accepted again in a limited sense. The man who boasts he knows the world when he only knows the worst part of it, is as the medical practitioner declaring his acquaintance with hygeism when he has witnessed nothing but diseases. A knowledge of that which is bad, and base, and vicious, and criminal—of that at which a woman's cheek would blush, and a man's heart rise indignant,—is not the sort of knowledge which ennobles the mind. I know that there is much it is necessary we should know which cannot of itself ennoble; but how much is there within the range of literature, art, science, that elevates the human intellect and softens the human heart. I am no devout worshipper of that knowledge which is coldly intellectual. I think the character is seldom ennobled but when the heart is touched. I believe that the affections of the heart are often better guiding-stars than the intellectual efforts of the mind. A beautiful mind in a beautiful body was the Athenian ideal of perfection. I think a good heart is wanted to make the thing altogether perfect. The fairest form that ever graced the earth, and the wisest intellect that ever shone on man, without purity and goodness of heart, constitute but a cold, lifeless statue, that we may admire, but cannot love.

But here some one of my young readers may ask, "How am I to cultivate my intellect? I am poor, and have not the means of procuring an education; I can never hope to enjoy the happy shade of academic bowers. I have not any means at my command." Have not the means! Has poverty robbed you of a single intellectual power? Has it not sharpened them all? Has it taken away from you the glorious objects of thought which the Creator spread around you in grand and solemn profusion? Has it broken the silken cord that binds you to your fellows? Has it shut out the brilliant creations of their minds from yours? Has it palsied any one of your senses?

Your powers are unimpaired. Why, then, not cultivate them? In what way does poverty prevent your doing so? Money will not buy you study, or thought, or mental strength. You can think, reason, meditate, without money. You can exercise all your faculties upon all the objects around you without money. Wealth will not convert a dunce into a genius. Gold will not store the mind with wisdom; more likely it will fill it with folly. It may decorate your body, but it cannot adorn your soul. Strange thought, that money will cultivate your intellect. The poorer you are the easier it is for you to cultivate your mind. You have more and greater stimulants to action, and fewer inducements to idleness and folly. It is hard for the rich youth to cultivate his mind or heart. Much more favourable and preferable are the opportunities of the poor. From among the poor have come the great majority of the world's greatest and best characters.

But you say now, that you have not time. Not time to think! How can you help thinking? Not time to study! How can you avoid studying? Your mind is active, ever active, ever thinking, ever studying. All you have to do is to direct it to proper objects, and in proper channels, and it will cultivate itself. You have time enough for nonsense, idleness, waste, gossip, foolery, but not time enough to cultivate your mind. Whoever lives to thirty years of age without cultivating his mind, is guilty of an enormous waste of time. The truth is, there is nothing to prevent it but a will. Whoever forms a resolute determination to cultivate his mind will find nothing in his way. If he finds barriers, they will only make him stronger in surmounting them. Everything will administer to his progress in the great work. Aids will come from every quarter. Teachers will gather around him in great numbers. The air will breathe notes of instruction, and running brooks give him lessons of wisdom. The bee, the worm, the bird, the rock, the cloud, the ocean, the heavens above him, will read him lectures on science. Light and darkness, heat and cold, everything in nature, life, the human soul, will gather around him with a voice of instruction, as soon as he determines to be instructed. He can pass a lifetime amid all these things, and get no instruction. But as soon as he begins to look for it, it begins to come.

Learn this truth, young man and woman: "The will is the way." Form that, and the garden of your minds will be thoroughly cultivated. It is not necessary that a fortune should be spent to afford you the opportunities of schools or colleges. These are invaluable aids. But life, the world, may become one great school, and everything therein a teacher. The mind may be trained without schools, thoroughly educated without colleges.

To the youth who knows how to read, no intellectual acquisition is impossible. He can do all things—attain to a knowledge of any of the sciences, of foreign languages, and of general literature. He holds possession of the key which opens every door in the Temple of Wisdom.

The cultivation of the intellect is not selfish. It increases our ability to do good. Is a nation oppressed with tyranny? Are unjust laws grinding the face of the poor? Are existing institutions opposed to the well-being of the masses of the people? Are old errors blinding the public mind and veiling the soul of humanity from the light of truth? Is ignorance palsying human energies and dwarfing human powers? Is the whirlpool of intemperance swallowing up its thousands? Are war and slavery crippling their millions? Cultivated intellect must apply the Archimedean lever of reform to these ruinous evils, or they can never be removed.

STICK TOGETHER!

A RHYME FOR THE TIME.

WHEN 'midst the wreck of fire and smoke,
When cannons rend the skies asunder,
And fierce dragons with quickening stroke
Upon the reeling regiment thunder,
The ranks close up to sharp command,
'Till helmet's feather touches feather;
Compact, the furious shock they stand,
And conquer, while they stick together.

When now 'mid clouds of woe and want
Our comrades' walls rise fast and faster,
And charging madly on our front
Come the black legions of Disaster,
Shall we present a wavering band,
And fly like leaves before wild weather?
No! side by side, and hand in hand,
We'll stand our ground and stick together.

God gave us hands—one left, one right;
The first to help ourselves, the other
To stretch abroad in kindly night,
And help along our falling brother.
Then when you see a brother fall
And bow his head beneath the weather,
If you be not a dastard all,
You'll help him up, and stick together.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR J. PAKINGTON, BART. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

RIGHT HON. SIR J. PAKINGTON, BART.

AMONG the practical men of the age, Sir John Pakington takes an honourable place. He has rendered good service to the people in the strenuous efforts he has made for the spread of education; and both as a minister of state and a member of the lower house, has honourably discharged his duties.

He is the son of the late W. Russell, Esq., of Powick Court, in Warwickshire, and assumed the name of Pakington, with a handsome fortune, from his uncle Sir J. Pakington, in 1830. He was born in 1799, was educated at Eton and Oriel College, Oxford, and married in 1822 the only daughter of M. A. Slaney, Esq., of Shiffnal, Salop. This lady died in 1843, and Sir J. Pakington married again, in the following year, a daughter of the Bishop of Rochester; he was again a widower in 1848, and in 1851 united himself to a daughter of the late C. De Crespigny, and relict of Col. Davies, of Elmley Park, Worcestershire.

The public life of Sir John Pakington began in 1837, in which year he took his seat in the Commons for Droitwich. Previous to this, however, he had been nominated to one or two official county posts, more or less important. He was deputy-lieutenant of Worcestershire in 1832, and chairman of quarter sessions in 1834. But the public life of Sir John Pakington really began when he entered the House, and gave his interest and talents to the Conservative party.

The "free-trade" measures of the late Sir Robert Peel met with very strong opposition from Sir John Pakington. He could not see clearly, as did that sagacious statesman, that the abolition of the corn laws was essential to the prosperity of the nation; and not seeing this clearly, he was not the man to be turned from his convictions by any clamour from without. Whatever opinion may be formed of the principles which he held in common with Bentinck and Disraeli, of the honesty and uprightness of his motives no doubt was entertained, even by his opponents; and it was Sir Robert Peel himself who obtained for him a baronetcy before leaving office.

The question of the sugar duties in 1848, under the government of Lord John Russell, brought Sir J. Pakington again before the public. While the deplorable state of our West Indian colonies was the topic of the day, Pakington's ability and information were of essential service; and as one of the committee of which Bentinck was chairman he took a prominent part in the discussion.

When Lord Derby accepted office in 1852, Sir J. Pakington was intrusted with the secretaryship of the colonies. This appointment caused much public animadversion. He was declared to be anything but the right man in the right place. A stormy criticism was raised, and the idea of elevating a chairman of quarter sessions to the administration of colonial affairs, was ridiculed as the height of absurdity. But nothing deterred him from discharging the duties of the post he had accepted; sarcasm was lost on him—threats had no terror for him. Clear-headed and honest-hearted, he intrenched himself in his office, working steadily, laboriously, and successfully in the department of government intrusted to him. He threw himself heart and soul into the work, making the interests of the colonists the leading considerations in his policy, until at length his guardian vigilance and general aptitude for office were acknowledged, and he won the confidence and esteem of those who had been his most strenuous opponents.

But the leading feature of Sir John Pakington's public life is the interest he has invariably manifested in the great question of popular education. In this respect he has accomplished much for the working population. In this mighty question of education he has taken a most active part, not only as a member of the Council for Public Education, but as a member of the House and as a private individual. He has spared neither time nor expense in visiting the leading manufacturing towns, and his voice has been heard as an advocate of education in Manchester, Birmingham, Huddersfield, &c. Waiving every other consideration, and regarding him only as a promoter and advocate of education, he has done much to win golden opinions from all men. He has never hesitated to avow his faith in education; never been turned from his purpose by the old cry of its being dangerous to furnish instruction to the labourer. He has stood forth the champion of cheap and good education for every body; and in this respect, at all events, has been the freest of all free-traders. The liberal sentiments he has uttered, the educational conferences he has attended, the time he has devoted, all show clearly enough that he is a thoroughgoing educationalist.

As such we feel sure that his portrait will be acceptable to our readers,—a portrait accurately copied from a beautiful photograph by Mayall.

PURSUIT OF MUTINEERS AT AGRA BY COLONEL GREATHED.

THE BATTLE OF AGRA.

The battle of Agra is one of those brilliant passages of arms which stand out conspicuously in the story of a long campaign—one of those dashing and chivalrous engagements which remind us of Cœur-de-Lion. Lion hearts, indeed, the brave men have shown throughout the horrors of the Indian mutiny—hearts that exercised the heroism of patience, as well as that of courage—hearts that knew how to die, but did not know how to surrender.

Agra is the capital of the province of that name. Much of it is ruinous, its streets are narrow and unpaved, and its houses are of brick with flat roofs. The fortress is of considerable extent, and built of roughly hewn red sandstone. The chief architectural attraction is the Taj Mahal, or Crown of Empires, a mosque-like building of white marble, which, according to Bernier, deserves to be numbered with the wonders of the world.

The city was fortified centuries ago, before the English sent out a ship or knew the value of a rupee. In the days of our Henry VII. it was made the seat of Mohammedan government. Half a century later it was embellished by Akbar, the most illustrious of Indian emperors. But whatever traditions may hang about its ruins in connection with the oriental splendour once seen within its streets, to us it is chiefly interesting for the battle so bravely fought a few weeks back, and for the victory achieved over the rebels by Colonel Greathed and his brave troops.

On the 18th of October the feeble garrison of the town, in hourly danger of the mutineers, were relieved by the arrival of a considerable force commanded by Colonel Greathed. These troops had just encamped, and were busily preparing their breakfasts, when a sudden alarm was raised that the rebels were on them. The mutineers, in fact, not suspecting that succour had arrived, were marching down on the Agra garrison, bent on fire and slaughter, ready for a repetition of the horrible atrocities by which they had distinguished themselves in other places.

Four Ghazees (Mohammedan fanatics), bearing drums, now entered the camp, and cut down an officer, who was washing, and a sergeant-major, who was asleep. Their guns opened on our camp, while their cavalry charged our flank, before our men had time to seize their arms, and succeeded in capturing one of our guns. Never was surprise more complete, nor one more rapidly repelled. In five minutes our men were in their saddles, and before the fifth shot of the enemy had been fired, our horse artillery were replying. The Sikhs charged first, followed by the 9th Lancers in their shirts, when the infantry, consisting of her Majesty's 8th and 75th, with the Sikhs, came into action, and our guns opened fire. Lieutenant French was killed, Lieutenant Jones severely wounded, while, with nine of the lancers, they attacked about fifty Sepoys in possession of the gun, which was instantly retaken. Colonel Cotton, who chanced to be on the ground at the time, as senior officer, instantly took command. A stout resistance was at first attempted; but on the approach of our guns, the hearts of the rebels failed them. Rushing down the Gwalior road, they dispersed themselves over the fields of millet, with which the country was covered. The lancers and Sikh cavalry kept at their heels, and cut them to pieces; while the horse artillery, always in advance, mowed them down with grape. Where the crops were too heavy for horse to penetrate, they were pursued by her Majesty's 8th and 75th regiments, and the 2nd and 4th Punjab infantry. The worn-out men gained strength from the excitement, and the wearied horses sympathised with their riders. After a fierce contest of two hours, during which great havoc was occasioned by our artillery, the enemy were completely routed, and driven ten miles along the road to Gwalior, where they only escaped by being able to reach the river. Here a body of infantry, drawn up on the farther bank to assist the fugitives, were cut to pieces by our guns. All their baggage, camp equipage, and treasure, their guns (thirteen in number), with an enormous quantity of plunder, fell into our hands. They are said to have left about 2,000 dead on the field, our casualties amounting to about eighty. Greathed's force, which had now been sixteen days almost incessantly on the march, during which they had fought two pitched battles, and four affairs of lesser note, in which together about 4,000 of the enemy must have fallen, found a brief breathing space in Agra. A portion of the fugitive insurgents made their way to Bhurtpore, where they were refused admittance, and ordered by the rajah to lay down their arms. On refusing to do so, six or eight were killed on the spot, fourteen were taken prisoners, of whom six were hung at Agra. The rest of them escaped. At Muttra, Mynpoorie, and all the other forts and towns around, they were signally repelled.

LATSON.

BY FELIX STOWE.

CHAPTER XVII.

ANOTHER VICTORY FOR THE HERO.

WHILE the lord of Latson Towers was asserting the independence of his race, (as only small-minded Englishmen can) among Frenchmen, Germans, and Italians, by a manner and vocabulary of incessant braggadocio; and while the same great man, on his return home, was striving to forget certain scenes of his past life, and yet was laying up fresh materials for future memories every day; and while those church bells, which, like so many human bells, can mourn and rejoice with such wonderful versatility, were first ringing out a peal at an infant's birth, and then another peal, with muffled clapper, when the mother died; and while the elder son, elsewhere, was growing up under the angel's eye, and afterwards going out to find a bush for himself, among the lowest servants in a London public-house,—there was going on a very different scene, away and away, down in Shropshire.

What had become, all this while, of poor old Claymore?

You had better not ask.

And yet it would not be doing justice to the memory of the Honourable Hugh, whose name our narrative bears, if we didn't tell something more of the most helpless of his victims.

Claymore had never been the man he was, ever since the scene in the churchyard, with the bridal pair. Ruth and her mother had marked the change in him, more and more, at every visit he paid to London, and to number nineteen.

They scarcely ever saw him after he had given his grandson the curious name; but when he did come, they remarked that he sat for hours and said nothing, nothing even to little Hugh. He would let the little fellow get up or get down from his knee, hardly taking any notice when he did so; and, except that when he left the house, he always took the boy between his knees and looked sadly down (oh, so sadly!) into his little face, and never left off looking till he had burst into tears, and then kept on looking still, through the tears, so that Hugh could make nothing of it,—(but for this), the Wofields would have been much sooner concerned about him, than they were.

While the old man could cry, he kept tolerably well (we say old man, but it is rather absurd to say so, for he was old only in appearance, having become old by heavy trials), but, as long as he could weep, he took no serious harm.

It was when he ceased to shed tears, and ceased to show any interest in his grandchild, that the real burden of Joyce's sufferings came upon his dear old heart.

Thank God, poor mourner! for the safety valve of a flood of tears. Don't tell us that you are the most wretched of mortals, as long as you can keep open that valve: we have seen sorrow, infinitely worse to bear, and infinitely worse to witness than any of yours.

Claymore stopped his London visits; and, one day, there came to number nineteen a very feebly directed letter, which, on being opened by Ruth, read thus:—

"DEAR MISS WOFIELD—You will be sorry to hear that Mr. Claymore is very unwell, and quite unable to come to see you; I fear he will be unable for a long time; indeed, since he was last in London, I have scarcely known what to make of him. On the very night of his reaching home, I met him as usual at the Coach-office, and I shall never forget the shock I got when I saw him; he got down from the hind seat of the coach, where he generally sat, and when I went up to him, to ask him how he was after his journey, he looked very strange indeed, as if he would look me through (but not unkindly either), and said not a single word. I asked him how he was, and he only smiled; such a smile! I prayed never to see it again, but I've seen it many times since. Well, I could get nothing, not a word, from him, all the way to our cottage; except, yes, he did say once (and that made it worse, for what he meant I couldn't imagine), 'We must take care of the snow, my dear!'—and you remember it was among the hottest days in the summer, about that time.

"Since then, I have had everything to do for him, just as if he were a child. He is very patient: never asks for anything, and takes but little notice. I have not been able to hear from him a single word of his journey. I know nothing even about the darling boy. Oh! how I should like to see him! Mr. Claymore walks out every day; and the neighbours are struck with the difference in him. But they say nothing, of course, to me about it. Pray for him, my dear Miss Wofield. We were very happy once, and little thought we should ever come into such deep, deep trouble. Don't think anything worse of our poor Joyce. She would thank you, if she could, as we do, for all your great, great kindness to her poor baby. Yes, and she will thank you, another day. I will tell you if anything worse happens. Meanwhile,

"Believe me,

"Your thankful, sincere friend,

"JOYCE CLAYMORE."

The old man continued for many months very much in the same condition.

You could have done anything with him. If you had said—"Mr. Claymore, put your hand into the fire, and hold it there," he would most likely have looked up at you, with a sweet, contented-looking smile, and would have done it instantly.

Only two things ever disturbed him, or moved him out of his usual track.

He could pass any number of male beggars without noticing them. But if he saw a woman apparently in any trouble, or asking alms, he used to say—

"If you please, will you come to my house?"

And the poor old lady had enough to do, to prevent his giving away the first thing that came to hand, especially anything he used most to care for.

Then, a baby in arms—that was sure to rouse him at once.

He was known to stop many a poor woman, and ask her to let him carry her infant for her. But they generally knew better, for he would most certainly have dropped it from his old, shaking arms in no time. Then he would stoop down and kiss the little thing, with his old tender smile, and pass on, telling its nurse, whatever she did, to "take care of the snow, for it was very deep further on!"

One of his fancies gave the poor old woman much pain.

He insisted (if it is not a strange thing to imagine him strong enough to insist upon anything, but his sad, sweet smile insisted) that the little room in which his daughter used to sleep, before she left home for the London square, should be put into order, and arranged exactly as it used to be; even the bed-clothes being turned down at the top, as if just ready for the sleeper.

Towards the end of the father's illness, his wife more than once missed him from their room, in the middle of the night, and on going into Joyce's chamber, she found him kneeling down by the side of the bed, with his face upon the pillow, and his arms stretched out across it, as if in prayer.

It was not in prayer. But he was repeating to himself (though his poor wife didn't know it), the scene in Mrs. Griffin's cottage, when the snow had been so deep on the ground, and when the Honourable Hugh was delivered from all further fear of annihilation.

Who shall tell what thoughts passed through that old man's mind, during those few melancholy years?

Wordsworth says of the quiet insane, borrowing a Scripture sentence, "They are dead, and their life is hid with Christ in God." A wonderful thought, and, no doubt, very often true.

It is certain, that there was now never any sign of vengeance, or even any proof that his enemy was unforgiven, in Claymore's looks, or in his rare and brief expressions. That was the most touching thing about him. He seemed to love everybody, and the more as his own heavy woe weighed lower and lower upon his heart, and wrought out its mischief, as it was doing very fast, on his poor brain. No one ever said a sharp thing about a neighbour, in his presence, but he would be sure to lift his pensive eyes from the ground, where they generally rested, and turn them on the speaker, with the old smile, but with a shade of wonder and regret on the thin old face. So that the fault-finder was generally obliged to put in a word of apology for himself, or to try to get off with a little eulogy, by way of compensation.

CHAPTER XVIII.

RECORDS A MEETING AND A PARTING.

It was a very soft and lovely evening towards the end of the month of September, that Ruth and Hugh arrived at Arland on a visit for a day or two, after a good deal of saving up for the purpose, and many a little piece of economy, both in selling and buying.

This was when the child was about seven years of age, and, therefore, about three or four years before he turned out to seek his fortune at the inn.

Claymore sat outside the cottage, with his old velvet cap on his head, and his hands—now very trembling—leaning on his stick. His wife was coming along with the visitors, whom she had gone to meet at the coach office, just as she used to do with her old man when he returned from London.

Hugh ran on before the women, on learning who it was sitting in the little front garden, and soon had his arms round his grandfather's neck.

This was nothing new to Claymore, for every child almost in the village had done it again and again, during those four or five years that had passed since he had seen his grandson.

"Well, grandpa," said the boy, "you wouldn't come to see us, so aunt Ruth and me were forced to come to see you."

There was just a momentary change passed over his countenance as the old man caught the sound of the lad's voice.

But that was all.

He smiled down upon him exactly as he would have done upon any Arland boy, and stooped down to kiss his forehead.

By this time Ruth and her companion had come up, and were waiting at the gate for an instant to see how Hugh would get on.

"Does he know him, Mrs. Claymore, do you think?" said Ruth.

"Let's try," she answered; "but I think not."

"My love, here's Miss Wofield and our dear darling boy come to see us. That's Hugh—used to be little Hugh—sitting on your knee. Kiss grandfather, my boy."

And the boy did, many a time.

Ruth very likely would not be much pained by it, because she did not know that he received everybody now in this gentle, affectionate manner. But it was very sad to the old woman, when he said not a word, but merely looked, with his usual look of innocent, and now almost insensible complacency, first at one, and then at another.

"We've had such a nice ride, grandpa," said the boy; "and it's done aunt Ruth such good! Doesn't she look rosy?"

At last, he tried to mutter something; and the smile was gone now, and gave place to a very serious and uneasy expression. They thought he wanted Ruth to come nearer.

And when she did, he said, with great difficulty—behind Hugh's head, who still sat on his knee—

"You'd better go back, my dear, before the snow gets any deeper."

Ruth understood in a moment how matters were; and, giving a look towards Mrs. Claymore, turned away, and shed some very bitter tears, as she marked one more victim of cruel wrong: one more sacrifice on the altar of Fashionable—and very Justifiable, because Fashionable—Homicide!

There was no more recognition than this, all the remainder of the evening. And when Mrs. Claymore and Ruth went to sleep that night in one room, and the old man went to lie down beside the boy, on the other bed—where Joyce used to be—if the grandfather lost some comfort through not knowing how near to him was his precious little Hugh, he was spared some agony in not remembering, more vividly than was common, what his mother had borne, and where she lay that night.

After all, it was some satisfaction to Ruth that they had met once again. However distressing she felt it, that the mind had broken down before it should have done, in the ordinary course of nature, it was nevertheless a comfort to her (and she did her best so to put it to Hugh), that he evidently suffered very little, and was every day suffering less and less. There were many other forms his affliction might have taken; but this form, though as painful as any to lookers-on, was, perhaps, as tolerable as any to himself.

If any person supposes that the Arland family, or the family at number nineteen, ever heard a syllable from Latson Towers, in fulfilment of a certain promise, that person is much mistaken, and we have failed in conveying to that person our own estimate of the character of our hero.

It is well they never did hear anything.

What would they have heard?

Would you have liked, that little Hugh should have touched any of the rich man's gold? Would you have liked, that the poverty of the family at number nineteen should have been tempted into taking one sixpence?

And, as to the Claymores, it was hard enough, already, to see that poor old heart beating itself feebly to pieces on the rock on which it had been basely cast—what would you have felt, if its last struggles had been insulted by the gold of the destroyer?

There was, however, no fear of it.

The promise had, been extorted, not from repentance, but from cowardice. If Judas had lived, instead of going out to hang himself, in a spasm of remorse, the human certainty is, that instead of repenting, he would have become the leader of the worst persecutors, and have stained his hands in the blood of the servants, when the Master was beyond his reach.

And yet we are apt, for the moment, to pity Judas, in the hour of his suicide; as we almost felt inclined to feel for the rich man, in the agony of an avenging conscience. Let us guard against that. There are no two sorrows so different from each other, as the sorrow for having done wrong, and the sorrow for being punished.

As long as that scene was before him—

But, we beg pardon; we are now at Arland, and we were merely saying that the old couple were spared the ignominy of any communication from the Wiltshire squire.

The pillow upon which poor old Claymore's head was found, on the morning after the visitors' arrival, had no thorns in it, as it would have had, if one feather had come from Latson Towers.

When Hugh woke up, he began to put his little arm over to his grandfather's side of the bed, and there it lay, for some time, across his breast, while Hugh, though wide awake, unwilling to disturb his bedfellow, waited for him to move.

He will move another day, when all that are in their graves shall come forth, at the voice of the archangel!

Hugh had lain there for a long-time, with his arm across his grandfather.

At length he raised himself in bed on his other elbow, and leaned over the old man.

Still he thought him sleeping. He was too young to tell the difference—so unmistakable to the eye of experience—between the short and the long, long sleep.

Presently Ruth rapped at the door.

"Sh, sh!" said Hugh, in a loud whisper.

But, as it was now quite late, the young woman gently turned the handle, and came softly in.

The boy was lying as before, with his arm over his grandfather's breast. But he knitted his brow, and repeated the "Hush," adding, "He's fast asleep, aunt. Shall I get up?"

Ruth looked at the bed.

She had seen that sight before—she, and the London pew-opener, some years back—and was not to be deceived. She flew to the bed side, the old man's side, and laid the back of her fingers against his cheek.

That touch no person living can ever mistake.

The father was deep, deep in the snow now, and Ruth felt the shock, which no other snow ever gives.

"Aunt! aunt!" said the child, when he saw her run to the door, and call aloud for Mrs. Claymore; "is grandpa ill?—what's the matter?"

And the little fellow sprang up in bed, and looked hard into the white, pinched up face.

And then he, too, knew the worst (ought we to say the worst?), and his tears fell down, among his own little fingers, and he passed them up and down, in tenderest love, over the countenance of the sleeper in his last sleep.

If ever you should be near that little village church down in Shropshire, it would be worth your while to seek out a certain quiet, shady spot, close under a window on the right-hand side of the church.

You will there see a grave that is still bound with osiers—for in those parts the dwellings of the dead are held more sacred than in cities. Above it there droops, as chief mourner, a faithful willow-tree. Little Hugh planted it, a mere sprig from the cottage garden, on the day before he left with his aunt on his return to London.

The osiers, we believe, have never but once been disturbed since then, and that was very soon afterwards.

If you have ever watched two trees for many years, growing side by side in a forest, and have known one of them to be blown down in a storm, you have, no doubt, observed that the other is very apt to begin to pine away, and at last to die. It had lost the shelter of companionship—it had every blast to bear all alone—and so it died.

It is frequently thus with an old faithful couple. Let one go, the other is not long in following.

The osiers were thus disturbed once more, and only once.

It was when the clergyman, who, along with Ruth, and little Hugh, and the poor tottering widow, had thanked God for "delivering our brother out of the miseries of this sinful world," had, very soon after, to repeat the words with a slight change; and then prayed, that "when we depart this life, we may rest in Him, as our hope is this our sister doth!"

CHAPTER XIX.

EDUCATION.

THE hatchment had long been removed from the front of Latson Towers.

There it hung, up in the church, a fit symbol of death in high places. Gaudy figures of red, yellow, and blue on a dark, black ground. And the arms of the houses of Latson and Blance blended on that scutcheon, in deep, ostentatious mourning.

The mansion looked, in that lovely September weather, as unconcerned at the loss of its gentle, lovely mistress, as it was about the village funeral many miles away.

But there was one person within those splendid halls who was just as much concerned at the event as he was when it first happened.

Latson?

No; but a worthy retainer of the family, who had been a sort of mixed steward, butler, or valet, for many a year before the present master was born.

Grange—Ralph Grange—had rejoiced exceedingly at Latson's marriage.

He didn't know the exact things that we know; but probably he knew things quite as bad, and, at all events, quite enough to wish a fair trial to be given of a settled married life.

"The old master," he used to say, in the servants' hall, when none of the commoner household was present,—

"The old master would ha' turned out a vast deal better than he did, if he'd ha' married earlier, instead of when he was past five-and-forty,—leastways, I make bold to think as much."

For the fact was, that the colonel's father never took kindly to domestic life, and never did much more honour to it than his son after him.

Hence good old Grange rejoiced on the wedding-day; and thoroughly he loved, and devoutly he worshipped Ethel. So that although it would have been more than his place was worth to venture a syllable, either to husband or wife, on the state of affairs between them, that was the solitary topic upon which he never used the icicle of his years and his long term of service.

It was only down stairs, as he sat in the chief seat by the chimney-corner (a post of honour always yielded him in the hall) smoking his pipe, during the long evenings, with no one, perhaps, but the house-keeper present, or, at most, another old stager in the family,—it was only then that he was wont to allow himself a little relief, and, between the puffs, bemoan his bitter disappointment.

Long and sad were the private interviews the old man had with Mrs. Glyde, Ethel's maid; and very profound were the moralisings the excellent couple spent upon their mistress's woes and their master's faults.

On this particular day, the old man was seated, towards evening, on his throne of supremacy in the corner, and Mrs. Glyde, who, after Ethel's death, was retained at her express request, to have the head responsibility over little Claude, was on the opposite side of the room, busy with some needlework.

"My dear," said Ralph, "you talk nonsense, which isn't common with you—leastways if I may say it without offending ye. It ain't the fact: the company as visits this house doesn't make the master; it's the master makes the company."

"What do you mean, Mr Grange?"

"Why, mean! I mean that when there's no company whatsoever, things is just as bad. It's been a comin' on and a comin' on from the very week of the funeral. Ah! and here the old man gave a great sigh—"there was a touch of it long before that, my dear, if you'd only known it."

"Mr. Grange!" cried the other.

"I carried him up stairs"—here he spoke very low—"with these very arms, I can tell ye; and much as I loved him, I could ha' dropped him over the banisters, for a good sound lesson, right to the bottom, I can tell ye, I was so mad with him, I was."

"And did she ever know it?"

"Know it! didn't she? of course she knew it; and she thought he was bad, and was goin' for to send for the Lord knows who—doctors and what not—but I stopped her."

"How?" said Mrs. Glyde.

"I told a plumping lie, my dear—leastways, if you'll excuse my saying so face to face. I told her it was a little fainting-fit that he'd had two or three times before; and if he was only left to himself he came round naturally, but a doctor had always made him worse."

"And she had no suspicion?"

"No more than Master Claude, my dear. But bless your life, it was never like this, and I never believed it would come to this."

And here the good old fellow's voice thickened, and he dashed his coat-cuff against his eyes very quickly, looking carefully and sily at Mrs. Glyde; for one of his aversions was against showing emotion before a woman.

"But did he hurt ye, last night, Mr. Ralph?" she asked.

"Do ye think it would hurt you, my dear, if I took you by the throat, and scrunched it, till ye were black in the face? Hurt! But I'll tell ye what it is. If your pretty face hadn't shown at the door, with Master Claude, just when ye did, Ralph Grange wouldn't ha' been sitting here smoking and jawing with Mrs. Glyde."

And the lady's-maid shuddered, and told him not to say such dreadful things.

"But it's very odd, Mr. Ralph, how the child keeps him a little in order at these times."

"Not at all, my dear. He dotes on the boy, and he's ashamed for the youngster to see what a father he's got. Why, last week, only last week, he was a sparring at me as usual, when Master Claude came running in unexpected; and blow me, if he didn't turn it off as clever, telling the little chit that old Ralph was teaching papa to box. I never see such a thing in my life! And I, like a fool, took the hint, and there we set to work, pretending to be a brace of fancy men. I wouldn't ha' believed in the thing, if my own eyes hadn't seen it. But I can tell ye, I blessed Master Claude in my heart. For ye see, my dear, Ralph Grange isn't the man he was. Aye, let him ha' tried that game thirty years, yes, twenty years ago, and master or no master, once would ha' been enough for him, leastways to my thinking."

And Mr. Grange puffed out the smoke, and lifted the tankard to his mouth, with a keen relish, as he thought of himself in "the light of other days."

"Still, still, don't mis-hear me, my dear. I love him yet, as my own son—and he loves me, in his way, I fully believe. This morning, when I went to call him, after asking me to give him what he calls his 'razor,' that is, a glass of the confounded Hollands, first thing, he said, says he, 'Ralph, my boy, did I come my old pranks with ye, last night, old fellow?' Says I, 'Fact is, sir, we must part, if this goes on, though it tears my heart to say it.'

"So, says he, 'I'll never touch another drop of that brandy, Ralph: keep to Hollands, and I'm all right. Forgive me, old fellow; you've got your revenge this morning, you rascal, for my head will burst, I do believe. I was worse than usual, wasn't I, Ralph?'

"So I told him—what's the real fact—that he was worse and worse every time. And then he began to talk, my dear, about his great troubles, and how it would never have happened, if the Lady Ethel had only been living. And he said bad words, Mrs. Glyde, which far be from me to tell in your ears, about Providence, and that sort of thing, till I was obliged to stop him."

"All this while he was walking about his room in his dressing-gown, with both his hands to his head, and going every minute to the cold water, and sousing his forehead in the basin. There," said Mr. Grange, "I tell ye, my dear, on my word and honour, that I felt, as I listened to that poor gentleman, as if I never could touch even my humble pint any more as long as I lived."

Just at this moment, the bell rang violently, the library bell, and the man who answered it, brought down word that the carriage was ordered round in ten minutes' time. The colonel would not dine at home that evening.

"There it is! there it is, my dear!" said Ralph. "We're in for another night of it now, mark my words!"

And the old steward got up, and walked about the room, in evident distress of mind.

"Is Master Claude in the library?" asked Mrs. Glyde of the footman who brought the bad news.

"Yes," said the man, "and my opinion is, there's the cause. Something has put the little gentleman into his tantrums, and master can do nothing with him."

Presently the bell rang twice, which was the signal for Mrs. Glyde herself to go up.

When she entered the library, the young scion of the house was sprawling on the rug in a terrible fit of rage.

He instantly started up, on seeing Mrs. Glyde, and ran shrieking towards her.

"Take my papa away," cried Claude. "He says there's naughty people in the room, and they'll run away with Claude!"

And the woman really thought that the child would have had a fit as he ran up to her, and hid his face in her skirts.

The bottle was on the table, and the master of the house sat there, with his tumbler half filled, and looking as even he seldom did so early in the day.

"Claude!" he shouted, at the top of his voice, "come here this moment!"

And then followed words which we are not going to write down here—words which, as the head nurse afterwards remarked, "chilled her to the very marrow."

"Leave the room, woman!" cried Latson. "It was the child rang the bell, not I. Leave us, I say. Stop—is the carriage ready?"

"I think it is, sir; I'll inquire."

And she went, and brought back word that the carriage was at the door.

He went out; and it was two full hours before the servants could bring the "poor little fellow into a quieter mood."

"He's a wicked, wicked man, Mrs. Glyde," he cried again and again. "He said mamma would come and take me away before I got up in the morning; and he said she was gone where all the bad people go! Oh! what shall I do? May I sleep with you, Mrs. Glyde?"

"Yes, my jewel; yes, to be sure! Now be quiet, there's a dear, and come and sit with me a little, and let's look over the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' shall we, Claude?"

And the poor child sobbed away upon her apron; and was soon after deep in the never-failing story of the pilgrims getting out of Doubting Castle with the key called "Promise."

And when Mrs. Glyde laid him down to sleep that night, she knelt down beside his bed (for she had learnt how to pray in the countess's family long ago), and she prayed aloud, while his little arms were fast twisted round her neck, that "little Claude might one day go out and be a pilgrim to the Celestial City, and find his dear mamma waiting for him on the banks of the river!"

CHAPTER XX.

NOT ON THE BENCH.

No one was up when the carriage returned, save Ralph and the men outside in the stables.

Ralph took care of that.

It was half-past three, and Latson had been to the house of one of his worst companions, five miles off.

It was well no one saw his master but the faithful old fellow.

When the footman let down the steps, no one descended; and there was nothing for it, but for the man to help Ralph in getting its occupant safely out, dead drunk, and carrying him, at once, up the staircase into his own room.

"Well!" said the footman, afterwards, when he went out to say good night, or good morning, to the coachman; "this must come to a finish, my hearty, before long, eh?"

But the coachman was in no humour for a joke. He had been kept waiting outside the house at a distance, for three hours; and you have, perhaps, heard how coachmen are given to converse, under these circumstances.

Before he was out of bed, the private bell rang Ralph into his master's room that morning.

On going in, he found Latson in his dressing-gown, crouching down in the corner of the chamber; the lamp having been extinguished by an overturn, an hour or so before, while the colonel was moving about to find the bottle, which, however, he did not find. Old Ralph had carried it away.

"So you're come, are you!" cried the colonel; "and I'm to be left here, am I, to be eaten up by these things, bit by bit, while you are laughing at me, in your innocent dreams, a mile off!"

Our readers will excuse us from putting down the exact words that the colonel used. They must witness and hear for themselves, which we pray they never may, before they can have a true picture of such a scene.

"Do you see him?" shouted Latson. "Ugh; ugh! look! he's coming this way! Ralph! I say! keep him off, will ye!"

And the poor old servant went up to his master, and implored him to be assured that nothing was in the room, and no one but himself.

But the cold sweat dropped from the wretched drunkard's forehead; and for one long hour a spectacle lasted in that sumptuous bedroom, which some ignorant people look for only in the cellars of the poor, or the slums of the world's dregs.

A larger dose than usual of a strong sedative, which Ralph always had near him, wrought, at length, a little quietness in the blazing brain of the colonel.

But the man never forgot that night.

And little Claude trembled as he heard the sounds, and remembered his father's threats, even in his nurse's arms.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.

THE Charity Commissioners' reports furnish, among many others, the following curious instances of attempts on the part of individuals to perpetuate their memory at the smallest possible cost.

On one of the indentures of gift to the parish of Hampstead, there is an indorsement stating that £40 had been given by a maid deceased, that the churchwardens of Hampstead for the time being might provide and give to every one, rich and poor, great and small, young and old, residing in the parish, upon every Good Friday, yearly for ever, one halfpenny loaf of wheaten bread.

In volume twenty-nine there is a report, stating how one Matthew Wall, of Braughing, by will, in 1595, charged all his lands and tenements in the above parish with the yearly payment of twenty shillings, to be distributed by the minister and churchwardens on St. Matthew's day, in the following manner:—

To the sexton to make up his grave yearly, and to ring the bell, one shilling and tenpence; to twenty boys, between the age of six and sixteen, twenty groats; to ten aged and impotent people of the parish, ten threepences; to sweep the path from his house to the church gate every year, one shilling; to the crier of Stortford, to make proclamation yearly, on Ascension and Michaelmas day, that he left his estate to a Matthew or William Wall, as long as the world should endure, eightpence; to the parish clerk at Hallingbury, for the same purpose, eightpence; and to the minister and churchwardens, to see his will performed, five shillings.

It is doubtful, however, whether Matthew Wall was a greater humbug (c'est le mot) than William Norrice, who, in consideration of the love he bore to the parish of All Saints, wherein he was born and had lived, by the mercy of God, for fourscore and nine years, and for the charitable devotion he had to the poor people of the said parish, granted a yearly rent of fifteen shillings, issuing out of certain garden ground in or near Soar Lane, upon the conditions that the minister and churchwardens should yearly, upon the Sunday next before the feast of St. Bartholomew, meet and elect forty-one of the poorest people residing in the parish of All Saints, and deliver a list of their names to the clerk of the parish, and cause him to give notice that all persons whose names were contained in that list should personally attend evening prayer on St. Bartholomew's day, and that the minister should on the said feast day, after the second lesson at evening prayer, exhort the people to praise God for his great mercy in providing for the poor, and should make choice of a fit psalm for that purpose, desiring the people to sing that psalm with him; and after evening prayer the minister and churchwardens shall cause the clerk to call the said forty-one people into some convenient place in the church, calling each by his name, and in a loud voice, and to give each fourpence, and the minister, and churchwardens, and clerk were to have fourpence each; all which being satisfied, the said poor should depart, glorifying God; and in the event of these formalities not being observed, the annuity to cease. In striking contrast to this ridiculous bequest was that of Mr. George Jarvis, of Stanton-upon-Wye, to whom it cannot be objected that he wanted the desire to do good, but who certainly failed in adopting the best means of attaining that end. He gave by will, in 1790, thirty thousand pounds, to be invested in government securities in trust, to apply the yearly produce thereof, in money, provision, physic, or clothes, to the poor of this parish, of Bredwardine, and Litten.

The funds applicable to the purpose of carrying out the donor's will had increased in 1822 from £30,000 to £92,246 17s. 9d. Bank Three per cent. consols.

The commissioners observed, "That the population of the three parishes was only 1,180, and the income arising from the charity nearly £3,000 per annum, it must be obvious that even under the most judicious system of management such a charity would be likely to be productive of considerable evils, and accordingly it appeared at the time of the inquiry, that it had encouraged a spirit of discontent and a disposition to idleness and improvidence, and had attracted to the parishes numerous persons from other districts, with a view of entitling themselves to a participation in the charity."

The following extract is from the will of Thomas Spackman: it says little for the flourishing condition of the church in his day:—

"June 5th, 1675. I do charge my lands with twenty-one shillings by the year, and to continue for ever; viz., one shilling to the minister of the parish, to remind him of his duty in catechising the children; twenty shillings to the poor of the parish yearly, to be given them at the church, viz., five shillings on St. Thomas's day, five shillings on the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, five shillings on St. John the Baptist's, and five shillings on St. Matthew's day. My will is, that twenty poor people do receive threepence apiece, and that they be at the church at the beginning of prayers, or else to have no share; if the number be not twenty, then the remains to be given to them that are best deserving; and if they can, let them sing the 15th Psalm. Now if the minister be a good man, he will be careful to see this my will performed, for the honour of the church, that at this day is almost destitute."

Considering that the value of money in 1724 was not much greater than at the present day, one would imagine that William Minter might have been satisfied with something less than the performance of the conditions he annexes to a bequest of £5 with which he favours the poor of Gonerby. He directs that bread should be distributed among sixteen aged people yearly, on Good Friday, "a threepenny dole apiece," and the clerk was "to toll the bell at three o'clock, and to read the Epistle and Gospel, and sing the Lamentation of a Sinner," and to have one shilling reward.

In volume thirty-one a singular method of distributing charity is mentioned as occurring at Bulkeley, in Cheshire. This township was entitled to nineteen shillings and twopence as its proportion of certain consolidated charities, and the overseers, on receiving the amount, changed it into pence and halfpence, and, placing them in a peck measure, invited each poor person to take a handful until the measure was emptied.

It is not probable that any difficulty ever arises in finding properly qualified recipients for the following charity:—

John Nicholson, of London, stationer, by will, dated 28th April, 1717, after bequeathing several legacies, gave all the residue of his estate in charity, towards the support and maintenance of such poor persons of the kingdom of England as are named Nicholson, being protestants; and he directed it to be disposed of in the following manner, namely: one hundred pounds a year to two such poor persons, men or women, of the name of Nicholson, towards their advancement in marriage; to each of them fifty pounds, always observing that no more than fifty pounds be given to any one couple so marrying;

One hundred pounds per annum towards putting apprentice such poor boys and girls of the name of Nicholson, or towards setting them up, as his trustees should think fit;

And one hundred pounds per annum towards the support and maintenance of such poor men and women of the name of Nicholson as his trustees should direct, always observing that not more than ten pounds a year, and not less than five pounds a year, should be given to any one person, the said sum to be paid to them at their own habitations;

William Nicolson, Lord Bishop of Carlisle; Mr. Nicolson, the bishop's son, and three other persons of the name of Nicolson, two of whom resided in London, he appointed trustees; and left to them the entire management of this charity, and appointed them his executors.

In 1822 the commissioners reported that the property belonging to this charity consisted of £9,273 5s. 3d. stock, producing a dividend of £278 4s.

An ambitious individual named Greene, desirous of handing his name down to posterity, chooses waistcoats as a vehicle for that purpose.

Henry Greene, by will, gave to his sister, Catherine Greene, during her life, all his lands in Melbourne and Newton, and after her decease to others, in trust, on condition that the said Catherine Greene should give four green waistcoats to four poor women every year, such four green waistcoats to be lined with green galloon lace, and to be delivered to the said poor women on or before the 21st December, yearly, that they might be worn on Christmas day.

All originals, however foolish they may be, are quite certain to have imitators; accordingly, Henry Greene's example was speedily followed by Thomas Gray, of the same village, who, by his will, directed his executrix, Mary Gray, and others, to lay out £200 in the purchase of lands; and out of the profits of such lands to lay out six nobles yearly, to buy six waistcoats of gray cloth, edged with blue galloon lace, and forty shillings to buy three coats of gray cloth, to be faced with baize; and that four of the said waistcoats should be given yearly to four poor widows or other poor women, living in Castle Donnington, who were to be of good behaviour and endeavour to live honestly; and the other two waistcoats to two poor widows or women of like behaviour, of the parish of Melbourne, and two of the coats to be given yearly to two poor men of Castle Donnington, and the other to a poor man of Melbourne.

He also directed copies of his will to be entered in the town-books of Castle Donnington and Melbourne, and also hung up in their churches, and that the same should be read yearly on St. Thomas's day, or the following Sunday, after prayers; for the performance of which he directed that the ministers of the said parishes should have five shillings apiece.

Perhaps the origin of the expression "to provide for a rainy day" may be found in the following extract from a will, dated December 14, 1674, by which Thomas Williamson bequeathed the sum of £20 to be laid out in land, the proceeds to be expended in the purchase of veal, or mutton, at Martinmas, yearly, when flesh might be thought cheapest; to be divided among poor people born within St. John's Chapelry, or Castlerigg, to be by them pickled or hung up and dried, that they might have something to keep them within doors on stormy days.

Dogs appear to have been frequent attendants at churches formerly, more than one instance being mentioned in the reports, of bequests made for the purpose of paying a man to drive them out. Among others, Richard Dovey, in a deed granting certain premises to John Saunders, stipulates, that a man is to be placed in one of the cottages adjoining the churchyard, and to be paid eight shillings yearly, on condition that he awake sleepers and drove dogs out of the church during Divine Service. While another,

HEROIC CONDUCT OF PEPIN-LE-BREF.

John Rudge, bequeathed twenty shillings a year for a like purpose, viz., to a poor man, to go about the parish church of Trysull, during sermons, to keep people awake, and to keep dogs out of the church.

The extracts given above are all more or less ridiculous; but the following, extracted from volume thirty-one of "The Reports," is of a totally different kind, and refers to a man whose name is familiar to all:—

Mrs. Elizabeth Cook, of Clapham, Surrey, widow of Captain Cook, by her will, dated April 8th, 1833, gave to the minister, churchwardens, and overseers of St. Andrew the Great (Cambridge), and their successors, £1,000 Three per cent. consols upon trust, to apply the dividends and interest in and towards the keeping clean and in repair the monument and inscription put up by her in the church to the memory of her husband, Captain Cook and family, as also a stone in the middle of the said church with her name and the names of her sons inscribed and to be inscribed thereon; and after the payment of the charges incident thereto, and of £2 annually to the minister for the trouble he might have in the trust, the residue of the dividends and interests to be distributed yearly on the 21st of December equally between five poor and aged women of good character, resident within and belonging to the parish, and not receiving parochial relief, to be named by the minister, churchwardens, and overseers for the time being, or a majority.

THE COMBAT IN THE ARENA.

AN HISTORICAL INCIDENT.

THE strong rule the weak. They have done so ever since there were powerful men to lead and weak men to follow; and until human nature changes very materially, the destinies of the world will continue to be swayed by comparatively very few master spirits, with strong brains to plan, and iron will to execute. If we look at the history of any nation during a certain number of centuries, we shall be surprised to find how a few strong hands have built up or cast down empires. To take an illustration from a subject fraught with peculiar interest at the present time. How many men, it may be asked, were required to establish our empire in India? Two: Robert Clive and Warren Hastings. When the first of these men changed his writership for a command, in taking which he became the leader of a few soldiers of doubtful fidelity, and more than doubtful courage, our influence in India was at its lowest ebb. The French and Dupleix were carrying all before them, filling the land with the fame of their prowess, from the Himalaya to Cape Comorin. Yet the one strong hand could turn the scale in favour of our countrymen, avenge the atrocious "Black Hole" massacre at Calcutta, win for us Plassey, and establish our men as a military power where we had been only a company of traders, exposed to the rapacity of any Surajah Dowlah whose rapacity we failed to satisfy. It was the strong arm and the clear head of that one man through which we ruled the great peninsula of India; and it was the decision, the talent, the strength of Hastings which preserved for us what Robert Clive had won.

There is a strange uniformity in the history of nations. We always come to a period when the country seems, without any recognised ruler, to be completely at the mercy of a certain number of chiefs. Strife and confusion run riot for a time; and then there appears, like the god in the old Greek tragedies, some man of power and skill, who brings order out of confusion, and with a strong hand makes the strife to cease. This strong man is known by different names in various countries; but his characteristics are everywhere the same—decision, energy, and force of will. In Norway they called him Harald Harfagra; in Saxon England, Egbert; while in France, under the title of Maires de Palais, or Stewards of the Palace, a succession of strong men paved the way, in the eighth century, for the reign of the giant Charlemagne.

Seldom has the royal office been so completely divested of every attribute of power, as in the persons of the last descendants of the race of Mervig or Merovée, the warrior—the sluggard kings of the seventh and eighth centuries. Founded by Clovis, entirely through conquest, its foundation cemented with the blood of vanquished tribes, the very existence of the first French monarchy depended on the warlike character of its rulers. When these once relaxed their grasp, the reins slipped from their hold, to be seized by the vigorous prime ministers; and so completely had the people been won by the appearance of strength and determination, that the murder of the last Merovingian king, that infallible mode of settling disagreeable claims and titles during the dark ages, was not even considered necessary in the case of the degraded Chilperic, the degenerate scion of a warlike stock.

"Who ought to be king? He who bears sway, or he who has but the name of power?" was Pepin's haughty message of inquiry, sent to the pope at Rome. "He who has the power," was the pontiff's very natural reply. And so Chilperic was deprived of his flowing locks, the emblem of kingly dignity, and sent to doze away the remainder of his useless life within a convent's walls; while energetic Pepin placed the sluggard's crown upon his own brow; and within a few years his mighty successor had extended his dominions from the German Ocean to the Mediterranean Sea. For it was an age of iron, and as it has been tersely stated—

"The nations, in that trying hour,
Set up the good old plan—
That 'they shall take who have the power,
And those shall keep who can.'"

An anecdote related of Pepin, gives a good idea of the kind of influence he exercised over his rude and warlike courtiers.

It was a gala day; and the assembled company had crowded into a theatre where the actors played their parts in terrible earnest, and where combats were waged to the death. The wild beasts fought in the arena.

There was a peculiar attraction about the sports that day; for the interest of the spectacle rose in proportion to the ferocity of the combatants. A black Spanish bull of gigantic size and strength had been matched with an African lion; and the beasts gnashed and roared, and tore and gored each other in their rage, to the delight and admiration of the spectators. The fight was at its hottest, when suddenly the voices that had been shouting approval were hushed, and every eye turned inquiringly towards Pepin's chair of state; for the king had risen, and was pointing down into the arena.

Presently his voice rang out like a clarion through the assembly, and there was a sound of mockery in the tone in which he spoke.

"Which of you, my lords," he said, "will descend into the field, and separate these two doughty warriors?"

There was a dead silence. The tone in which Pepin spoke showed that no thought of jesting passed through his mind; but the combat raged more hotly than ever, and not a man would trust his life to the mercies of those furious, tearing beasts.

Then the king drew his sword, and went down himself into the arena, while every heart stood still with suspense, and every eye was strained with horrified interest. One deep thrust of the king's sword, just where the bull's head joined the spine, and the monster lay low; one sure thrust at the glaring eye of the crouching lion, as he prepared to spring, and the second of those savage champions was overthrown. Then Pepin returned to his seat amid the shouts and applause of a thousand admiring warriors. He had earned his right to be their king; for he had proved his pre-eminence in the one quality they valued above every other virtue. Pepin the Short had proved himself the strongest and the hardest man among a race who looked upon all things as nothing in comparison with hardihood and strength.

They were rude times in which this incident occurred. Customs have changed since then, and civilisation has softened the manners of men. But the principle remains unaltered. Men still shout for admiration at a gallant deed: the weak still follow the strong. When that noble young officer, the other day, fixed the powder-bag on the gate of Delhi, the eager admiration with which the gallant deed was recorded in every account we had from the East, showed that human nature has not greatly changed since the time of Pepin.

Inventions and Science.

OMNIBUS LADDER.—This is an excellent invention, for the convenience of passengers ascending the roofs of omnibuses, which, if adopted, would greatly assist persons in performing this dangerous operation. It is made like an ordinary ladder, of iron, and is so arranged that, by moving a small lever, the conductor can make it assume an inclined position. The ladder is attached to the upper part of the roof by two slots, to admit the upper part of it to rise and fall. There are two links lower down it, which, being pin-jointed to its side, and also to the omnibus, control the distance which the lower end is allowed to project.

"ATTACHMENT TO VIOLINS."—The reader, of course, will imagine he is about to hear some narrative of eccentric love for a genuine old Cremona. But he will hear something more wonderful still, namely, that mechanical invention has extended itself to playing on the fiddle. A patent has been granted in America for a device consisting of four fingers, which press the string on to the finger-board in any desired place; so that ordinary performers will be able to execute music in any key, fingering only in those keys in which the great mass of performers play, viz., the keys of one, two, and three sharps.

NEWLY-INVENTED BOAT.—A boat has recently been invented, which is so constructed that it can be folded up, and stowed into a very small space, in any convenient place. The advantage which it appears to possess over boats of similar construction is increased strength and lightness in its various parts, being, at the same time, less expensive in its first cost. In case of accident to other boats, or in cases of emergencies, these boats will be found very useful.

ENGRAVINGS.—NEWLY-DISCOVERED PROPERTIES OF LIGHT.—M. Niepce de St. Victor has just communicated an interesting series of experiments to the Academy of Sciences, proving the unsuspected fact that the rays of the sun, absorbed by certain substances, are re-emitted in the dark, with sufficient intensity to produce photographic impressions. The following are the principal experiments:—If an engraving, which has been kept in the dark for several days, be exposed to the direct rays of the sun for a quarter of an hour, and then laid on a photographic paper, and kept so in the dark for twenty-four hours, a negative impression of the engraving will be obtained. If part of the engraving was covered by a screen, while exposed to the sun, the uncovered part only will give an impression. Wood, ivory, parchment, and even the skin of a living subject, will yield impressions; but metals, glass, and enamels will not. The longer an engraving is exposed to the sun, the more light it will absorb, and the more it will emit, so that impressions of great intensity may be obtained. But if a pane of glass be interposed between the engraving and the photographic paper, no impression is obtained. Mica and rock crystal also prevent the effect. An engraving coated with collodion, or gelatine, may be reproduced; but if coated with gum it cannot. If the engraving be kept at the distance of three millimetres (twelve-hundredths of an inch) from the photographic paper, it will be reproduced; and if the lines be thick, the distance of a centimetre (four-tenths of an inch) will not be too much. Coloured engravings are very unequally reproduced, according to the intensity of the different colours. Some kinds of printing-inks, English especially, will give impressions; others will not. Again, if an engraving be exposed to the light for an hour, then laid on a piece of white pasteboard, and kept in the dark for several days, and if this pasteboard be then laid on a sheet of photographic paper, an impression, though a somewhat faint one, will be obtained in the course of twenty-four hours.

THE happiest man in the world is the man with just wealth enough to keep him in spirits, and just children enough to make him industrious.

EXPERIMENTS WITH THE MAGNET.

MAGNETIC attraction is both curious and interesting. And many amusing experiments may be performed with it; thus making the magnet doubly attractive to young people.

The magnetic attraction will not be destroyed by interposing obstacles between the magnet and the iron.

Lay a small needle on a piece of paper, and put a magnet under the paper; the needle may be moved backwards and forwards.

Lay the needle on a piece of glass, and put the magnet under the glass; it will still attract the needle. The same effects will take place if a board be interposed between the magnet and the iron. This property of the magnet has afforded the means of some very amusing deceptions.

A little figure of a man has been made to spell a person's name. The hand, in which was a piece of iron, rested on a board, under which a person, concealed from view, with a powerful magnet, contrived to carry it from letter to letter, until the word was made up.

The figure of a goose or swan, with a piece of iron concealed about the head, is set to float in water. A rod, with a concealed magnet at the end, is presented to the bird, and it swims after it. The effect is still more amusing when some food is put on the end of the rod.

The figure of a fish is thrown into the water, with a small magnet concealed in its mouth. Of course, if a baited hook be suspended near it, the magnet and iron, by mutual attraction, will bring the fish to the bait.

Put a piece of iron in one scale of a balance, and an equal weight in the other scale: bring a magnet under the scale which contains the iron, and it will draw it down. Reverse this experiment, and put the magnet in the scale, and balance it: bring the iron under it, and it will draw down the magnet. Suspend a magnet by a string, and bring a piece of iron near it, and it will attract.

If a magnet suspended by one string, and a piece of iron suspended by another, be brought near one another, they will mutually attract each other, and be drawn to a point between.

Suspend a magnet nicely poised by a thread, and it will point north and south, the same end pointing invariably the same way.

Rub a fine needle with a magnet, and lay it gently on the surface of the water: it will point north and south. Rub various needles with the magnet, run them through small pieces of cork, and put them to swim in water: they will all point north and south, and the same end will invariably point the same way. This mode of finding the north is sometimes of the utmost service at sea, when the compass is destroyed.

Opposite poles attract; poles of the same name repel. Take two magnets, or two needles rubbed with the magnet, and bring the north and south poles together, and they attract.

Bring the north poles near each other, and they repel. Bring the south poles near each other, and they repel. Rub a needle with a magnet, and run it through a piece of cork, and put it to float in water. Hold the north pole of a magnet near its north pole, and it will keep flying away to avoid it. It may be chased from side to side of a basin. On the other hand, an opposite pole will immediately attract.

Rub four or five needles, and you may lift them up as in a string, the north pole of one needle adhering to the south pole of another.

Put a magnet under a piece of glass, and sprinkle iron-filings on it; they will arrange themselves in a manner that will be very surprising. At each pole will be a vast abundance standing erect, and there will be fewer and fewer as they recede, until there are scarcely any in the middle. If the iron-filings are sprinkled on the magnet itself, they will arrange themselves in a manner very striking.

Lay a needle exactly between the north and south poles; it will move towards neither.

WHAT'S A FAIR OR NOBLE FACE?

WHAT'S a fair or noble face,
If the mind ignoble be?
What though beauty, in each grace,
May her own resemblance see!
Eyes may catch from heaven their spell,
Lips the ruby light recall;
In the home for love to dwell,
One good feeling's worth them all.
Give me Virtue's rose to trace
Honour's kindling glance and mien;
Howsoever plain the face,
Beauty is where these are seen?
Raven ringlets o'er the snow
Of the whitest neck may fall;
In the home for love we know
One good feeling's worth them all!

Receipts.

TO PREVENT THE FORMATION OF CRUST UPON THE INSIDE OF TEAKETTLES.—Put into the teakettle a flat oyster-shell. It will attract the stony particles that are in the water to itself, and prevent their forming upon the kettle.

USEFUL KNIFE-BOARD.—A common knife-board covered with thick buff leather, on which is put emery, one part; crocus-root, three parts, in very fine powder, mixed into a thick paste with a little lard in sweet oil, and spread on the leather to the thickness of a shilling, gives a superior edge and polish to knives, and will not wear the knives so much as the common method of using brick-dust on a board.

TO CLEAN GLOVES. Dry Cleaning.—Lay them out flat, then rub into them a mixture of finely-powdered fuller's earth and alum; sweep it off with a brush; sprinkle them with dry bran and whitening; lastly, dust them well. This will not do if they are very dirty.

TO PREVENT METALS FROM RUSTING.—Melt together three parts of lard and one part of rosin in powder. A very thin coating, applied with a brush, will preserve Russia-iron stoves and grates from rusting during summer, even in damp situations. For this purpose, a portion of black lead may be mixed with the lard. The effect is equally good on brass, copper, steel, &c. The same compound forms an excellent water-proof paste for leather. Boots, when treated with it, will soon after take the usual polish when blacked, and the soles may be saturated with it without danger of soiling the floor, as it does not rub off.

HOW TO WHITEN LINEN OR CALICO.—When linen or calico is discoloured by washing, by age, or lying out of use, the best method of restoring the whiteness is by bleaching it in the open air, and exposure on the grass to the dews and winds. There may occur cases, however, where this may be difficult to accomplish, and where a quicker process may be desirable. Here the art of chemistry may assist, and the following directions have been given by an eminent practical chemist: The linen must first be laid for twelve hours in a lye formed of one pound of soda to a gallon of boiling-hot soft water; it must then be boiled for half an hour in the same liquid. A mixture must now be made of chloride of lime with eight times its quantity of water, which must be well shaken in a stone jar for three days, then allowed to settle, and being drawn off clear, the linen must be steeped in it six-and-thirty hours, and then washed out in the ordinary way. This will remove all discoloration.

HOW TO REMOVE STAINS FROM FLOORS.—For removing spots of grease from floors, take equal parts of fuller's earth and pearlsh, a quarter of a pound of each, and boil in a quart of soft water; and, while hot, lay it on the greased parts, allowing it to remain on them for ten or twelve hours; after which, it may be scoured off with sand and water. A floor much spotted with grease should be completely washed over with this mixture the day before it is scoured. Fuller's earth and ox-galls, boiled together, form a very powerful cleansing mixture for floors or carpets. Stains of ink are removed by strong vinegar; or salts of lemon will remove them.

Small Change.

"Why is it," asked a Frenchman of a Switzer, "that you Swiss always fight for money, while we French only fight for honour?" "I suppose," said the Switzer, "that both fight for what they most lack."

"With love, the heart becomes a fair and fertile garden, glowing with sunshine and warm hues, and exhaling sweet odours."

AGE makes us tolerant; I never see a fault which I myself did not commit.

We have generally observed that a man is most apt to abuse his native country, when he is a fugitive from her justice.

DURING a trial the other day, a constable, testifying with regard to a lady, said, "I know nothing of her but what I hear the neighbours say; and, in my opinion, what women say of one another is not worthy of belief."

"WHICH, my dear young lady, do you think the merriest place in the world?" "That immediately above the atmosphere that surrounds the earth, I should think; because I am told that there all bodies lose their gravity."

OLD Bishop Aylmer, seeing his congregation pretty generally asleep, took his Hebrew Bible from his pocket and read a chapter, which roused attention, when the minister sharply rebuked them for sleeping when they might have understood him, and listening when they knew not a word he said.

THE great Dr. Jennings sent the following lines, with a couple of ducks, to a patient:—

Dear madam, I send you this scrap of a letter,
To tell you Miss Mary is very much better;
A regular doctor no longer she lacks,
Therefore I send her a couple of quacks.

WE have often heard of a man "being in advance of his age," but who ever heard of a woman being in the same predicament?

A PEASANT went to a priest to confess having stolen hay from the stack of a neighbour. "How many loads did you take?" asked the confessor. "You may as well reckon the whole stack at once," said the peasant, "as I and my wife intend to fetch it all away before we stop."

THERE is this difference between the two blessings, health and money. Money is the most envied, but the least enjoyed. Health is the most enjoyed, but the least envied; and this superiority of the latter is still more obvious, when we reflect that the poorest man would not part with health for money, but that the richest would gladly part with all his money for health.

"You are a Yankee," said a fellow, tauntingly, to his neighbour. "Well, sir, I am no more responsible for having been born a Yankee than you are for having been born an ass."

SATIRE is a glass in which the beholder is sure to see everybody's face except his own.

"WHEREVER I go," said a gentleman remarkable for his State pride, "I am sure to find sensible and intelligent men from my own State." "No wonder," said the person he was addressing, "for every man of that State, who has any sense, leaves it as fast as he can."

WE are often asked why it is that so many married women of genius are unhappy in their domestic relations. We presume it can only be because they choose unwisely. What could be expected from the mating of the eagle with a barn-door fowl?

Two old friends met, not long since, after a separation of thirty-five years. "Well, Tom," said one, "how has the world gone with you, old boy? Married yet?" "Yes; and I've got a family you can't match—seven boys and one girl." "I can match it exactly," was the reply, "for I have seven girls and one boy."

"WHY don't you wear a watch, Joe?" "Pa won't give me one of my own; but he has kept a watch on me ever since I was out of long clothes." Shocking! ain't it?

WHATEVER withdraws us from the power of our senses—whatever makes the past, the distant, or the future predominate over the present advances the dignity of thinking beings.

WILL AND WON'T.—Somebody says there is a decided difference between perseverance and obstinacy. One is a strong will, and the other is a strong won't.

THE GOODS OF LIFE.—Speaking of these, Sir William Temple says, "The greatest pleasure of life is love; the greatest treasure is contentment; the greatest possession is health; the greatest ease is sleep; and the greatest medicine a true friend."

A YOUNG lady, fond of dancing, traverses in the course of a season about four hundred miles. Yet no lady would think of walking that distance in six months.

A HAPPY DISTINCTION.—"You've no wife, I believe," said Mr. Blank to his neighbour. "No, sir," was the reply, "I never was married." "Ah," said Mr. Blank, "you are a happy dog!" A short time after, Mr. Blank, in addressing a married man, said, "You have a wife, sir?" "Yes, sir—a wife and three children." "Indeed," said Mr. Blank, "you are a happy man!" "Why, Mr. Blank," said one of the company, "your remarks to the unmarried and the married seem to conflict somewhat." "Not at all—not at all, sir. There is a difference in my statements. Please be more observing, sir. I said the man who had no wife was a 'happy dog,' and the man who had a wife was a 'happy man.' Nothing conflicting, sir—nothing at all. I know what I say, sir!"

"JOHN" inquired a dominie of a hopeful pupil, "what is a nailer?" "A man who makes nails," replied hopeful, quite readily. "Very good. Now what is a tailor?" "One who makes tails," was the equally quick reply. "Oh! you blockhead," said the dominie, biting his lips; "a man who makes tails! did you ever!" "To be sure," quoth hopeful; "if the tailor didn't put tails to the coats he made they would all be jackets!" "Eh?—ah!—well!—to be sure. I didn't think of that. Beats Watts's logic! Go to the head of the class, John; you'll be Member of Parliament some day."

ERRATUM.—The game played between Messrs. H. C. M. and C. F., given in No. 5, was by accident printed as belonging to "The Chess Tourney," which is not the case.

Our Editorial Table.

TO OUR READERS.—As we are continually receiving communications from some of our friends in remote parts of the kingdom, requesting to know how they can be supplied with our Paper when they reside at a distance from any of the Trade, we beg to inform them and the public generally, that they can be supplied with single numbers by post for 2d. each number, or 2s. 2d. per quarter; 4s. 4d. per half year; or 8s. 8d. per twelvemonth; or if three parties in a neighbourhood combine, and have three copies sent weekly to one address, they can be supplied for 4d., or 4s. 4d. per quarter, 8s. 8d. per half year, or 17s. 4d. per year; or those who like to have a single copy of three numbers sent every three weeks, can have them sent at the rate of 4d. for every three numbers; or fivepenny monthly parts can be forwarded for 7d., and sixpenny parts for 8d. In all cases postage stamps or a post-office order must be sent in advance, and double numbers will be reckoned as two numbers. All letters in this department must be addressed to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard, to whom post-office orders should be made payable. Letters requiring an answer must inclose a postage stamp.

AN AFFLICTED ONE.—You are suffering from a cutaneous disease, for which you should consult a medical man.

ELLEN BERTHA.—The best remedy we know for rough and chapped hands is the following, which we have seldom (if ever) known to fail:—Wash the hands thoroughly in warm soft water; then, while wet, rub a little honey well into them, backs, palms, and fingers; then pass them quickly through the warm water (not rubbing them), and then shaking off the moisture, dab them dry upon a soft towel.

HELEN FALLIARD.—Treat the gentleman precisely the same as every other acquaintance. Show him no more attention or deference; then, if he really has any serious intentions, he will speedily reveal them.

JURA MORGAN.—Spirits of turpentine applied to the spot with a piece of flannel will probably remove the grease, but may, if the colour is delicate, affect it. We have often found that the application of a warm iron (the damaged article being rested upon and covered with brown paper) has been successful. French chalk scraped upon the place is frequently effectual.

MADAM DUNCE.—Try spare meals and active exercise.

HANNAH.—You have made an unfortunate mistake, which may perhaps affect your comfort for some short time. Reflection, however, and religious principle, will, we trust, convince you of the impropriety and folly of dwelling upon the thoughts of one who is already the husband of another person; and in the meantime we earnestly recommend you to treat the young man with the same courtesy as you do other people, never for a moment permitting him to suspect the error into which you have fallen.

LAURA OF SUSSEX.—We regret that we cannot inform you of the qualifications alluded to in the answer you mention, nor are we acquainted with any situation in which ladies can earn a guinea per week.

CROYDON.—As you are an only child, it follows of course that if you die before your father, he will leave no issue; therefore, should he die intestate, his widow will take half his personal estate, his next of kin the remainder.

SAMUEL TAGG.—Answered privately.

QUERIST may obtain silkworms' eggs at almost any herbalists.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER should act with extreme caution before making any engagement to go abroad. We decline the responsibility of recommending any agent or agency office.

G. A. R.—To make shoes waterproof, melt over a slow fire half a pint of oil, an ounce of beeswax, an ounce of turpentine, and a quarter of an ounce of Burgundy pitch. This mixture should be applied two or three times, until the leather is quite saturated, and it will then be softer and more pliable, and wear much longer than otherwise.

ARTISTIC.—The School of Design would meet your wants. I. CHURCH.—1. Water, with a little isinglass dissolved in it. 2. Yes. A. MURRAY.—It would be an amendment. B. G. F.—Your suggestion will meet with our best attention, although we can promise nothing.

DUBITANS.—Print and sell as many as you please—there is no restriction. OLIVER CROMWELL.—Patience. All in good time. Do you want us to write finis to everything? PETTY.—The cost depends on the style of binding.

AN INQUIRING SUBSCRIBER.—Magna Charta, the great charter of English liberty, was signed by King John, June 15, 1215. The Habeas Corpus, next in importance to Magna Charta for the security and liberty of Englishmen, was signed May 27, 1679, by King Charles II. Big Ben exceeded Great Tom—but Ben's cracked and Tom is not.

GEY FAWKES.—Magic lantern slides are painted with transparent colours mixed with mastic varnish.

R. J.—You must give six months' notice previous to the end of any current year of your tenancy, as yours is a yearly, not quarterly take, although the rent is paid quarterly.

M. N. O.—No. The acts you mention are intended for very different purposes.

IGNORAMUS.—We are not aware that any restrictions are made about married or unmarried men in the Civil Service. Your letter is not written with a proper amount of care, and would certainly be no recommendation.

ALBERT.—The best English is spoken by the best educated people; locality has very little to do with it.

E. D. C.—Apply to the publishers. We would not recommend an engine-driver emigrating to Australia, nor settling in India. The composition of your letter is better than your calligraphy.

T. C. (Bristol).—The arrangements with respect to the literary portion of our journal would not admit the introduction of the paper you suggest.

INQUISITOR, MARY D., R. W. M., are recommended to take advice of a medical man.

AN ANXIOUS AUNT.—We quite agree with you that nothing can be more detrimental to a young lady's reputation than the constant fluttering round her of men who have no other motive than the pleasant idling away of a spare hour; but we cannot understand how it is that you cannot put a stop to it. Surely you can show, by a cold and distant manner, that you do not approve of these butterflies attaching themselves to you and your niece during your walks; or if that is not sufficient, why do not you bring the stroll to an abrupt termination by turning back, or entering a shop, or with a stiff bow and decided "good morning" dismiss the escort? As to the slang complained of, we can only express our extreme regret at the prevalence of so vulgar a habit, and assure your niece and all other of our fair readers who indulge in it, that their pretty little mouths never look so forbidding, or their sweet voices sound so repelling, as when giving utterance to words and phrases which, however common among a certain set, no well-bred gentleman would condescend to use.

GORDIAN KNOT.—Act towards your unfortunate victim as you would insist upon any other man acting towards your sister. By your own showing, the girl has all along confidently relied upon your honour to repair the wrong you have done her, and you are bound to do so. Her character is happily unstained in the eyes of her employers and the world. Keep it so. None then will know the imperative reason for your union; and as to what the world says, remember you will not be the first by many a man who has married beneath him, and been happy and honoured afterwards; and that should people talk and wonder, the buzz of their voices will be unheard on that deathbed to which you are hastening, and on which the memory of duties done and injury repaired, will be a greater comfort than all the encomiums or popularity fashion could win you. Unequal marriages are always to be avoided; but your own sin has lowered you and made your inferior your equal.

J. B. F., J. WILKIE, H. M. L., GEORGE, W. X., THOMAS (Stourbridge), R. H. J. G.—Declined with thanks.

K. J.—We cannot recommend any such establishment.

F. W. L. F.—The eyesight is impaired if continually exercised by artificial light of any kind. We do not think that gas is more injurious to it than oil or candles.

W. J. L.—The premiums and salaries vary.

THOMAS S. should attend church for something better than to be smitten with the charms of a young lady, or to endeavour to attract her attention. He is good looking (by his own account), but good looks do not always indicate good sense; certainly not in this case. We hope, however, that "Thomas" is only in jest, and that the poor boy thinks it a good joke to write a stupid letter to the editor of a journal. This is the best construction we can put upon it.

S. W.—The poem of "The Sword and Bible" was written by the author of "Smiles and Tears." We can't suggest a remedy, as we cannot understand the nature of your disease; but taking medical advice is the best thing to be done whatever may be the matter with your health.

BOAERGES.—Apply to a bookseller.

J. SAVILLE.—The receipt has been already given in our Editorial Table.

NEMO.—To answer your questions fully would take up all our space with matter easily to be obtained, but uninteresting to the majority of readers. In the first place consult a surgeon, in the second an army list, in the third our publisher.

GLUCK.—Send your MS. to a music publisher.

THE NEW MATRIMONIAL AND DIVORCE ACT.—We have received several communications from married ladies on the subject of grievances for which they may obtain redress by the new act, when it shall come into operation on the 11th day of January, 1858. We cannot undertake to answer each letter separately; but we beg to inform all deserted wives that, on and after the 11th of January next, they can, by applying to a police magistrate, if they are residing in London, or to a justice in petty sessions, if residing in the country, obtain an order to protect any property they may acquire by their own lawful industry, and any property they may become possessed of after desertion, against their husbands and their husbands' creditors. This order will, by the operation of the new act, give the deserted wife the same right and title over her earnings and her property that she would have had if she had been a single woman. Creditors of the husband continuing to retain possession of the property of the deserted wife after notice of such an order, are not only liable to a suit for the value of the property, which suit the wife is by this act entitled to bring, but also to a fine of double the value of the property thus illegally detained.

W. J. L. (Gravesend).—The word "Hindustan" is accented on the third syllable, and is sounded as it is spelt.

D. G. (New Ross).—Consult a bookseller.

SEPOY.—Hegira is the era from which Turks and Arabians compute events, as Christians do from the birth of Christ. It dates from the day of Mahomet's flight from Mecca to Medina, which was July 12th, A.D. 622.

NEMO.—Granulated cold cream, which we suppose is what you mean, may be made as follows:—Take white wax and spermaceti, of each one ounce; almond oil, three ounces; otto of rose, as much as you please. Dissolve the wax and spermaceti in the almond oil by means of heat, and when a little cool, pour the mixture into a large mortar previously warmed, and containing about a pint of warm water. Stir briskly until the cream is well divided, and add the otto, and suddenly pour the whole into a clean vessel containing eight or ten pints of cold water. Separate the cream by straining through muslin, and shake out as much water as possible.

N. BERR.—Our arrangements are at present complete, but every communication should be addressed to the editor of this journal.

W. N. (Glasgow).—The fifth volume of our "Educational Course" is devoted to the subject you mention. It is entitled "Mathematical Science, its Logic and Utility, with Explanations and Illustrations of the best Methods of Instruction." The volume sells for 2s. in cloth boards, and the system explained in its pages has been adopted in many high class seminaries.

JEMIMA.—A housewife, and not know how to make a good cup of tea! Well, of course we are ready to help you. Soyer, the great French cook, says—and we are obliged to him for the information (for we dearly love a good cup of tea ourselves)—that housekeepers should place the tea-pot with the dry tea in it upon the hob for a little while before making. This plan certainly improves both strength and flavour. Rainwater, when pure, is the best for making all infusions, including tea, of course; since the solvent powers of water are great in proportion to its freedom from earthy salts.

SYNTAX.—1. You can easily obtain a good and cheap English dictionary. An excellent pocket edition of Webster has recently been published by Ward and Lock. 2. The etiquette of letter writing will be noticed in our "Hopes and Helps."

SCOTLAND.—The matrimonial causes act only applies to England. The act will not permit a woman to marry a second time under the circumstances you describe.

BOURNEMOUTH.—We are no authority on mesmerism.

J. B.—Order it of the bookseller who supplies you with the FAMILY PAPER. The Index, Title, Frontispiece, &c., to the "History of England" form an extra number, price one penny. You can also obtain the cases for binding the second volume by order of any bookseller, price 1s. 6d. Thanks for your good wishes.

S. G.—The back numbers of the ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER may be had at the publishers', Paternoster-row.

T. J. P.—The information concerning the qualifications of candidates in the Civil Service, contained in the number of our journal to which you refer, was taken from the Civil Service Examination Paper for 1857.

HOB.—Impressions from the brasses might be taken on thin paper—foreign post would do. In some cases, when the brasses are considerably relieved, a plaster of Paris mould would be the best and more expeditious mode of obtaining a fac-simile.

A CORRESPONDENT (whose signature is illegible) wants to know how to take stains out of mahogany. It may be done by the use of a little aquafortis, or oxalic acid and water, rubbing the part with the liquid by means of a cork till the colour is restored, observing afterwards to well wash the wood with water, and to dry and polish as usual.

TOBY TOSSEPOT'S verses are declined. They betray as small an amount of merit as his letter does of common sense or courtesy.

AKFORD, LITTLE BILLY, A. H. B., JOHN BAILEY, G. PAUL, A. CONSTANT READER, C. C. S., HENRY ALDRIDGE, A. M.—Declined with thanks.

PRINCE will find a large amount of information on the topics he inquires about in the "Educational Course," a work which is being re-issued in three-halfpenny numbers.

CARUS.—What is called "paper varnish" will answer the purpose both for maps and prints.

A DROGHEDA TAILOR.—There are many English concertinas quite as good as the German. The difference in concertinas, as in everything else, depends a good deal on the price paid for them.

COWBRIDGE.—The building of the "Leviathan" began in 1853, and it cannot with any degree of propriety be said to have commenced earlier. The manufacture of the models is not to be taken into account with the actual building of the ship.

AN ANTIQUARY should address his inquiry to a dealer in old books. Letters sent to our journal remain unanswered for some weeks, not for want of courtesy, but for want of space.

CASTOR.—In preparing copy for the press the size of the paper is of no consequence; but it is essential that you should only write on one side of the paper. Write a good plain hand. Commence the first line of each paragraph sufficiently far from the left hand margin of your paper to indicate clearly your intention. Take care that capital letters are rightly used, and that the composition is properly punctuated. The copyright of a work is the property of the author, unless he disposes of that right to a publisher.

E. Y. (Nesscliffe).—You are only bound to the one party, and with him only you must keep the contract—unless, of course, the apprenticeship indentures otherwise provide.

MICHAEL FENTON.—If your high boarded fence is constructed upon your own land, and the door therein opens over your own land, whatever damage you sustain by your neighbour interfering with the door or fence, may be recovered by an action at law against him.

JEROME.—Napoleon I. was crowned on the 19th of November, 1804, Pope Pius VII. performing the ceremony. The decree conferring upon the Emperor the imperial title, and making it hereditary in his family, was passed on 3rd of May, 1804. On the 4th February in the following year, Napoleon addressed his second letter to the King of England, urging the cessation of hostilities; and on the 26th May he was crowned at Milan, King of Italy.

EILEEN ALLWORK.—You cannot demand payment or allowance for board. Your mistress might have dismissed you at the very commencement of the month by paying the wages which are in lieu of notice.

ALMANACK.—"Cassell's Illustrated Almanack for 1858" is by far the best and most successful publication of the kind, and is, in consequence of the ever increasing demand, again reprinted. It contains a series of magnificent engravings, illustrative of the marriage ceremonies of different nations, and of many occasional subjects. Besides the usual calendar, this almanack contains a chronology of remarkable events during 1857, list of the new parliament, abstracts of recent acts of parliament, postal regulations, gardening operations, list of stamps, taxes, rates of licensing, bankers of London, and a great variety of information on matters of commercial and domestic interest. This extraordinary publication has obtained a yearly circulation almost unparalleled.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.—As we have no doubt that the weekly numbers of our New Series will be carefully preserved for binding, we have had the cases for the First Volume prepared, so that they can be obtained at once and used as a portfolio for containing the numbers until the volume is completed, which it will be in future every six months, instead of twelve months, as heretofore. The price of the Cases, gilt lettered on side and back, will be 1s. 6d. each.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARTLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.

Children are blest, and powerful; their world lies
More justly balanced; partly at their feet,
And part far from them.—WORDSWORTH.

THERE were two persons—rather unimportant ones at the present period of our tale, but whom we trust our readers will take a deeper interest in as it proceeds—who looked upon the approaching departure of Sir Norman Boothroyd and his family from Meldown Park with regret, Alice and her play-fellow, the son of Mr. Thornton.

It is true they had frequently been separated before, but then it was only for a time. The Eton holidays were sure to bring William back again to The Elms, when, if immeasurable pride on one side, and a sturdy, manly independence on the other, suspended, as it frequently did, the intercourse between the two families, the children, who neither felt nor understood the estrangement, generally contrived to see each other.

If the heiress went out walking with her French governess or waiting-maid, William, mounted on his pony, was certain either to overtake or meet them—by accident, of course. Both were so young and innocent that neither Mademoiselle nor Jane suspected for an instant that any stronger feeling than mere childish friendship could possibly exist between them. Alice held up her rosy lips so frankly to be kissed, whilst the conversation of the youth ran on his school adventures—cricket, rowing matches on the Thames; in short, on boyhood's sports and pleasures.

It was astonishing how the intelligent and lovely child retained all these things in her memory. She could repeat the names of every one of the Mermaid's crew—describe her build and colours—knew who pulled the stroke oar in such a race—who steered her. No wonder they were friends.

Alice felt exceedingly indignant with the masters of Eton, when William upset the project she had formed of persuading papa to send her there, by informing her that girls were not received. She could not understand it. It would have been so much more pleasant than having a governess at home, who was too old to play with her, and a maid continually to walk after her, to say nothing of their being constantly together.

If this strong sympathy did not amount to love, we know not how else to designate it. Not love, as the world comprehends the word—with its passions, hopes, and tears—but love in germ, slumbering like the seed pearl in its shell, an embryo gem pure as the young hearts that enshrined it, delicate as the tender bud the genial ray of spring's first sun has warmed into existence, and time may expand into a beauteous flower, provided no rude step crushes its unclosed leaves.

THE KIDNAPPING OF LILLIAN.

The day before the intended departure from the hall had arrived; cards, with the usual "P.P.O.," were either left or sent to the houses of most of the neighbouring gentry, including Mr. Thornton's, for Lady Boothroyd was far too politic at such a moment to leave at variance with any one.

Poor William felt exceedingly unhappy. He had not been able to catch a glimpse of his little play-fellow. He had cantered his pony down every lane, and along her customary walks, without meeting her. Most lads of his age would have given up the attempt in despair, but he was an Etonian, and Eton boys seldom despair of anything.

"It can't be accident," he argued with himself. "Alice has been ordered not to walk beyond the park."

And he was right in the conclusion, which was not the only one he came to—for, as the little maiden could not come to him, he resolved to go to her.

Leaving his pony in the village, he passed down the lane, between old Simon's cottage and Minter's farm, the very road Mark had taken the preceding night, after the abduction of Lillian. To a youth of his activity the wall afforded but a slight impediment. By the aid of a tree, he soon swung himself to the summit, and dropped into the park.

As he hastened along the narrow, winding path, which led through the preserves, something glittering on the snow attracted his attention, and he naturally stooped to raise it. It proved to be a chain of gold, fine as a thread, with a heart formed of a single turquoise; engraved with what appeared to him, strange-looking characters pendent from it.

We need scarcely remind our readers that such style of trinkets is exceedingly common in the East.

"Alice has been here," he said; "it must belong to her; and yet I never saw her wear it."

With this conclusion he put it in his pocket.

As he anticipated, the object of his search was in the park, attended only by her maid, Jane, taking her morning walk. No sooner did the child recognise him, than she ran towards him, and held up her innocent face to be kissed.

"Oh, fie, Miss Alice," exclaimed the maid. "You forget what my lady said to you."

"And so I did," answered her charge, blushing at the recollection of her disobedience.

At that moment Robert, one of the under keepers, made his appearance; and, as it so happened, Jane had a few parting words to say to him; for, as a matter of course, he was not to remove from Meldown Park with the rest of the establishment to London. And, as the poet says, there had been certain love passages between them.

Cautioning the children not to wander far away, the girl hastened to meet her lover, leaving them to themselves.

"And what was it your mother said to you, Alice?" inquired William.

"That I was not to kiss either you or your papa again."

"And why not?"

"I am sure I can't tell," answered the child, innocently; "she allows Squire Blundell with his great rough beard to kiss me."

"Ah! but she never recollected I should have to bid you good-bye," observed the boy.

"Perhaps not."

And with this reflection the little culprit felt quite satisfied. Of course her mamma could not have thought of that.

It is not our intention to abuse the time and patience of our readers by relating word for word the conversation of two such children—and yet, perchance, a lesson might be learnt from it—how bitterly William regretted the departure of Alice from Meldown, or how Alice consoled him by telling him that she was to pay a visit to her aunt, the Countess of Carlington, at The Holm.

"Why, The Holm is only three or four miles from Eton," said her companion, joyously, "and Illston is in the same form with me."

Viscount Illston was her cousin, the only son and heir of the earl.

"I must make friends with him," he added.

"Take him into the Mermaid," exclaimed the child, clapping her little hands with delight at the idea.

"You will be sure to be friends then."

William looked rather serious at this suggestion. He was not captain of the boat, only one of the crew himself, and the youngest.

"Illston is such a muff," he answered, "that I don't think he stands much chance. He has delicate white hands, and they won't do for rowing; then he has no pluck. No, no," he added; "he will never do for the Mermaid."

Alice looked disappointed; she perfectly comprehended what the speaker meant by her cousin's being a muff, for William had made her almost as well acquainted with the phraseology of the playground as himself.

"But I'll tell you what I'll do," he added; "I'll write his exercises, and fight for him."

Alice thought that would do nice—little imagining what the battles of an Eton boy are like.

Time flies as rapidly with the young, as wealth does with the thoughtless heir; both deem their treasure inexhaustible; and a considerable portion of the morning had passed before either of the speakers thought of separating. William was the first to recollect the necessity of doing so, for he had promised his father to be back by a certain hour, and he bade his companion good-bye. Alice, however, would not permit of his leaving her in the plantation, but insisted on seeing him as far as the park wall, and safely over it.

"Why, there is no danger," he observed, laughingly.

"I am not so sure of that," answered the child; "the dogs are loose; but they all know me."

"And me too," replied the boy.

"Papa has been shot at," added the heiress, lowering her voice almost to a whisper, and looking round her with a feeling of terror.

"Do you know what my father and Squire Blundell say?" demanded the youth.

"No."

"They both declare that the shot could only have been fired to frighten Sir Norman, and not with the least idea of injuring him; and it's my opinion too."

As Alice had long been in the habit of believing everything William said, the explanation appeared quite satisfactory. Still she could not comprehend how any one could be so wicked as to wish to frighten her papa.

Notwithstanding that her fears were considerably diminished, she persisted in her resolution of seeing him safely over the wall, and when the moment of separation arrived, forgot, I fear, for the second time, what Lady Boothroyd had said to her, for the kiss was repeated.

As William observed on the first occasion, her ladyship forgot that they would have to bid each other good-bye; an excuse so natural, that we feel assured our readers will admit it.

He was nearly half way home before he recollected the chain. His first impulse was to ride back and restore it to her, for he had not the slightest doubt of its being hers. Then he thought again that Alice had doubtless returned to the hall, and continued his road to The Elms.

"It was very stupid of me," he muttered; "but there is no help for it now."

It is not to be supposed that the grief of Alice at parting from her companion was either deep or very lasting, especially with the prospect of so soon seeing him again:—

The tear down childhood's cheek that flows,
Is like the dew-drop on the rose;
With the first breeze that passes by
And waves the bush, the flower is dry."

All her thoughts now were to return as quickly as possible to the spot where she had left the waiting-maid; but, unfortunately, the part of the grounds in which she had wandered with William was but little familiar to her. She took the wrong turning, and only discovered her error when she found herself in face of an old pavilion half buried in ivy. Never having seen the building before, the curiosity of the child naturally became excited.

"What a strange-looking place!" she exclaimed, pausing to contemplate it. "I wonder if any one lives there."

Walking cautiously round it, Alice came to the portico, and noticed footprints in the snow upon the steps.

"I dare say it belongs to Fletcher, or some of the keepers," she thought. "They will show me my way to the house."

To run up the steps and try the door was the act of an instant. It was fastened.

"No one there," she said, speaking aloud. "I must try to find my way again."

Just as she was about to descend, a plaintive moan fell upon her ear, and caused her to start with terror. She would have fled had not a voice as childlike as her own arrested her flight. She listened. It evidently came from the interior of the building.

Placing her eye to the keyhole, Alice saw, to her astonishment, a girl about her own age wrapped up in the patchwork coverlid of a bed, crying and moaning bitterly.

"Who are you?" she demanded.

The answer was made in a language which she could not understand, and the question was repeated.

"Mai bhooka hoon," cried the person, whom we need not inform our readers was no other than Lillian.

Alice repeated the words, to impress them on her memory.

"And what are you crying for?" she added.

"Mai surd hoon," was the reply.

There was something so desolate in the appearance of the little sufferer that the heart of the heiress was touched, and several times she essayed to force open the door; but, old as it was, it resisted her feeble strength.

"I will soon be back," she exclaimed, quite out of breath with her exertions. "Don't cry so. Don't cry!"

Darting down the steps of the portico, Alice took the first path that presented itself, not doubting but it would either lead her to the hall, or to one of the lodges, where assistance might be readily procured.

She had not proceeded far when, to her great joy, she recognised her mother in conversation with a man, who, seeing her approach, hastily disappeared in the plantation. It was Mark Rayner.

"You here!" said Lady Boothroyd, surprised and vexed at the encounter.

"Oh! mamma, mamma!" replied her daughter, "there is a poor little child not older than myself shut up in such a strange-looking hall, and crying as if her heart would break. Do come and let her out."

"A child!" repeated the artful woman, dreadfully annoyed.

"Yes, and so pretty."

"Have you seen her?"

"Yes, mamma."

"And has Jane seen her too?"

"No, mamma," answered Alice; "I left Jane talking with one of the keepers, and found out the place alone; it is so cold and sad there. Pray, come," she added, taking hold of her dress, as if to draw her towards the spot; "I am sure you will pity her."

Lady Boothroyd was not a person easily thrown off her balance; but the discovery of her victim made by her own child disconcerted her; she knew how tenacious her memory was, and that such a circumstance would remain indelibly impressed upon it.

"She is a wicked gipsy girl, who has been put there to punish her."

Alice looked in her face—her mother read the natural, the involuntary doubt in her eyes, and blushed at her own unworthiness.

Truth is the shadow of God, the emblem and visible sign of His presence upon earth; and it is an awful thing when parents, who, next to God, should command the respect and veneration of their offspring, descend to falsehood with them; the lie may pass unnoticed for a time—years even may elapse—but ultimately the child is sure to detect and meditate upon it, to mourn over it if virtuous and well disposed, or justify its own departure from straightforward, honest sincerity by the example of evil.

"But since you have interceded for her," added her ladyship, "I will give orders for her to be released."

"Oh, thank you, mamma," exclaimed her daughter, joyfully.

"On one condition."

"Anything! I will be so good Mademoiselle shall not have to complain of my lessons and exercises for a week to come."

Her mother gave her to understand that the condition consisted in keeping secret from every one the discovery she had made of the wicked little gipsy girl, as she called her, in the old pavilion. Alice promised, delighted at having obtained the pardon of the supposed culprit on such easy terms.

On their way through the park they encountered Jane, who, alarmed for the safety of her young charge, had been seeking her in every part of the grounds except the right one.

"Is this the way you attend to your young mistress?" demanded Lady Boothroyd, angrily.

The girl attempted to offer an excuse, but was interrupted by being sharply ordered to return at once to the hall.

Sir Norman was chatting with the Reverend Dr. and Mrs. Poundtext, who had called to pay them a visit of adieu previous to the departure of the family, when his wife and daughter entered the drawing-room. Although her ladyship felt anything but in an amiable humour, she at once sank into her usually passive role of echoing her husband's sentiments and words: it was hardly worth the while, she thought, to drop the mask for the few remaining hours of her stay at Meldown; the character might be somewhat irksome, but the farce was nearly over.

"Where have you been?" inquired her husband, in a tone of peevishness, which, had they been alone, he would not have ventured to indulge in. "Knowing the fearful, diabolical, unnatural, unheard-of outrage that has been attempted, you ought to be more careful of my feelings. I have been uneasy at your absence."

Her ladyship listened to the reproach with exquisitely acted meekness and conjugal submission.

The clergyman looked, or attempted to look, more and more horrified at each succeeding adjective, and at the end of the string gave vent to his feelings in a deep-drawn sigh, wrung from him, no doubt, by his profound conviction of the depravity of human nature.

"Dreadful! very dreadful! my dear Sir Norman," he murmured, at the same time assisting himself to a glass of the baronet's fine old East India Madeira to recover himself. "But it all springs from that desire for change which is gnawing its way into the very vitals of the establishment."

After this speech, it is scarcely necessary to observe that Dr. Poundtext was a very high churchman.

His wife attributed it to the ingratitude and vanity of the poorer classes. To her intense disgust straw bonnets had been substituted for cotton caps in the charity school of St. Faith's, and the girls' hair permitted to grow long, instead of being cropped to the true pauper cut; and the innovation had curdled the not over-abundant supply of the milk of human kindness in her breast.

The sight of the children's bonnets and sinful curls disturbed her every Sunday at her prayers, and compelled her to close her eyes to avoid seeing them.

Some persons were kind enough to hint that her husband's sermons were sufficient to produce the same effect.

"The error lies in the upper classes abandoning their rights," observed the lord of the manor, with dignity. "It is enough to cause my predecessors to start in indignation from their graves, to think of a Boothroyd being fired at on his own lands, and most probably by one of his own tenants."

"Perhaps it was only done to frighten you, papa," exclaimed Alice, who had not forgotten what William had said.

Lady Boothroyd regarded the child very intently, and with a puzzled expression of countenance, whilst the rector and Mrs. Poundtext turned aside to conceal an involuntary smile, for between themselves they had come to the same conclusion, without the least suspicion, however, of the share her ladyship had taken in the plot.

"Frighten me," repeated Sir Norman, and colouring to the very temples. "The child is growing a perfect idiot. Who ever heard such a ridiculous, improbable, impossible idea!"

"Exceedingly ridiculous," echoed her ladyship.

"Mademoiselle Jaulain is no longer a fit person to direct her education," added the baronet. "She requires a governess who will be firm and strict with her."

"Certainly, my love, if you think so," said his wife.

"I do think so, Lady Boothroyd," replied her husband; "and must request you will attend to my wishes upon the subject."

A glance, bright and momentary as the forked lightning from a summer cloud, reminded the speaker that visitors would not always be present at Meldown Park, and his indignation rapidly cooled.

The eyes of Alice filled with tears at the loud, angry tones in which her father had spoken, and at the threat of changing her governess. Running to him, she threw her little arms around his neck, and begged to be forgiven.

With all his faults, pride, and selfishness, Sir Norman loved his child; that is to say, as much as he was capable of loving anything. Added to which, he felt that it would be unwise to push the subject any further; so he kissed the offender, and bade her think before venturing on such foolish speeches for the future.

"The inconsiderateness of youth," observed Dr. Poundtext.

"And Miss Alice is so young," added his lady, holding out her hand to her.

"Oh, Doctor," said the child, suddenly recollecting the strange words she had heard in the pavilion, "what is the meaning of Mai bhooka hoon?"

The rector made her repeat them.

"Why, bless me!" he exclaimed, with evident surprise, "they are Hindostani! Where could she have picked them up?"

"Mademoiselle is always permitting her to read some absurd novel, instead of attending to her proper studies," answered her ladyship, hastily, for she felt sincerely alarmed. "You are quite right," she added, turning to her husband; "it is time to seek another governess."

Sir Norman felt greatly relieved at hearing his wife pronounce him to have been quite right in his opinion. For some minutes past he had been secretly labouring under a far different impression.

Lady Boothroyd rang the bell, and Alice, more at a loss than ever to understand how she had offended, was sent, as a punishment, to her own room.

The visitors soon afterwards took their leave, and the circumstance was forgotten.

For nearly four-and-twenty hours Mark and Lillian had remained close prisoners in the pavilion in the park. Both suffered severely from cold and hunger, but the child the least; for the guilty, though not hardened man, had fortunately discovered a biscuit in his pocket which Rose had placed there before parting from him, and he gave it untasted to the orphan, to whom he contrived to impart partial warmth by holding her in his arms closely wrapped up in the coverlid of the bed which he had taken with her when he stole her.

During the long and tedious hours of his concealment he had ample time to reflect on his past folly—the happiness he had thrown away—the duties neglected. Remorse and suffering wrought a wholesome lesson.

"That I should be skulking like a miserable thief," he murmured, "almost within sight of my native place, like, I am a thief," he added, "and the worst of thieves, for I have robbed poor Simon of his only consolation. How little does the kind old man imagine whom he has to thank for making his home desolate!"

At times he cursed bitterly the unprincipled woman who had compelled him to act so degraded a part.

The thought of Rose, and the cruel anxiety she must be enduring, haunted him.

About midnight he was visited by Lady Boothroyd, who brought with her food and wine, as well as some of Alice's cast-off clothes for Lillian.

It was a bitter night for a woman delicately-nurtured and luxurious by habit to steal from her home and walk more than a mile through the snow. But, like many others in the world, her evil passions sustained her where the natural sentiments of duty or affection too often fail.

"Close the door," she said.

Mark Rayner mechanically obeyed her.

A light was struck, for the lady had not forgotten that her prisoners were in darkness. Lillian opened her eyes at the sudden flash, and gazed upon her enemy in silent wonder.

"I have brought you food," continued the speaker, "to refresh yourself whilst I dress the child; we have not an instant to lose."

The instrument of her crime was too completely in her power not to do as she directed.

In dressing Lillian her ladyship noticed, with anger, that a slender chain of gold, which, on her visit to the cottage of the weaver she had noticed round the neck of her victim, was gone, and she imperatively demanded it. It was in vain that Mark declared he had neither seen nor taken it; his assertions were listened to with scorn and disbelief.

"I tell you that I have it not, my lady," he repeated. "Why should I lie to you? It can't be for the value; and even if I had taken it," he added, doggedly, for his temper began to be roused, "I have as much right to the trinket as yourself. You are no relative of poor Lily!"

The last observation silenced, although it failed to convince her, and the present was neither the time nor place for disputes, especially as her politic ladyship possessed a certain means, as she imagined, of extorting it from him.

"Follow me," said she, as soon as the child was dressed, and she considered that they had had sufficient time to refresh themselves.

"Where to, my lady?"

"The stables."

"Barge, the groom, sleeps there," observed Mark, hesitatingly.

"I have sent him to Exeter purposely that he may be out of the way," replied the mistress of Meldown Hall; "for you must take Sir Norman's hunter, Milton, ride him as far as Exeter, and then turn him loose; if lost, it cannot be helped."

"But why all these precautions?" inquired the man.

"The fools of St. Faith's have been scouring the country in every direction," said her ladyship. "And I need not remind you how excessively disagreeable it would be to both of us should you be taken,—not that there is much feat," she added. "Milton is the fastest horse in the shire, and you ride for your life."

The last words were pronounced with an emphasis that made her hearer shudder.

"I leave for London," continued the speaker, "in the morning. You already know where to meet me with your charge. Be faithful, and you shall find me grateful."

On reaching the stable, Mark hastily saddled the horse; and mounting, with Lillian before him, only waited for his last orders to start.

"You have sufficient money for your journey?"

"More than sufficient," answered the husband of Rose, bitterly.

"Away, then; the same key that gave you admittance to the park will give you egress by the private gate on the common. Take the path through the home preserves. The keepers are all watching in the north wood; and remember the penalty if you are taken."

Mark put spurs to the spirited animal, and speedily disappeared in the direction indicated. As he rode along he reflected upon the extraordinary conduct of Lady Boothroyd in thus risking her reputation. "What could Lillian possibly be to her?" he asked himself, "or she to Lillian?" and as for the motives alleged, he was too shrewd to believe a word of them.

"There is some secret," he muttered; "but why should I torment myself? Were I to discover it I could do no good, for I am completely in her power, and she is not one to spare those who thwart her. The happiness of Rose, too, is in her hands, and that thought makes me a coward."

"God help the innocent child!" he added, "whom she has deprived of all natural protection. I would rather a thousand times take it with me to a foreign land than trust it in her keeping. But I am chained like a dog, the halter dangling before my eyes, and must submit."

With this reflection he pursued his way.

CHAPTER XIV.

I envy not the heart that takes
His license in the field of time,
Unfettered by a sense of crime,
To whom a conscience never wakes.

TENNYSON.

How often have we heard the thoughtless boast, "That everything may be had in London for money." A terrible assertion, and not less terrible than true; painting in a few brief words, more graphically than the long-drawn annual reports of visiting magistrates, gaol chaplains, and numerous societies for the reformation of criminals can do, the depravity which, like a virulent infection, has tainted more or less all classes in this our modern Babylon. We say "all classes" advisedly: rich and poor are equally included in the reproach; for were there no purchasers, there would be no vendors of crime.

Yes; humanity is in the market; character is a mask; honesty has its price; innocence is knocked down to the highest bidder; and even commercial integrity, of which Englishmen once felt so proud, is now judged by the immoral standard of success. Society asks but one question: "Are you rich?"—Answer that satisfactorily, and fear not being called on to explain how you became so.

Humanity is in the market! who'll buy? who'll buy? Do you want political consistency? Just step into St. Stephen's and you may learn the price, although it is only whispered instead of being quoted like railway shares on the stock exchange. The dealers in the article—men who rave about economy when museums, picture galleries, parks for the people, and such useless, extravagant measures are proposed—vote with cool effrontery millions away, provided the expenditure places a proportionate number of sinecures and places at the disposal of the minister. Most of these loud-tongued patriots have sons or nephews to provide for. On such occasions, even the opposition, no matter whether whig or tory, are dumb. They disdain to offer a factious hostility to government, and take credit for patriotism instead of calculation; they know that as the wheel goes round the distribution of the loaves and fishes will one day fall into their hands, and they have sons and nephews, dependants, and hungry parasites too.

If a system of national education is proposed, orthodoxy and heterodoxy quarrel over the scheme like angry dogs snarling over a bone, and prefer seeing the rising strength, the future manhood of their country reared in ignorance, and consequently in crime, than instructed in a system which is not their system. Ask money for the furtherance of science, and the chancellor of the exchequer looks upon the simple-minded speaker with pity; hint at a pension for some worn-out man of letters, the premier shrugs his shoulders, and declares, with deep regret, of course, that he has no funds for such a purpose, and the House sympathises with him, but does nothing more.

The guardians of the nation's granary obtain a character for economy by placing curiously contrived, expensive locks upon the doors, whilst countless rats are gnawing the grain within.

Who that has reflected on these things can lay his hand upon his heart, and say that political consistency has not its price?

Humanity is still in the market! half its stock in trade is not disposed of yet; the supply is as exhaustless as the demands are varied by the passions of the buyers. Does wealth seek to deck the wintry brow of age with the earliest rose of spring; some heartless parent will be found ready to sell his blooming child. In the opinion of the world the altar sanctifies the sacrifice; no matter how holy the ties, how pure the affections that are blighted there. Gold has become earth's idol, and must be worshipped with sighs and tears.

Does crime require an instrument to work its purpose? poverty and ignorance offer a hundred ready to its hand; some coarse and brutal, others polished as the gloss upon the surface of society, or the varnish which tones down and softens the glaring picture of its misdeeds.

The stream of moral corruption, like every other stream, obeys certain generic laws, and can only be stopped effectually at the fountain head: drawing off its branches is a mere palliative, not a cure; and we shall consider the work of reformation commenced in earnest when Englishmen can no longer boast—That everything may be had in London for money.

Mr. Silex had not forgotten his promise to Lady Boothroyd—to seek out a fit and proper person to take charge of the orphan Lillian—and hence his journey to London. Not that it was by any means necessary, as he pretended, to visit the metropolis for that purpose—he knew of one already: but the worthy agent had a project of his own, which required his personal superintendence in the carrying out.

He never trusted to letters.

The individual selected for this honourable employment was no other than his own twin-brother Mike, the returned convict, the uncle and tutor of Jack Manders. As a matter of course, the confidential steward of a wealthy Devonshire baronet looked upon himself as far too respectable to acknowledge, but not to employ, him; and though everything like correspondence or intercourse had long ceased between them, he had never lost sight of the idea that his relative might one day prove useful. He had even carried his recollections of the ties of blood between them so far as to forward him occasionally trifling sums of money, but always by so indirect a channel that every attempt to trace his own whereabouts or position failed.

Mike—or, as he was familiarly called by those who knew him, Old Mike—believed his brother Andrew to be rich; and, instead of feeling grateful for the assistance doled out to him, frequently cursed him for his meanness in not providing more liberally for his wants. There was some show of reason, perhaps, in this resentment: for in early life they had been mixed up in more than one questionable transaction together.

Like many of his class, the returned convict, when he grew old, made up for the absence of personal courage and daring by cunning:—he found it quite as profitable to train others to crime and share the fruit of their misdeeds, and far less dangerous.

Jack was not the first victim he had led to vice; nor, in all probability, was he destined to prove the last.

The old man and his nephew were seated by a comfortable fire, at breakfast, when a smart rap announced a visitor. Mike looked carefully round, to make sure that no tell-tale article had been left about the room; and, having satisfied himself on that point, directed the lad to unbar the door.

Mr. Silex entered the cottage with that peculiar smile upon his features which disclosed his shark-like teeth. He was no longer dressed in the top boots and cast-off coat of his late master, but in a respectable suit of black, the coat buttoned to the chin, in which attire his long, lank figure resembled an overgrown leech with a human head.

As is the case frequently with twins, there existed a striking resemblance between the two brothers, and Jack was so struck with it, that he stood with his eyes wide open, glancing alternately from one to the other.

The steward looked first at Mike, and then at the door, intimating that he wished to be alone with him.

"Here, Jack," said his uncle, offering him a shilling, "go and amuse yourself for an hour or two."

"Plaguy cold out of doors," muttered the boy, whose curiosity was excited.

A look from his relative warned him that he was not to be trifled with, so he caught up his cap from the breakfast-table, and quitted the house. How he amused himself will appear in another place.

"You have not forgotten me," observed Mr. Silex, for the first time breaking silence.

"I never forget any one or any thing," muttered the convict; "not even that I have a brother."

"I should think not," answered his visitor, sharply,

"considering the sums he has sent you; but you were always ungrateful, Mike."

"Ungrateful!" repeated the former; "and what have I to be grateful for? for a pittance cast as men cast a bone occasionally to a hungry dog—I can't even see the hand that gives it."

"You might bite it," observed the rich brother, coolly.

"What need of all this hide and seek with me?" demanded the convict, in a tone which showed how deeply he felt irritated. "Why not say at once where you live?"

"I receive no visitors."

"But I might write to you occasionally."

"Or letters," added his relative.

Mike declared, with an oath, that this time, at least, he would be satisfied—he could not endure such unnatural suspicions—they hurt his feelings.

"Which are very sensitive, no doubt," answered his brother, not in the least degree alarmed at his bluster and vehemence. "I have nothing to reproach myself with. I have done quite as much as my limited circumstances up to the present time permitted; and now, when I have taken the trouble of a journey to London to point out the means of bettering your condition materially, I find you as usual passionate and ungrateful."

At the words, "bettering your condition," Mike, who had interrupted him with sundry "poohs" and "pshaws," became suddenly attentive.

"You know, Andrew," he said, "that you could always persuade me to anything."

"But to be reasonable," continued the steward.

"It's a hard case if a man can't speak his mind to his own brother," observed the convict; "ain't we twins? But what's your game? Let's hear it."

"Can you be faithful?"

"You know I can, to my own cost."

"In the affair I am about to propose to you," said Mr. Silex, who had his own reasons for avoiding all allusions to the past, "there is little danger."

"And less money," exclaimed Mike. "I know your scale of payments of old. But go on; I'll hear all you have to say."

"On the contrary, there is a considerable sum to be gained."

"Which I must share with you, I suppose," muttered the ruffian, "as I did before."

"Not a penny."

"Well, do speak out," cried his interesting relative; "I can't bear to feel you twining and creeping like a snake round your purpose. It ain't my way."

"Impetuous as ever," ejaculated the steward. "What I have to propose to you is to take charge of a child about seven years old."

"Charge! Well, go on."

"But you must not seek to discover the name of the lady who will bring her to you," continued the steward, "which, by-the-by, would not be very easy, seeing that she resides in the country, at a great distance from the metropolis."

"As you do?"

"Exactly."

"And how much do you propose?" demanded Mike.

"You must make the bargain with her yourself," answered Mr. Silex. "As a hint for your guidance, I may as well tell you that she can afford to pay liberally. You see I lose no occasion of furthering your interest," he added.

"And when will she be here?"

"To-morrow."

The convict leant his head on his hand, and reflected for some time, before making up his mind.

"Look you, Andrew," he said, at last, "if it's only to take charge of a child, and I am to be well paid for it, I don't mind. But I'll run no risks; that is to say, great risks. You understand me. I am getting an old man, now, and am living respectably."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, indeed," repeated his brother; "as respectably as those who think themselves my betters. For the law can't touch me for what others do."

"That is to say, you profit by their crimes," observed the agent of Lady Boothroyd. "I don't blame you. We are each of us philosophers in our way. But you are not more careful of your safety than I am of mine. What the party whom you will treat with may suggest or propose it is impossible for me to divine. But, I tell you, that if you harm a hair of the child's head, it will cost you your life; and I never threaten idly, as you know. Promise the lady what you like."

"You feel interested in the kid, then?"

"Greatly."

"From love?"

The steward opened his jaws, and once more displayed his shark-like teeth, as he indulged in a hearty laugh.

"Aye, I thought not," said Mike.

"Love!" repeated his visitor, restraining his mirth at last within due bounds; "to be sure I love her; she will one day be worth her weight in gold."

His hearer did not forget the words. The rest of the compact was soon made, one condition only being added—that when the lady brought the child, Mike was to treat the affair as though he had never heard of it before, and above all, not to let a word escape that could lead her to suspect he had any knowledge, either past or present, of the respectable Mr. Silex.

That settled, the speakers, after a brief discussion on family affairs, parted in a far more amicable spirit than they had met, little imagining, however, that every word of their conversation had been overheard by their nephew Jack, who had been so unceremoniously dismissed from his breakfast with a shilling to amuse himself with, but who, instead of following the suggestion, had crept stealthily round to the back of the cottage, climbed in at the washhouse window, and by this manoeuvre contrived to gratify his curiosity.

To his astonishment he learnt that he had an uncle whom he had never seen or heard of before—an uncle who appeared respectable and well-to-do in the world; and the discovery inspired him with the hope of extricating himself from a mode of life of which he was getting tired.

Naturally the boy was far from vicious; but reared in ignorance and vice hitherto, he had found no one to counsel or assist him, except in evil. Since the unaccountable disappearance of George Markham, he had felt sundry qualms and misgivings, lost no inconsiderable portion of his nerve and address, and felt quite chicken-hearted at the sight of a policeman.

"If he would only give me a character," he thought, "I might get a place; wouldn't I work! I can but ask him."

Having once come to this conclusion, he decided upon waylaying Mr. Silex on the bridge, and introducing himself to him. Whilst waiting his appearance he could not avoid reflecting how pleasant it would be to walk about without fear of a hand being suddenly laid upon the collar of his jacket, to be able to look even a policeman in the face; and for the first time in his life he felt in love with honesty.

Although the steward considered his visit to his brother as too unexpected to admit of any arrangement for his being followed, still he was not without his suspicions, and cast his keen little gray eyes peeringly to the right and left, as he emerged from the Belvedere into the Westminster road. About half-way over the bridge he encountered Jack, who, pulling off his cap, confronted him in the centre of the pavement.

"Go away, boy," said the old man, angrily, pretending not to recognise him; "I have nothing for you."

"Please, uncle, I am not a beggar," replied the boy. The wretch started at the word "uncle," and would have hurried past him, but his nephew was not to be got rid of so easily.

"I want to speak with you, if you will let me," he added.

"With me?"

"Yes, uncle."

"I am not your uncle."

Jack gave him a knowing wink, and muttered a word, far more expressive than elegant, which sounded very like "gammon."

"It won't do," he exclaimed, shaking his round, terrier-like head; "I heard all you said to Mike in the crib about the child and the lady."

Here he gave him another wink, and Mr. Silex began to look exceedingly uncomfortable and bilious.

"Well, well!" said his relative, "I'll hear you—follow me."

Jack's heart bounded with delight. At last he had found a friend, as he imagined, and he walked after him, cap in hand, till they reached the paved court on the Westminster side of the bridge, when the old man suddenly stopped, and, fixing his eyes upon him, demanded what he had to say.

"I want a character," replied the boy.

Mr. Silex grinned at the naivete of his nephew. There was something also which tickled his fancy in the idea of his applying to him for one.

"And to get work," added the young pickpocket. "I am tired of running about the streets all night, and afraid to show my face by day. Everybody seems to know how I gets a livin'. Not a boy in the road will play with me, though I am better dressed, and have twice as much money to spend as they have."

"And how do you get your living?"

"Oh, you know."

"How should I possibly know, when I never saw you till this morning?" observed the steward.

"I heard Mike tell you," answered Jack; who began shrewdly to suspect that his new-found relative cared as little for telling a lie as his old one.

"Why do you wish to leave your uncle, who has been a second father to you?"

"Because I ain't happy in my mind with him, and ain't a doin' what is right," answered the poor boy, colouring deeply. "I shall be sure to be found out one day; and I know what follows, for I've often heard the old un, when he has thought me asleep, talk over Norfolk Island with his old pal Fiddler Dick,—him as has the dancing gals: perhaps you know him."

The respectable man shook his head.

"Well, you might a done, for he is a great friend of Mike's: they were lagged together; but that ain't nothing to do with it. I want to get out of this line of life; it don't suit me any longer. I can't bear it—afraid to show my face in the streets, and feel my heart thumping against my ribs if I happen to catch the eye of a peeler or a hand only touches my shoulder."

"What can I do for you?"

"Give me a character. I'll find work."

Mr. Selix drew himself up with an air of great severity. By his questions and apparent attention, he had detained his nephew till he saw a policeman sufficiently near, if necessary, to arrest him.

"Do you see that officer?" he said.

"Yes, uncle."

"You are an impertinent young rascal," continued his relative; "and if you presume to call me by that name again, I'll give you in charge for attempting to pick my pocket. I disown all connection with you. I cast you off. Begone," he added, pointing to the bridge; "and the way you came."

Jack stood for an instant the picture of astonishment. Suddenly the tears gushed into his eyes, and he turned indignantly away. His heart was too full for words; but from that hour the heartless wretch who could be deaf to the pleadings of his sister's son, had an enemy far more dangerous than any he had ever yet contended with. An enemy whose strength would increase as his own powers of resistance gradually diminished—for youth is the spring-time of the future.

With a chuckle of great satisfaction at having so easily got rid of the suppliant, the man of respectability and money continued his way.

Most of the friendless outcasts of London have some peculiar nook or corner to which they retreat when nature demands repose or their fears suggest concealment. Some affect the arches of the Adelphi; others those of Waterloo-bridge; and not a few the brick fields in the immediate vicinity of the metropolis.

Jack, in common with the lads of his class, had his retreat or den, a very solitary one, whose locality even Uncle Mike was ignorant of. It was a disused sawpit in one of the numerous wood-yards in the Belvedere-road; a stack of timber had been piled over it, and by taking out one of the planks the freholder, for such he might be considered in the most literal sense of the word, could creep in and evade all risk of detection by drawing the aforesaid plank into its place after him.

The bottom of the pit would have been both cold and damp but for the poor boy's precaution of filling it with straw and shavings, which he had done from time to time, as opportunity offered.

Into this retreat Jack crept, and curled himself up like some wild animal in its lair—not to sleep: his heart was too full for that, but to meditate.

"It's no use," he thought, "of my trying to do any good for myself; if I tell people I want to be honest they only laugh at me; and I ain't big enough to go for a soldier yet. It'll be Norfolk Island, I suppose, after all."

A cold shudder came over him as he came to this conclusion, and he turned over in his mind the horrors of the punishment as he had heard Fiddler Dick and Mike describe them,—the toil in gangs, chained like beasts of burden; the lash at the slightest breach of discipline; the rope for the commission of crime.

He wept bitterly; for the disappointment, and still more the harsh rebuff he had met with from his respectable relative, had wounded him sensibly; he would have prayed had he known how, but no one had ever taught him his prayers: true, he had seen churches, though he had never ventured to enter one, and had a confused notion of their use.

When we say that Jack would have prayed had he known how, we are far from feeling certain that he did not pray; for who shall say that the simple desire of good in one so ignorant and friendless, who had never experienced either a mother's fondness or a father's care, is not in the eyes of heaven a prayer?

We have no faith in instant conversions: few, in our opinion, become either suddenly good or suddenly wicked; the progress may be more or less rapid, according to the soil in which the seeds are sown, but it requires time to ripen and bring forth fruit.

Unfortunately for the boy, he had no friendly monitor at hand to confirm him in his favourable impressions, to advise and console him; gradually he began to feel ashamed of his tears, and look upon them as what Mike would have termed want of pluck. No wonder, therefore, if the feeling of hatred towards Mr. Silix increased rather than decreased as he lay meditating in his retreat.

"The old rascal!" he muttered to himself; "but I'll serve him out; he doesn't know his nephew Jack yet, but he shall know me; he won't tell Mike where he lives—I'll find it out: that's one thing I'll do for him: and I'll find out who this lady is; that's another. He'll give me in charge; will he? perhaps I may do the same thing for him; for though he does wear a fine black coat, and talks so proudly, it's my belief he ain't no better than the rest on us."

Considering the treatment he had received, and the conversation he overheard, the conclusion was not a forced one.

It is a sad truth, but no less a truth, that poverty and crime both tend to make children unnaturally precocious,—on the same principle, no doubt, that the instinct of self-preservation is developed sooner in animals in their wild state than domestic ones. Jack had but one clue—a very slight one—but he determined to follow it perseveringly; he noticed, whilst talking with his uncle in the little paved court at the end of the bridge, that the soles of his boots were stained with gravel. On quitting his concealment he walked through every street in the neighbourhood of the bridge, to discover, if possible, where any had been laid down. For a long time he was unsuccessful. At last he ventured into the park, and found that the parade in front of the Horse Guards was being repaired, and gravel spread in all directions.

Like the Indian hunter following a track, he had found the first footprints of his prey.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

ON THE PRESERVATION OF HEALTH.

THE preservation of health is one of the most important duties of life. If we desire to preserve the soundness of our mental faculties, we must have proper regard to the condition of our physical organs. While it is quite true that the body is the servant of the mind, it is also true that when that servant is overtaxed, or when its requirements are overlooked, it rebels and becomes the taskmaster of the soul. The glory of young men is their strength. How to support that strength is a momentous inquiry, and though we cannot hope in this brief article to do anything more than furnish a few hints to our readers, those few hints may lead them to consider the subject carefully.

A large number of persons live in continual transgression of the laws of vital economy. They eat unwholesome food, they eat improper quantities and at improper times. They drink unwholesome drinks, and are intemperate over them. They breathe impure air, impregnated with the very seeds of death. They sleep in confined rooms, and shut out the pure air of heaven, as if it were dangerous. They sleep when they should be awake; and are awake when they should be asleep. They clothe themselves in attire ill-adapted to the free development and action of the muscular powers. They take too much exercise, or too little, and both at improper times.

Another class of people are perpetually doctoring themselves. The physic they take is enough to undermine the strongest constitution. They pour medicine, of which they know little, into bodies, of which they know less. They study—if we may dignify it by that name—not how to keep well, but how to get well; not how to keep in health, but how to remedy disease; they reverse the old maxim, and with them cure is better than prevention.

VENTILATION.

Air is an essential of life. Air of some sort or other we must have; but we are not half particular enough about what sort of air we get. We grumble a good deal about bad water and bad gas, but voluntarily receive into our lungs a large quantity of bad air without a single complaint. What we want is ventilation. A proper system of ventilation, in our present ill-constructed dwellings, is practically impossible; but much may be done to improve them. Every pair of lungs in a room consumes about a pint of air at every breath, and expels another pint of air into the room. What is necessary is a continued renewal of the air; otherwise, the atmosphere becomes thoroughly vitiated, and the results are seen in diseases of various kinds.

Instead of admitting fresh air into our rooms, we carefully exclude it. Or if we admit it at all, we allow it to come in at improper times, and catch cold, and lay the seeds of pulmonary complaints in consequence.

Now, a very excellent means of changing the air of a room is by using the door as a fan: that is, by swinging it to and fro rather rapidly. To have a "ventilator" introduced into the window is another very excellent mode of obtaining fresh air.

Bedrooms may be improved by the same means. People sometimes block up the fire-place, to "shut out the cold." By doing so they also shut out health, by destroying an important means of ventilation. On rising in the morning the door and windows ought to be opened. It is injurious to sleep in a bed closely surrounded by curtains. French bedsteads, without curtains, are the healthiest of sleeping-places. No bedroom should be without a fire-place, and no fire-place in a bedroom ought to remain without having a fire occasionally—not to "coddle" over, but to warm and ventilate the room.

BATHING.

To keep us in health we need plenty of water as well as plenty of air. As this necessity is not so obvious, some of us forget it altogether. A clean skin is essential to the health. To keep it clean requires frequent bathing. The skin should be bathed regularly in cold water. Tepid water may be used, if unaccustomed to cold water, till use—that is, second nature—makes you fit to bear it cold. The skin should be rubbed thoroughly dry with a coarse towel until the whole frame is in a warm, healthy glow. The feet, the head, the nails, the teeth, the hair, should be habitually cleansed. Nothing should ever induce us to neglect this important duty.

Frequent ablutions are a part of Oriental worship. The propriety of this is self-evident. "Cleanliness," says the proverb, "is next to godliness;" and there really is more truth in this than we are sometimes willing to admit.

CLOTHING.

Clothing is another important consideration in connection with health. The best physiological rule of dress is to have all garments as light in texture and as loose in fashion as is consistent with bodily comfort, and as will admit of the most perfect freedom in the exercise of every muscle of the body. One important rule to be observed is, that whatever we wear should be always worn under similar circumstances. To wear thick boots one day, and thin boots another day—both days being of the same temperature—is a sure way to impair health. Yet how frequently, by people who ought to know better, is this sort of thing done.

Again, fashion and health have very little in common. If they ever were in partnership, it has been dissolved long ago, and fashion, taking everything into his own hands, has made poor health a bankrupt. We make all sorts of blunders under the conviction that they are blunders;—submit to a costume which is confessedly prejudicial to our health, on the simple ground that it is the fashion to do so. Here, indeed, the humbler classes have a decided advantage over the wealthy. It is not essentially necessary for them to wear this, that, or the other before they can be admitted into "society." They are, happily, free from the obligation to make themselves walking fashion-books and tailors' pattern-cards; and this is something to be thankful for.

DIET.

Diet is another subject which demands careful consideration. As a general rule, we over-eat ourselves, and do so on indigestible food. A good many of us live to eat, instead of eating to live. Habitual superiority to the gratification of the appetite, is conducive to health, peace, and longevity. History records that when Athens was desolated by the plague, Socrates escaped through the frugal and temperate habits of his life. He accustomed himself to a diet generous enough to invigorate health, but he was not avaricious of those luxuries which reward their votaries with burdensome days and sleepless nights. Nature never demands dainties; they are sought for only by artificial appetites, and accelerate the ruin of those who crave the delights of splendid misery. Men whose minds possess the greatest vivacity, penetration, and strength, are usually abstemious. Newton abstained from meat when he wished to study deeply, and lived almost entirely on vegetables. Michael Angelo, while he was painting his "Last Judgment," fed only on bread and fruit. In Vasari's life of him it is said that he was so temperate that he slept but a small portion of the night, and often rose before day to work, so little was he disturbed by the vapours of his thin repast.

He was not one of those who, having wasted all the wealth of natural endowments in rioting and indolence, are at last compelled to regret that poisoned hours have debarr'd them from every enjoyment.

The two purposes of food are, first, to supply the nourishment that takes the place of the old and decayed particles of the body; and second, to furnish the fuel needed in the capillaries to warm the body. Thus we require heat-forming and flesh-forming food. Articles that contain in a given weight the largest amount of the elements that both warm and nourish the body are the most nutritious. It is a mistaken idea to suppose that animal food is in every respect superior to a vegetable diet. Both are needed to support the system, a mixed diet being the best that can be adopted.

To confine our diet to one class of food is extremely injudicious. There should always be such variety as to furnish all the elements needed to nourish the body. The selection of food should vary with temperature and season; with age and temperament. Universal experience has shown that simple food digests more easily than rich and complicated dishes. All articles made rich with butter, sugar, and spices are difficult to digest. In selecting food, then, regard should be had to its relative digestibility, and to the state of health, especially, of the digestive organs.

Physicians and physiologists maintain that there is more sickness caused by excess in the quantity of food taken, than by the violation of any other law of health. Two or three rules should be observed with regard to this disposition. Persons who perform manual labour, or who take a great deal of exercise, demand more food than those of sedentary habits. The quantity of food taken should vary with the amount of physical exercise, and excess should be guarded against by a simple diet and the avoidance of condiments. Food should be taken at regular times, and at intervals of five or six hours. No food should be taken into the stomach while the digestive process is incomplete. Immediately after eating a full meal, vigorous exercise of body or mind should be avoided. Two or more hours should intervene between eating and sleeping.

But there is no way in which the stomach and the whole body has been so much injured as by the use of stimulating drinks. Such stimulus is always followed by a reaction of debility, which is proportioned to the degree of previous stimulation. The best preventative against matured evils is the practice that guards against their smallest beginnings.

"Though I look old, yet I am strong and lusty;
For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors to my blood;
Nor did not with unashful forehead woo
The means of weakness and debility;
Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,
Frosty, but kindly."

EXERCISE.

To insure health we must take proper exercise. Virtuous activity is the law of health. In proportion as our physical nature is healthfully developed by suitable discipline, winning the greatest vigour of limb and greatest acuteness of sense, we acquire important aids to the intellectual and moral powers. By a delightful reaction, the mind, in proportion as it is invigorated and beautified, gives strength and elegance to the body, and enlarges the sphere of action and enjoyment. At Athens the gymnasia became the temples of the Graces. The field of Olympia was to the Greeks the most sacred inclosure of the gods. The games thereon practised, among other uses, promoted manly education, by teaching that the body has its honours as well as the mind. They felt, and we ought to feel also, the vast importance of physical agility and strength.

Health has been defined as "the handle by which we can apprehend and perceive pleasures; and that same which also makes life delicious." It is, indeed, an invaluable treasure. Cicero says that we should not have any respect to pleasure, but only to the preservation of our health and strength, in our food, clothes, and other conveniences belonging to the body. But the fact is, in securing health we secure pleasure. They go together. A diseased frame is cut off from the enjoyments of life. So little care, however, do we take of the simplest rules of physiology, that we seem to set at defiance all the laws of health. We want to know more about these laws; to study them for ourselves; to become practically acquainted with what is and what is not conducive to a healthy condition of body. We should make health a subject of study. We should make experiments for ourselves, and determine what is best for our own health. Systems differ a little. No absolute rule can be laid down for all to follow which would be of the highest practicable benefit to all. But the differences are small. The general laws of health are universal. Let all seek the general laws of health, and the minute differences they will easily find out. Let youth remember the long life that is probably before them; remember the great duties that devolve upon them, what they are, and what they ought to be, and then decide whether they will strive to be healthy and strong, free from disease, pain, physical debility and corruptions, that they may be and do what God, humanity, and their own happiness and well-being ask of them.

MRS. MORTIMER'S NEW VELVET CLOAK.

"But you will allow, Fred, that it is the greatest of bargains!" And Nelly Mortimer looked anxiously at her husband, as he buttoned his overcoat after dinner, preparatory to leaving for the office. "And only think," she continued, "I can get a whole cloak for a trifle more than Mrs. Granby paid for one yard of hers!"

"Yes, my dear; and I am confident the difference in the looks of the cloaks will plainly tell the difference in the price. Depend upon it, Nelly, these wonderful bargains seldom amount to much." And Mr. Mortimer leaned back against the door, and buried his hands in his coat pockets nearly to his elbows.

"Well, I am sure I never saw anything so cheap." And Nelly pouted. "I do not see one particle of difference in it at all. And, just think, a velvet cloak for twelve shillings a yard, only one pound sixteen shillings for the whole!"

"But there are the linings, trimmings, and all the etceteras," persisted Mr. Mortimer.

"Oh, as for that, Fred, I have it all settled. I will take my old blue silk dress (I am so tired of it) for lining, and I will have it cut and basted, and I can make it myself. So you see how cheap it will all be. And I do hate that great shawl, I always feel so muffled up in it."

"Then this is no new plot of yours, eh, little one?" And Fred thought of the "old blue silk," which was not three months old, and a favourite of his, and the firesome shawl; and Nelly said she thought it was such a bargain, she hated to let it slip, and the shopman told her, in sober truth, that it cost them nearly twice the price he asked for it. And she looked so earnest about it that the hands came slowly from the capacious pockets, and Nelly noticed that her husband had a peculiarly wise look, and a roguish twinkle in his eye, as he gave her the required sum, and bade her good-bye until tea-time.

'Twas in the early spring-time before, that Nelly Greyson left her own quiet village home a bride. About a year before, Frederick Mortimer chanced to spend some little time in their vicinity transacting some business, and became acquainted with Nelly's brother Harry, and was consequently invited to call during his stay, which he gladly did; and, being quite charmed with the little home circle which received him so cordially, his calls lengthened into visits, and frequent ones, too. And, after his return home, there came such highly-perfumed letters, written on tinted note-paper, addressed to "Miss Nelly Greyson," that all the people who chanced to know anything about it thought that it meant something; and it all ended in Fred's taking some neat but quiet apartments, and bringing the pretty little Nelly into town to reside therein.

It was not to be wondered at that Mrs. Frederick Mortimer was at first fairly bewildered with everything she saw. She, who had rarely been from home, except to school, was as yet a novice in the ways and customs of the world into which she had been transplanted; but it was new, and consequently delightful, and as she became acquainted with those around her, and the strangers became friends, Nelly was nearly happy.

There was one thing that troubled Mrs. Mortimer exceedingly, and was the great bugbear of her existence; she wished to be fashionable, to be quoted, to be copied. To be called the "fashionable Mrs. Mortimer" was the great object of her ambition; and, as she heard the merits of people rated in proportion to their dress and fashionable position in society, was it wonderful that Mrs. Frederick Mortimer should wish to be considered as one among the chosen?

Fred had often observed of late, that Nelly, when walking with him, was constantly pointing out some "love of a bonnet," or "magnificent silk," and twisted her neck peeping in at the shop-windows that they passed; and she was for ever quoting Mrs. Granby, who was an extravagant woman, and managed to spend in one year upon her showy person enough to support two small families. She was always showing "dear Mrs. Mortimer" some new purchase, and as she lived almost next door, Nelly and she were upon quite intimate terms.

Notwithstanding her friendly pretensions, however, there was a spice of malice in it all; and she had a faculty of reading at a glance the very unsuspicious little Nelly, and knowing also that the new firm in Brook-street was not doing such a flourishing business as Granby & Co.; and, however much Mrs. Mortimer deserved to equal, or even approach herself, or Mrs. Graham and Warren on the floor below, it would be an utter impossibility.

Nelly Mortimer would have been exceedingly shocked had any one told her that such a spirit was creeping into her heart, yet she did often whisper to herself that it would be so grand to dress beautifully, and to have just as much money as she could spend, like Mrs. Granby; still, she had a great horror of being considered extravagant, and when she heard one after another of her lady friends call the rest so, and wonder if their husbands could afford such things, Nelly thought, with satisfaction to herself, "they surely cannot say as much of me."

About this cloak business, Nelly had had many miserable thoughts. Ever since she went with Mrs. Granby, and heard her order a cloak made from a piece of forty shilling velvet, and knew also that Mrs. Warren had concluded to have one from the same piece, Nelly's planning commenced. She knew she could not afford one half so expensive, and she knew also that she really needed none, as her shawl was new and very nice; yet a cloak would be so very becoming. She did so hate to ask Fred, for he had already bought more for her than would have sufficed for two years in her country home; but Nelly was desperate, and when she chanced to see the piece that was offered at the astonishingly low price of twelve shillings a yard, she made the effort and succeeded.

Never in all her life had Nelly felt so glad as when she spread the bank-note out to be sure that she really had it, and already, in imagination, she was walking with Fred with the identical velvet cloak drooping daintily from her shoulders. A low tap at the door, and it immediately opened, and Mrs. Granby wanted to show "dear Mrs. Mortimer such an exquisite set of laces, and so cheap!" was perfectly wonderful. And then, if she told how cheap, she must never breathe it, or Mrs. Warren and Mrs. Peters would be sure to get some just like them. Mrs. Graham had a set already, not half so beautiful, and it cost much more. But, notwithstanding the numerous invitations to guess the price, Nelly was wisely silent, for she had not the most remote idea of it.

Before tea-time the velvet was purchased, and when asked by the shopman for her address, she told him she would take it herself. Such an unusual answer evidently struck the man as singular; but Nelly glided out of the shop with her bundle, and took her way to one of the most fashionable modistes.

"We do not cut and baste, madam," was the answer to her inquiry after her long walk; "we can make your cloak if you wish." Just then, one of the sewing girls appeared, pulled the basting threads from a splendid rainbow plaided silk, handed it for inspection, and commenced putting on her bonnet and shawl.

"Mary, cut and baste this lady's cloak before you go," for Nelly had remained standing, wondering in her own mind what she should do. She certainly could not leave it to be made, and where should she go to have it cut? Possibly no one cuts cloaks without making them, so, when the sullen Mary disappeared into the next room with the velvet, Nelly felt inexpressibly relieved.

"Oh, if she had kindness enough to let it alone, I should have thanked her!" thought Mrs. Mortimer an hour afterwards, as she tried in vain to find how in the world to put it together. The cloth had been cut regardless of quantity, and it was to be pieced in several places, and one shoulder was full two inches shorter than the other; and as Fred's step was heard at the door, the new-cloak vanished into the closet, the perplexed look was gone, and Nelly was as gay as a bird.

For the next few days Mrs. Mortimer was denied to every one who knocked, and Mrs. Granby said she believed she was always "out." Nelly did not deny the charge, and worked steadily at the cloak, sewing and ripping, basting and trying on, until she fairly hated the sight of it, and wished she had not been so foolish as to purchase it; but it was too late, so she worked on; yet it looked bungling, and hung awry, and once or twice she gathered it up, and looking desperately at the glowing coal grate, she felt that it would be such a satisfaction to see it crisping on the red-hot embers.

After several days of weary labour, she had the pleasure of proclaiming to herself that it was done; and as she glanced at herself in the mirror, she rather liked it; still, she could not forget the trouble it had cost her, and that it was pieced so much; she was sure that would be seen, and altogether it looked unfinished. Then she thought of those beautiful trimmings she had admired so much only a few days before, which would be such an addition, and would entirely hide the defects; but then she had not money enough to buy them, not even one yard—and her porte-monnaie was opened; she still had the little gold half-sovereigns that Fred had given her, telling her to keep them for a year, and see how many she would get; and never before had she the least inclination to spend one of them; but now she looked at the cloak, called it "dowdy," and resolved to buy the trimming, cost what it would.

"My dear Mrs. Mortimer, I do so want you to go shopping with me this morning," said Mrs. Granby. "I want your good taste in the selection of some dresses; come, that's a darling. I dislike very much to go alone."

How beautifully she looked, dressed so superbly! Nelly felt an inward satisfaction that she had her velvet cloak done to wear; and as she came out with it on, she felt that she looked well, and was sure she made a better appearance than she would in her shawl.

"Oh, my dear, that is something new, is it not?" said Mrs. Granby, glancing at the new cloak. "When did it come home?"

"Yesterday it was finished," answered Nelly, forgetting to say that it had been "at home" all the time.

"But, my dear creature, you have been most miserably cheated. Did you know that it was half cotton?" and Mrs. Granby held it beside her own.

"No, indeed, I did not!" answered Nelly, indignantly. "Why do you ask such a thing? I am sure I thought it was good, or, I assure you, I never should have taken it. The shopman told me he had never sold a yard less than—"

"It's a shame; but never mind. Come, or we shall not get back in time for dinner," and Nelly went, carrying the empty porte-monnaie, feeling heartily sick of her new velvet cloak, and trying to keep it from blowing open, so that Mrs. Granby should not know that it was lined with her "old blue silk."

On the next Sunday Nelly stood ready for church in her new cloak, and Fred praised her looks, and admired her until she began to think he was actually making fun of her, and she felt she ought to look pleased, he took such infinite pains; yet she felt wretched in spite of her endeavours, and when he asked if the "beautiful trimming was thrown in with the bargain," she had hard work to keep back the tears. However, she conquered; but I am afraid that Nelly did not hear much of the sermon that day.

A short time afterwards, as Mrs. Mortimer was passing along the street, she heard her name mentioned, then came a low titter, and Mrs. Warren and Mrs. Graham—two friends—simultaneously exclaimed, "I thought as much!" Then the voice of Mrs. Granby, who was with them, went on speaking in a low tone, yet sufficiently loud for poor Nelly to hear, "Cotton velvet—old dress—the trimming cost more than the cloak," and poor humbled little Mrs. Mortimer hurried on; she had heard enough. How earnestly she wished that her coveted cloak would catch on fire, or be stolen—anything, to get rid of it; and in answer to Fred's inquiries as to her downcast expression at dinner, she pleaded a headache.

"But why not wear your new cloak, Nelly? It looks much better than that shawl," said Mr. Mortimer, as his wife appeared before him, ready to accompany him to a lecture.

"Oh, I had rather wear this to-night!" answered Nelly, examining the fastening of her glove.

"Getting economical, eh? Afraid you will injure it by wearing it in the evening, I suppose; but never mind, my dear, wear it to-night, you look so muffled up in that. I like to see you in your best."

What more could be said? Nelly quietly folded up the shawl and placed it in her drawer, and putting on her cloak went to the lecture. It seemed to her all ways to be the way; she never went with Fred but he insisted upon her wearing her new cloak, and if she demurred, he made the invariable reply, "Don't be so saving of it, Nelly; there are more where that came from. It did not cost you much, only twelve shillings a yard; now if you had paid forty, like Mrs. Granby, you might well be miserly."

Poor little Mrs. Mortimer! How wretched all this made her! Fred was so provoking; she was sure she should hate him if he kept on in this way.

For some reason or another, there had grown up a decided coolness between herself and Mrs. Granby since the arrival of the new cloak; and when Fred came home one night, and told her that he had bought a house, and thought seriously of housekeeping, she felt happier than she had for weeks before.

"Come, darling, put on your cloak and bonnet, and we will walk over and see it; it's not far from here, and I know you need a little exercise."

So they started, and if Nelly saw any "loves of bonnets" or "superb mantillas" on the way, she never mentioned it; and imagine her surprise when Fred stopped before an elegant little brick cottage surmounted with a light iron balcony. Through the blinds, which were turned, very handsome lace and damask curtains were visible, and Nelly looked incredulous. If the outside looked beautiful, she was charmed with the interior, for, behold, it was furnished throughout, and all in such exquisite taste that she felt sure she was walking in a dream.

"Fred, you are cheating me. Whose house is this that you are careering over at this rate? Surely, it is not ours. How could you buy this?"

"Why not, little one? But you have not seen your own room yet, Nelly—your sanctum, if you like," and he led the way to a perfect bijou of a place, fit for a fairy queen; and yet could she believe it? Surely she was dreaming, for there, in a rosewood wardrobe, hung the most beautiful velvet cloak that was ever bought, and near it one of those sweet little white bonnets, with its snowy plumes, that looked like woven snow-flakes, and a blue silk dress was just visible through the folds of tissue paper in which it lay.

Nelly was bewildered. She looked first at Fred, and then at the things before her, and burst into tears.

"I knew you were making fun of me all the while," was sobbed forth, and Nelly sank down on the little couch by the window. "You knew this was not fit to wear, and you made me wear it."

"Never mind, Nelly, pet; it's all over now. You have bought your whistle, as all poor human creatures have done before you; and although you did get yours at a great bargain, you were wonderfully cheated."

In less than a week the Mortimers were quite domesticated in their new home; and Nelly made such a nice little housekeeper! Fred never knew half her worth until then.

In due time Mrs. Granby and all the ladies called upon their dearest Mrs. Mortimer, and were charmed with her establishment, and promised Nelly, without her asking, that they would call often, and even stay to tea with her.

"Who ever imagined he was rich?" said Mrs. Granby on her way home. "Why, only think, I heard yesterday that he was partner in one of our largest wholesale houses."

Nelly never returned the calls of her would-be-friends; she never could forget the story of her cloak; and when she told Fred the whole from the beginning to the end, about the half-sovereigns and all, he laughed heartily.

"So they thought you tried to ape them, did they, Nelly? and you were caught in your own trap. I thought I would see how you would figure as a poor man's wife, among those better off than yourself, and see if you could withstand temptation; and now, Nelly, I beg of you, never buy 'wonderful bargains;' if you want a good thing, wait until you are able to have it."

Nelly felt humbled, indeed; and as she grew older, and found herself a leader in the circle that she had viewed at a distance with such envious eyes, she saw that the gayest and most expensively dressed were far from the happiest; and, in fact, her whole career through life was, in some way, influenced by the memory of her new velvet cloak.

A THOUGHTFUL writer gives this lesson to parents, which cannot be conned over too thoughtfully:—"You are always educating your children for good or evil. Not only by what you say, but by what you do, not only by what you intend, but by what you are—you yourself are one constant lesson, which many eyes are observing, and which many a heart receives into itself. Influence, power, impulse, are ever going out from you. Take care, then, how you act."

A HAPPY MARRIAGE.—It is a glorious sight to see two old people, who have weathered the storms and basked in the sunshine of life together, go hand in hand, lovingly and truthfully, down the gentle declivity of time, with no anger, nor jealousies, nor hatreds garnered up against each other, and looking with hope and joy to the everlasting youth of heaven, where they two shall be one for ever. That is true marriage—for it is the marriage of spirit with spirit. Their love is woven into a woof of gold, that neither time nor eternity can sever.

"IT SNOWS."

"It snows," cries the schoolboy, "Hurrah!" and his shout is ringing thro' parlour and hall, While swift as the wing of a swallow, he's out, And his playmates have answered his call. It makes the heart leap but to witness their joy; Proud wealth has no pleasure, I trow, Like the rapture that burns in the blood of the boy As he gathers his treasure of snow. Then lay not the trappings of gold on thine heirs, While health and the riches of nature are theirs.

"It snows," cries the imbecile, "Ah!" and his breath Comes heavy, as clogged with a weight; While, from the pale aspect of nature in death, He turns to the blaze of his grate; And nearer and nearer his soft cushioned chair Is wheeled toward the life-giving flame. He dreads a chill puff of the snow-burdened air, Lest it wither his delicate frame. Oh, small is the pleasure existence can give When the fear that we die only proves that we live!

"It snows," cries the traveller, "Ho!" and the word Has quickened his steed's lagging pace; The wind rushes by, but its howl is unheard— Unfelt the sharp drift in his face; For bright, through the tempest, his own home appeared, Though leagues intervene he can see The warm glowing hearth, and the table prepared, And his wife with their babe at her knee. Blest thought! how it lightens the grief-laden hour That those we love dearest are safe from its power!

"It snows," cries the widow, "O God!" and her sigh Has stifled the voice of her prayer! Its burden you'll read in her tear-swollen eye, Or her cheek pale with fasting and care. 'Tis night, and her fatherless ask her for bread— But "He gives the young ravens their food"— And she trusts, till her dark hearth adds horror to dread, As she lays on her last chip of wood. Poor sufferer! thy sorrow thy God only knows: 'Tis a most bitter lot to be poor when it snows.

SIR FITZROY KELLY.

THE subject of our sketch was born in London in the year 1796. His father, Robert Hawke Kelly, was a captain in the royal navy, during that most glorious period of England's supremacy on the sea when Nelson was winning fresh laurels for his country. His grandfather, on his mother's side, held an official appointment as cup-bearer to George III.

Fitzroy Kelly did not begin to study law till he was three-and-twenty, but his intellectual power, his great grasp of mind, and his unwearied application, made up for lost time. He entered at Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar by that society, and went to seek his fortune on the Norfolk circuit. Many men had gone before him on the same errand, and had failed in finding anything but disappointment. They had supported the dignity of the bar, when they could scarcely support themselves; had wearily and drearily grown gray—gray as their wigs—in the feeble hope of obtaining a brief some day. But their hope had been vain. They never experienced the emotions of a first speech, they never knew the pleasure of a first retainer; and worn out and thoroughly dispirited, they had turned at last to some more lucrative profession. But it was not so with Fitzroy Kelly. He was a man of mark. Sharp-sighted attorneys saw that he was just the man for them; that his talent and acuteness were of no ordinary kind, and briefs came in upon him by shoals.

In 1835 Fitzroy Kelly was made a king's counsel and elected a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and about the same time he was returned to the House of Commons, as member for Ipswich. He had unsuccessfully contested the borough of Ipswich in 1832, and that of Hythe in 1830. But not at all cast down by failure, he had tried again—the true secret of all success—and was duly elected. He sat for Ipswich from January to June, 1835, when he was unseated on petition; was again unsuccessful at the general election in July, 1837, but succeeded by petition; and from February, 1838, to July, 1841, sat in the Commons as member for the borough on account of which he had battled so long.

At the bar, on the hustings, in the House, Fitzroy Kelly has invariably exhibited the same indomitable energy. He was not to be diverted from his purpose by any obstacle, however insurmountable that obstacle might appear. He gloried in triumphing over difficulties. Whether it was an unwilling witness he had to examine, or a sturdy political opponent he had to confront; whether it was the intricacies of a difficult case he had to unravel, or powerful antagonism to a proposed measure he had to overcome, he was always ready to grapple with the opposition, and in most cases with success.

In 1841 Fitzroy Kelly again contested the borough of Ipswich, and was thrown out. In 1843 he was returned for Cambridge, which he represented in parliament till 1847. During the administration of Sir Robert Peel, he was nominated standing counsel to the Bank of England, was appointed solicitor-general, and received the honour of knighthood.

At the general election in 1847 Sir Fitzroy Kelly unsuccessfully contested the borough of Lyme Regis, and was excluded from parliament for five years. He was then returned for Harwich, and again took office as solicitor-general under the premiership of Lord Derby. Before taking his seat, however, for Harwich, he was returned for East Suffolk, having become a landed proprietor and deputy-lieutenant of that county. In conjunction with his colleagues he resigned office, but has twice been re-elected to parliament for East Suffolk.

In politics Sir Fitzroy Kelly is a conservative, but although firmly attached to the Established Church, he is in favour of civil and religious liberty. His reforming tendencies have also been shown in his support of measures for the relief of the agricultural and shipping interests, and for the amendment of the law.

As a lawyer he occupies a deservedly conspicuous place, and is no less celebrated for intimate acquaintance with the details of jurisprudence than he is for his persuasive and brilliant eloquence. That he has on occasion misused these powers is sometimes urged, as in the Tawell case; but these objections are only a part of the vexed question as to how far a pleader is justified in defending his client. Such a charge as this can be no more fairly brought against Sir Fitzroy Kelly than against other gentlemen of the long robe.

THE RELIEF OF LUCKNOW.

MODERN criticism has destroyed our faith in many of the most interesting incidents of our history. The bower of Fair Rosamond and the vengeance of Queen Eleanor is as untrue—so says the terrible critic—as the ghosts of Woodstock; the wife of chivalrous Longshanks never sucked the poison from his wound; Queen Philippa never petitioned her husband to spare the lives of the citizens of Calais; it is doubtful whether Joan of Arc was half so chivalrous as she is represented to have been; and the story of Queen Margaret and the robber is almost as apocryphal as any of the fables in Livy.

On one after another the hammer is brought down—weighty as Thor's thunder hammer—on our most fondly cherished stories; and we are left to mourn over their remains, and content ourselves, if we can, with what the critics tell us is historic truth.

But our faith in many stories—banished to the limbo of fiction—is sometimes revived by a modern incident, which bears with it all the interest and beauty of old romance. Now and then we read in a newspaper an account of something which has recently taken place, and which exercises all the fascinating power of those incidents of bygone time, which we are taught to regard as legends. Then we argue with ourselves, if this incident be true, if it cannot be gainsaid, if it is established on irrefragable evidence, perhaps some of the "legends" of old were true, after all.

What a romantic, interesting, and beautiful incident, for instance, is that which recently took place at Lucknow! The story of Jessie Brown is far more thrilling than many a "hatch up" that might be named. It is just one of those things on which a grave critic would cast a doubt, would pass over as simply "a story told at the time," and yet the matter is really as true as the capture of Delhi or the victory of Agra.

The incident, so simple and touching in its character, has furnished our artist with materials for an admirable illustration. Jessie has heard the pibroch, the garrison have caught the strain, above every other sound the blast of the Scottish bagpipe is borne on the winds—relief is at hand—thank God—the Campbells are coming!

The account of Jessie Brown is related by one of the rescued party, the lady of an officer at Lucknow, and we give it in her own words:—

"On every side death stared us in the face; no human skill could avert it any longer. We saw the moment approach when we must bid farewell to earth, yet without feeling that unutterable horror which must have been experienced by the unhappy victims at Cawnpore. We were resolved rather to die than to yield, and were fully persuaded that in twenty-four hours all would be over. The engineers had said so, and all knew the worst. We women strove to encourage each other, and to perform the light duties which had been assigned to us, such as conveying orders to the batteries and supplying the men with provisions, especially cups of coffee, which we prepared day and night. I had gone out to try and make myself useful, in company with Jessie Brown, the wife of a corporal in my husband's regiment. Poor Jessie had been in a state of restless excitement all through the siege, and had fallen away visibly within the last few days. A constant fever consumed her, and her mind wandered occasionally, especially that day, when the recollections of home seemed powerfully present to her. At last, overcome with fatigue, she lay down on the ground, wrapped up in her plaid. I sat beside her, promising to awaken her when, as she said, 'her father should return from the ploughing.' She fell at length into a profound slumber, motionless, and apparently breathless, her head resting in my lap. I myself could no longer resist the inclination to sleep, in spite of the continual roar of the cannon. Suddenly I was aroused by a wild unearthly scream close to my ear; my companion stood upright beside me, her arms raised, and her head bent forward in the attitude of listening. A look of intense delight broke over her countenance, she grasped my hand, drew me towards her, and exclaimed—

THE RELIEF OF LUCKNOW.

"'Dinna ye hear it? dinna ye hear it? Ay, I'm no dreamin', it's the slogan o' the Highlanders! We're saved, we're saved!'"

"Then, flinging herself on her knees, she thanked God with passionate fervour. I felt utterly bewildered: my English ears heard only the roar of artillery, and I thought my poor Jessie was still raving; but she darted to the batteries, and I heard her cry incessantly to the men—

"'Courage! courage! hark to the slogan,—to the Macgregor, the grandest of them a'. Here's help at last!'"

"To describe the effect of these words upon the soldiers would be impossible. For a moment they ceased firing, and every soul listened with intense anxiety. Gradually, however, there arose a murmur of bitter disappointment, and the wailing of the women who had flocked to the spot burst out anew, as the colonel shook his head. Our dull lowland ears heard nothing but the rattle of the musketry. A few moments more of this death-like suspense, of this agonising hope, and Jessie, who had again sunk on the ground, sprang to her feet, and cried, in a voice so clear and piercing that it was heard along the whole line—

"'Will ye no' believe it noo? The slogan has ceased indeed, but the Campbells are comin'? D'ye hear, d'ye hear!'"

"At that moment we seemed, indeed, to hear the voice of God in the distance, when the pibroch of the Highlanders brought us tidings of deliverance, for now there was no longer any doubt of the fact. That shrill, penetrating, ceaseless sound, which rose above all other sounds, could come neither from the advance of the enemy, nor from the work of the Sappers. No, it was indeed the blast of the Scottish bagpipes, now shrill and harsh, as threatening vengeance on the foe, then in softer tones seeming to promise succour to their friends in need.

"Never surely was there such a scene as that which followed. Not a heart in the residency of Lucknow but bowed itself before God. All, by one simultaneous impulse, fell upon their knees, and nothing was heard but bursting sobs and the murmured voice of prayer. Then all arose, and there rang out from a thousand lips a great shout of joy, which resounded far and wide, and lent new vigour to that blessed pibroch. To our cheer of 'God save the Queen,' they replied by the well-known strain that moves every Scot to tears, 'Should auld acquaintance be forgot,' &c.

"After that, nothing else made any impression on me. I scarcely remember what followed. Jessie was presented to the general on his entrance into the fort, and at the officers' banquet her health was drunk by all present, while the pipers marched round the table playing once more the familiar air of 'Auld lang syne.'"

CHAPTER XXI.

FIRST-FRUIT.

A "MIXED" train, first, second, and third-class, is always "going up."

Another "mixed" train, first, second, and third-class, also, is ever "going down."

What a rush is the railway journey of life, whether our terminus be failure or success!

Up-train.—Statesmen's private secretaries becoming cabinet ministers—first-class. Linendrapers, changing from No. 2, a single window, to No. 1, a corner shop and a double window—second-class. Crossing-sweeper, promoted from a back street to the bottom of the Haymarket, with the privileges of a fashionable church on the Sunday morning—third-class.

Away they go, minister, draper, crossing-sweeper; up, up, and delivering their white, blue, and yellow tickets at the end. They are in the metropolis of their different ambitions.

Down-train.—Noble earl, losing himself so often in law, duels, and bad nature, that he never finds himself again; and men with bills round their crooked hats "patter" of him about Clerkenwell—first-class down. Our friend Dobson of the Summer-house Company, or Redroad of the Little Southern, being requested to state what occurs to him as a reason "why the court should not give him judgment according to law,"—Oyez! oyez!—the second-class, going down. Jammy Senterbit, having become too stiff in the joints for "cracking cribs," takes to a little quiet business in the crowd, on a Monday morning, at the Old Bailey—third-class, going down.

And thus, year after year, the shrieking, and the whistling, and the roaring on these two lines of rail, are going forward, and will go forward when we, for all our parts, have stepped at last on the platform, and found the "way out."

Now and then, we may scarcely be quite sure whether we are succeeding or failing in life;—something as when, in the middle of a tunnel, we would declare we are "going up," when we are "going down," or vice versa.

But, for the most part, we have a tolerably correct idea, in our sober moments, where our destination will be; and when we reach it, if not before, we shall discover how natural it is for us to be just where we find ourselves, having, whether in class first, second, or third, solemnly and deliberately booked ourselves to go.

Now, it will but be necessary for the reader to recollect where we parted with Master Claude Blance Latson, to gain a very good notion of the fact that he was travelling, first class, on the down line, though at present, as one may say, only at "half fare."

For how it could be otherwise, with a child whose fifth or sixth year began to familiarise him with such scenes as those of the last chapter, it is not for us to say. Claude was a very frequent spectator of even worse sights than that in the bedroom. He had served his father for almost every horrible object which a madman's brain could picture. Claude could never go near him at those times without being taken for a vulture, a wolf, a cloud of lizards, or something more impalpable and more to be dreaded; whilst, in paroxysms of rage, when there was not enough drink in the poor wretch to bring on the delirium, he would treat even his boy, whom he doated on when in his senses, with brutal violence.

Such was the school in which Claude Latson passed the first ten years of his life.

And yet hardly so much as that.

Just about the time when, in the ordinary course of such diseases, this horror of the colonel's existence would have proved fatal, in spite even of his strong constitution, and have carried him off, a new order of symptoms set in, as is sometimes the case, and this so far varied the malady, that it gave a rather better complexion to the last few years that Claude spent at home.

An enormously vigorous constitution had managed to outlive the fearful mania which would have destroyed four drunkards out of five. But then, the powers of digestion gave way. Latson was forced to drink less; and then came in the quieter, slower, but just as deadly marks of dropsy—sometimes general, but always, more or less, about the heart and chest. Latson soon looked fifteen or twenty years older than he was.

So marvellous are the revolutions of nature, when guided by a Just Providence, as we shall see better by-and-by.

The colonel was now a confirmed valetudinarian. The burning lava no longer ran along the avenues of his frame, licking up whatever came in its way; but his system was like one of those devoted towns at the foot of the volcano when the eruption is over—charred, silent, desolate, and in ruins.

He walked out, on fine days, very slowly, and muffled up, leaning on the arm of his faithful Ralph, a useless, miserable wreck. Yet did he move no one to pity him, for his hatred of the world and of every one in it, was visible in every step, and audible in every syllable, and the world, according to its wont, returned it with interest.

We said he hated every one. Claude was the exception—and yet for him he had no love, except the love of preservation, prompted by a strong and ever-growing desire to keep an heir alive, to whom his vast property might descend, when life should be tired of him, and cast him off.

Claude at fifteen years old, having passed some year or two with a tutor, partly abroad and partly at home, was a high-spirited, imperious boy, the terror of the entire household, whose independence and ill-nature grew with the growing weakness of his father. The poor gentle creature, Mrs. Glyde, who had begged to be retained in the family, that she might nurse and watch her late mistress's son, had long since given warning, and gone in despair. All the other servants, though he was still a mere lad, trembled as they heard his step about the house. For there was no refinement of tyranny, and no ingenuity of insolence, that he had not tried on each of them. Indeed, excepting old Ralph Grange, the household had been changed again and again on his account.

You may judge of him to some extent, by one occurrence that signalled the last month he remained at home.

The colonel, since his wife died, had gone largely into the violent, and not (in his case) very honourable excitements of the turf. The companion, at whose house he had been prepared for that bedroom scene to which we admitted the reader, had slowly drawn him into the vortex, out of which no man ever came any happier, and in which most men, who are not rogues, are lost.

One of the colonel's horses was to run, this very month, at Soreby, and the colonel had backed him to a very large amount.

The only companion Claude had, was a kindred spirit to himself, the youthful Lord Blinmore, son of his father's sporting friend, the Marquis of Shackberry.

During the week before the races, Claude rode over to see his friend, on a young Arab, which had been the colonel's last birthday present to him, and which already had had ample proof, and bore it too, of his young master's notions of humanity.

"I say, Lat," remarked the young lord, that afternoon (the young lord being three or four years his senior).

"Lat! can you keep a secret, my boy?"

"What is it?" said Claude.

"Can you keep it?"

"If you're going to play the fool, Blinmore," rejoined the other, "you may order my nag round. Do you suppose I'm going to put my head into your confounded mouth, to be bitten off in the dark. Out with it, and then I'll tell ye whether I can keep it."

And to see the veins starting up on that boy's forehead with nothing more to fill them than we have related, you would have supposed he was a chivalrous youth, defending his father's character, or his mother's honour.

"Well, well, take it coolly, my dear fellow. I'll trust you, if you wait a moment; but that way of yours frightens me."

"I'm mum as death," promised Latson, a little quieter.

"Your governor has got a horse, Mandrake, that's to run, ye know."

"Well, suppose he has?"

"Well, the secret's about him, Lat. Can ye guess, now?"

"What! do ye want to know whether he'll win? because I can tell ye, that he'll as good as walk over; so make your mind easy, Blinmore; and all the better for both of us, for old Shack has put upon him too, pretty thick, hasn't he?"

"Aye, there's the rub! there's the rub! that's the point, by your leave, we're coming to."

Claude opened both eyes and ears.

"You see, Lat, though you're such a chicken in years, only eighteen, I believe—"

"Not quite sixteen," put in the other.

And Blinmore expressed his astonishment, as a gay young lord probably would.

"Well, though you're such a chicken, you're ten years older than I am in gumption, and are up to a thing or two."

"I hope so," said Claude, feeling pleased with his friend.

"My governor, Latson, has put a good sum on Mandrake, as you say—but, singular to mention, he would much rather the excellent quadruped lost than won."

"What for?" asked the boy.

"Because his lordship has three times more against him than he has for him."

"Now that I call," said Claude, "confoundedly unhandsome to my father. I know he's no idea of it."

"Of course not; and that's the secret I want you to keep, my dear fellow."

"But I tell you I won't keep it a single hour!"

"But you said you would: you said you were mum," Blinmore pleaded, very earnestly, laying his hand on his shoulder.

We decline exposing the profanity of the lad's precise words in affirming he'd let the whole out on his return.

"Now, now," said Blinmore, "you've only heard the beginning of my story. What a passionate fellow you are. I never saw your equal. You're a perfect barrel of gunpowder."

"Then keep your Guy Fawkes tricks at a distance, or I shall go off, I can tell you. I hate old Shackberry for this, and you too."

"Will you listen?"

"No."

"Well, then, good day; and you can go and split as soon as you like; and you've lost one of the best chances you'll ever have in your life. We could have made a rich man of you as long as you are at Eton, if you stay there ten years."

"Rich man of me, you fool! How can you do that? Beside, I'll be that without you."

"Very likely—but it isn't always convenient to ask a governor for every sixpence one wants."

"You want me to bet, I suppose," replied the boy, "upon some precious favourite of your father's."

"Not a bit of it. There's no horse that'll win, but Mandrake, now that this other—"

"What other?" cried young Latson. "What is it you want me to do?"

"We want Mandrake prevented from winning; is that plain enough for you, my dear innocent?"

"No, for how on earth can I hinder if I would—and why should I if I could? So you want me to rob my own father to save yours."

"You love your father, Lat; you always did. You doat on him, don't you, dear?" said Blinmore, sneeringly and softly, under his breath.

For well he remembered many a remark of Claude's rather more forcible and energetic than filial and affectionate about the colonel.

"Will you, or won't you, speak out, and say what your precious winking eyes mean? for they seem to me to be bloodshot with something awfully bad."

"Five minutes after the race, if Mandrake has not won, the Marquis of Shackberry puts into the bank, wherever you please, one thousand pounds to the credit of Latson junior," said the young lord, whispering in his friend's ear.

"A thousand pounds!" cried Claude.

"I give you my honour—and, what's more, if you doubt it, you should have my lord's writing, if I thought I could trust you."

"Blinmore, I believe you're the—"

"Of course, of course—I know whom you mean, my dear boy; but don't insult him by comparing us."

And the two youths laughed together as they walked towards the hall.

"But you don't mean to say," said Claude, after a pause, "that your father trusted you, a fellow of eighteen or nineteen, with a job like this?"

"Not a bit of it—not a bit of it; I've heard it only by the sly. But I could settle it with him in ten minutes, if you'd let me."

Claude walked back with his friend along the broad walk with an air of cogitation and wisdom far beyond his years, and seemed to be proud of thinking how great were the issues at that moment depending on himself.

At last he stopped short and said, stamping his little foot—

"No, no, it's too bad, Blinmore, too bad! I'd do anything in reason. The governor does rile me, to be sure, every day, and I often wish him and his flannels and physic I know where; but, upon my honour, this would never do. Besides, how could I manage it? Suppose I would, how could I keep Mandrake from being the winner? There's young Whistler with him night and day."

"Are jockeys afraid of their masters' sons?" asked Blinmore. "You couldn't be trusted in the stable with the favourite for five minutes alone, I suppose?"

"Suppose I was, what could I do in five minutes, you horrid fellow?"

"Well, well! that would soon be settled, if you were only game for the thousand pounds," rejoined the other; "as it is, it falls through, I fear. But give me your hand on it, Latson, that not one breath of this ever passes your lips."

"Well, I don't mind doing that, Blinmore—on one condition—that whatever you do, you'll make me something over, if your confounded plans come off with anybody else. But hang it, you're ten times worse than ever I took you for!"

"Aha!" cried his lordship, "you'll be a parson some day, and then you shall put me all right; at present, keep your mouth shut, and you shan't suffer, if things go well."

They shook hands over the bargain.

And Claude took his way homeward with a melancholy, and yet a pride upon his countenance; melancholy, at the suddenness with which he had discovered his friend's opinion of him, and at the measure of justice he saw there was in that opinion; pride, at the importance to which he, literally a boy, found himself all at once raised, though by a disgraceful proposal.

Claude did not then know, that, young as he was, he was much more than half some one's age, who had been his pattern from his birth, at the time when that some one had taken a gentle loving heart with him up to God's altar, and there tearing it to pieces, had flung it down at the foot, and had laughed as he left it there!

Claude did not know, but there was One who did.

The wind has been sown, and the whirlwind must be reaped.

CHAPTER XXII.

GATHERS THE FIRST-FRUITS, AND THE HUSBANDMAN EATS THEM.

LORD BLINMORE had called his friend a barrel of gunpowder.

The explosion might have occurred less opportunely for the schemes of his lordship, than it did that day.

On reaching "The Towers," Claude found that his father had been several times inquiring for him, and in no very placid or promising language.

"What's the matter," said old Ralph, to the lad, as he met him in the hall, "goodness only knows; but you must make haste to the colonel, and put his mind quiet, or we're in for another of our favourite nights."

"Psha!" said the youth, "let him wait. Am I in livery?"

And he took hold of his jacket, and turned fiercely on the old man. Then, made his way, purposely sauntering, to his father's room.

"Well, you sir!" cried the colonel. "You might wait till you've buried your father, I should have thought, before you left him all day long to the care of paid, mercenary wretches, like these servants."

And the man sat up and panted for breath, white with passion, and then went on, Claude lounging on the sofa, and taking up a book.

"Off you go, without a word; after I'd specially begged you'd ride out with me to-day, and—"

"You never did any such thing!" shouted his son, getting up off the couch.

"I say I did, sir!" gasped Latson; "specially begged you; for I'm sick of that old woman, Grange, night and day. One had better have had no son than—"

"A great deal," sneered the boy; "a great deal better, I should think, for me."

Latson fell back, and groaned; but not so much in grief, as for the helplessness of his anger.

"You take so much of that confounded opium, that you forget what does happen, and fancy what doesn't; that's what it is."

Latson swore fearfully—

"If I could get at you, you young villain, you should have some opium, or something quicker, you should!"

"Should I, sir—should I? Then good night to you!"

And the boy sprang to the door; and, going out, slammed it after him, and was heard all over the house (it was kept so quiet), as he dashed to his own room, and slammed that door as hard as the other.

"And so," he stormed away to himself—

"And so, this is the gentleman whom I considered so kindly at Blinmore's just now! This is the fond parent for whom I refused the prospect of a thousand pounds to start the world with!"

And the lad's thoughts were very, very evil, as he thought on—

"I care nothing now for the money, but if his horse gets the day, my name's not Claude: that's settled!"

A few moments after this, and Claude was out, walking carelessly about half a mile from the house, and happening to lounge into the stables, first into one, then into another.

"Well, Whistler, how is he to-night?"

The jockey took off his cap, in a stall so clean, that, as the old ladies say, "you might have eaten off it."

"Look at him, sir, just look at him! You should have seen him at his paces this morning, sir! Between you and me, if he doesn't take the St. Leger next year, I'm prepared to eat him, sir, from head to tail!"

"Well, wish ye joy, Whistler. But there's always danger till the pudding's eaten, ye know."

And then, Claude sat down in the stable, and renewed a conversation he had often had with the jockey, on racing subjects.

He took care to turn the dialogue in the direction which he wanted it to take, and before he left had learned all he wanted to know.

"There's only one animal I'm afraid of, Whistler," said Claude.

"Name?" said the man, with quiet contempt.

"It's that mare of Shackberry's,—what's her name?"

"Oh! I know—Nemesis. Don't bet on her, Mr. Claude: you'll lose your money."

And the honest fellow patted Mandrake's neck, and laid his head against the horse's mouth, as if they had been lovers.

The night before the horse was to go to Soresby, Claude was again apparently in great anxiety, talking with Whistler about the event.

Fifteen horses had been entered, and the meeting promised to be the most exciting the country had known for many years past.

The youth knew, moreover, that within the last few days, his father had made his book stronger than ever, in Mandrake's favour.

Whether it was at that time, or after the horse had reached the course-stables, we cannot say, but on one occasion or the other, Claude volunteered to remain on guard, while he sent Whistler on some important errand.

Account for the fact as you will, the fact is, that a terrible sum of money changed hands on that day.

Mandrake came in "a very bad third."

Colonel Latson, his owner, lost, it was said, upwards of fifteen thousand pounds.

The Marquis of Shackberry gained nearly twice as much.

And Claude laid himself down to sleep, with the filial reflection, that his father would want all his opium for himself that night, and could afford but little for his son.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE UP-TRAIN.

ALL this while the up-train was going along without accident, and with few stoppages, though, perhaps, not at express speed: for there were third-class carriages attached, and they can afford only a moderate velocity.

Hugh is the shoeblack, and boy of all work at "The Swan."

The bit of rusty crape round his cap is getting very rusty, but nothing will induce him to put it off; so Ruth takes him by surprise one morning, and there is a new band for his grandfather and grandmother, which he wore, and then renewed, for a long time.

He said that it kept him right, poor boy, to look at the crape sometimes when he was at work; for it reminded him of Arland churchyard, and of the only grave, and the only coffin, he had ever seen at present.

Sluke, Hugh's master, was not a bad specimen of his order—we mean he was not a fair one, for he was above the average, very far, of your licensed victuallers. He had been a gentleman's butler, but, coveting independence, had set up for himself.

As it happened, Sluke had prospered tolerably well. But the marvel often occurs to us, how eager well-conditioned servants are to turn masters and mistresses, in the face of such a proportion of discouragements as they cannot help observing. If you walk along any of our third and fourth-rate streets in a large town, you pass, no doubt, a great deal of genuine love, comfort, and honest independence. But you pass a good deal beside. Many a young mother is there who, two years ago, had a respectable housemaid's place, with fourteen pounds a year—or at least eight, ten, or twelve—and who now "finds" herself, her husband, and two children, in board and lodging on sixteen or eighteen shillings a week.

Don't misunderstand us—money is not happiness; and we cannot blame any one for liking a home of his own. But we are persuaded, and nothing can alter the conviction, that a large amount of the world's poverty comes of imprudent, ill-provided marriages. In middle life, for the most part, a man waits for an income which he can call his own, and share without dishonour with his bride. In upper ranks the rules are stricter still. Why shouldn't our housemaids, and nursemaids, and cooks give it out, that they "don't mean to marry beneath them," that they expect to subsist, and that in reasonable comfort, as married women, even though there be no room in the cottage as large as the kitchen, and they may not help themselves quite so often as now, from the parlour sirloin of beef. The consequence of this would be that your operatives would work harder, and earn more; that they might get married sooner. And ye should soon have a different class of working men's houses and families; while we shrewdly suspect that workhouses, gaols, gin-palaces, and worse localities along with them, would soon begin to feel it if Mary Ann would look a little more ahead, and Thomas would strive to make a little more for her to live on before they went to church.

However, as it happened, Sluke had not done badly—that is to say, in his sense. He sold plenty of beer; and as, on the whole, it was purer than most in the neighbourhood, people came again, and he was getting on in his particular way.

He had raised Hugh's wages from half-a-crown to three and sixpence a week, when the boy had only been there six months. But that extra shilling required a very great deal of delicate management; for the probability is, that if Mrs. Sluke had known of it, Sluke's life would hardly have been worth half an hour's purchase.

This Mrs. Sluke was a terrible woman. Her appearance at the door of "The Swan" has been known to clear the street of Punch and Judy, an organ or two, and all costermongers, in a few seconds. Street boys don't run from very many people, but they all ran away from Mrs. Sluke.

This lady was of a lean, spare figure (we are ashamed of that word "spare," for she seemed to have spared even skin itself, and to have been a runaway from a tall cupboard in some doctor's museum). Then she had a bare-lip which revealed, not a side tooth, but a place where the tooth should have been. Her locks, which she called auburn, but which other people mistook for bright brick-dust, were not parted in the middle as is usual with her inferiors in strength of mind, but at the side, and very low down, too, so that they were intended to cross the forehead, like a man's, to assert the equality of the sexes, and the rights of woman.

Where Sluke had met with his lady-love, when he brought her home to "The Swan," no one ever could learn. But, strange to say, he never seemed, as we should have done, to have bitterly regretted it.

He used to say, that "Certainly Mrs. Sluke was a little quick, but then she was always very sorry for it." That last fast never came out to any one's satisfaction but poor Tim's own. She was generally quieter, after being more outrageous than usual. But that was owing rather to the weakness of flesh and blood, which failed to keep up, than to the strength of her self-control, or the depth of her repentance.

We beg pardon, but we fear that many passionate people are only "so sorry for it afterwards," to this extent.

Hugh Church had a sad business to live in the house with Jemima Sluke. We don't care to tell the poor fellow's experiences; especially as he never told them himself.

His aunt and Mrs. Wofield heard not one syllable of the tyings up he had in the yard, when his mistress, though in the pouring rain, perhaps, "dusted his jacket," as she quaintly phrased it, nor yet a syllable of the sort of dinners he used to get, and the kind of work she would set him to do.

He said to himself, as he wiped his eyes with his coat-cuff, many a time (not in her presence, mind ye! he never cried there, but when he was going home, thinking over the day's experiences); as he wiped his eyes, he would say to himself—

"She cuts at master; why shouldn't she cut at a poor boy like me? And he's got no aunt Ruth to tell, why should I say anything? Cheer up, Hugh!" he used to say; "remember three and sixpence a week is a help to them at home."

He never told a lie. And once, when she had struck him over the forehead, and cut it open, with a pewter pot, which she flung at him, when Ruth asked him about it, as she did in a moment, he said—

"Never mind it, aunt; I didn't deserve it. But I'd rather not tell any more than that. It would have been worse if I had been fighting, and got it so, wouldn't it?"

Ruth sighed, and said no more; but from that time he would bear anything rather than expose his face to his mistress's fury.

One hard frosty day, very shortly before Hugh left, Jemima Sluke was running after a lad who had with wonderful temerity dared to make a face at her through the glass door as she stood in the bar, when down she fell upon the ice, and struck the back of her head with such force on a scraper, that she was picked up insensible by Tim and Hugh together (for no one else stirred to help her), and carried away up stairs.

She had sustained a severe concussion of the brain; and it would be doing more than justice to poor human nature not to say that the whole street seemed and felt relieved from a heavy weight, and rejoiced—yes, rejoiced in a signal deliverance.

There was not one of the people about the house whom poor Timothy could tempt into waiting on the invalid; so he got in some stranger who had never made her acquaintance before her illness, and she and some one else did the work of nurse between them, while Tim minded the business. That "some one else" it was a bitter dose for Mrs. Sluke to see sitting at her bedside, and bathing her forehead with the doctor's spirit lotion as soon as her senses began to come back.

"Is that Hugh Church?" She always called him by his full name; that was another strange way of hers, like the parting the hair on one side.

"Yes, ma'am," said the boy.

"Where's your master?"

"Down stairs, ma'am."

"Then fetch him up. What do you do here? who sent you here?"

"I only just came in for a moment, ma'am, while the nurse went out. They thought the clothes shouldn't be let to dry."

"Well," said Jenima, but she had to swallow a good deal before she could say it, "thank you, thank you. But it's like your master, to leave me to the boy. Where have I been, Hugh Church? What's it all about? Oh, this head!"

"You've been very bad, misses. Please keep still and quiet. You're not out of danger yet; indeed, you're not."

And she lay still. But flushed up very much, when her eyes lighted on the boy.

Hugh rose to go, as she had bidden him.

But at the door, she called him back.

"Stop, Hugh Church; stop with me. Did I ever ask you whether you'd got any mother? Have ye?"

"No, ma'am."

"Is she dead?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Did you ever see her?"

"Never, ma'am. I believe she died in a good deal of trouble, about the time I was born."

"Then you never nursed any one who was sick?"

"Never."

"What made you come up to me, Hugh Church?"

"Because, ma'am, I thought they rather kept away."

"I never caused 'em to do anything else to me, Hugh Church; nor I never caused you neither."

And Mrs. Slike—yes, Mrs. Slike—turned her face into the pillow, away from Hugh, and fairly sobbed away into it.

She must have been very much reduced by leeches and blisters—she must have been very weak to do it.

Say, rather, her boy-nurse (as gentle as any girl) was very strong, and overcame her—overcame her, as you, dear reader, may overcome more than half this world's petty tyrannies, if you care to try.

A MOTHER'S MORNING PRAYER.

Up to me sweet childhood looketh,
Heart, and mind, and soul awake;
Teach me of Thy ways, O Father!
For sweet childhood's sake.

In their young hearts, soft and tender,
Guide my hand good seed to sow,
That its blossoming may praise thee
Wheresoe'er they go.

Give to me a cheerful spirit,
That my little flock may see
It is good and pleasant service
To be taught of Thee.

Father, order all my footsteps;
So direct my daily way,
That, in following me, the children
May not go astray.

Let Thy holy counsel lead me—
Let Thy light before me shine,
That they may not stumble over
Word or deed of mine.

Draw us hand in hand to Jesus,
For His Word's sake—unforgotten,
Let the little ones come to me,
And forbid them not."

THE TRADESMAN'S CRISIS.

"THE causes of success or failure!" no doubt they are legion. Any writer intending to treat such a subject in its fulness, must prepare for a considerable outlay in the simple raw materials of pens, ink, and paper. This, we need not say, is no part of our intention—the smallest supply of stationery will suffice us. We have, however, the means at hand of illustrating just one aspect of the question, by means of a simple story—perhaps a true one—of an only daughter.

It will be sufficient for the reader's purpose if, passing over the heroine's early history, we observe that, at the period that our narrative commences, Mary Norton, the soul and sunshine of her paternal home, was entertaining the very serious intention of leaving it.

"How her father and mother will ever bring their minds to part with her, I can't think!" was the somewhat concerned remark of a neighbour; and—(here our story must proceed in the words of the narrator)—"poor Mary herself felt that it would be a very, very hard thing to leave the dear little cottage, in which she had passed so many happy days, and, above all, to live no longer under the same roof with her parents. But then she loved Edward Norris very much, and she was sure he would be a good, kind husband; for he had always been so steady, and such a dutiful son and affectionate brother. And so hope chased the tear from Mary's eye, and the passing pang from her heart.

"It was the eve of her wedding-day, and she was sitting in the arbour, and talking with Edward about their future plans and prospects. They were quite alone, too; for Mrs. Norton was in the house busily making preparations for the next day, and Mr. Norton was out.

"Mary, dear," said Edward, "I'm so afraid you won't be able to reconcile yourself to living in a town, after being used all your life to this pretty, quiet cottage. C— is such a bustling place, too, a great deal more so than L—. It will seem such a change."

"Never fear, Edward," replied Mary; "I think I could make myself happy anywhere, with some one to love; and, besides, I shall find so much to do, that I shall have no time to waste upon discontented musings." And Mary's eyes looked so bright and hopeful, that Edward's misgiving passed away, and he thought if love could make her happy, it should not be wanting. He was rather disposed to be desponding, and cast down by difficulties; but, since his engagement with Mary, he had been often reassured by her calm, hopeful spirit, and cheered by her encouraging words.

"The next day they were married, and in a week were settled in their new home at C—. There Mary found (as she had said) plenty to employ her time and thoughts. Edward (who had served his apprenticeship to a bookseller and stationer) was now a shopman in the establishment, and was much esteemed by the principal of the concern for his uniform steadiness and attention to business. His house was near the shop, so that he always came home to his meals; and very comfortable meals they were, for Mary was an excellent housewife, and, though they had only a slender income, she was determined that what they had should be laid out to the best advantage, as far as she was concerned.

"Five years passed away, and Mary was the mother of three children, while death had deprived her of her parents. Edward had taken a small shop in a country town a few miles from C—, and had commenced business for himself. But he soon found that a young tradesman has many difficulties and struggles to surmount before he can be fairly established. Instead of the small but certain salary which he had hitherto punctually received, he found that there were considerable expenses to meet, in stocking and altering the shop, while, at the same time, the returns were scanty and uncertain. What could he do? He dreaded getting into debt, which he had hitherto scrupulously avoided. The only alternative seemed to be to retrench their expenses, and yet he hardly knew how to do that, since they already lived as prudently and economically as possible. Their present establishment consisted of himself and his wife, their three children (all very young), an experienced servant who had lived with them ever since their marriage, a young girl who acted as nurse, and a shop-boy. It seemed to Edward out of the question to part with any one of their three assistants, and yet there appeared no other way of saving. Mary had but recently recovered from her last confinement, and he was unwilling to distress her with the fears that perplexed his own mind.

"It was late one evening, when, after having closed his shop for the night, he entered their small sitting-room, with a weight on his heart, and a cloud on his brow, which he could not conceal from his wife's observant eye.

"You're not well to-night, Edward," she said, tenderly; "you look tired and worn-out."

"A little tired, perhaps; but I'm quite well," he answered, endeavouring (but ineffectually) to brighten up.

"Well, try and forget business and all its cares," said Mary, cheerfully. "I want to finish this little frock to-night; do come and read to me—I should so enjoy it."

"With a somewhat melancholy smile, Edward at once complied with his wife's request, and, taking a book from the shelf, began to read. But the words fell mechanically from his lips, while other and different thoughts kept crowding into his mind. He looked at the baby in the cradle by Mary's side, and he remembered the two other children who were asleep up stairs. Here was an increasing family, and, consequently, increasing expenses; while at the same time he appeared to be losing ground every day in his business.

"At last his wife suddenly put her hand on his arm, and said, 'Dear Edward! what is the matter?

I am sure something disturbs you—do tell me all! I can bear anything better than seeing you look so miserable, without knowing the reason!'

"Thus urged, Edward was at last obliged to reveal the cause of his abstraction.

"Mary attentively listened till he had concluded, and then, taking his hand, she said, affectionately, 'Poor, dear Edward! you have been brooding over your troubles in secret, till, I can venture to say, things appear a great deal worse than they really are. You are not in debt, you say, at present?'

"No; thank God!" replied Edward, earnestly. "But then, Mary, love, if we cannot manage to save in some way, we shall get into debt; that is, unless my business brings in more than it does now."

"Then let us begin to save at once!" said Mary, energetically.

"But in what way can we do so?" asked Edward. "We are not living extravagantly in any respect; I don't see, at present, in what way we can retrench."

"Oh! I've thought of several ways already," said Mary, smiling, and looking so hopeful and happy, that the mere sight of her bright, animated countenance raised her husband's spirits, and made him feel more sanguine than he had done for many days past.

"Then followed a long conversation, carried on in a low voice, interspersed occasionally with a sigh from Edward, followed by an encouraging word from his wife.

"The next morning Mary rose, full of her new plans for saving and economising. Her youngest child was only six weeks old, the next could just run alone, and the eldest was four years of age. They made plenty of work, as Mary knew very well; but she determined, in the present state of their affairs, to discharge the girl that had acted as nurse, and to manage with one servant. This was no sooner determined than acted upon, though Edward remonstrated against it in very strong terms, telling his wife that she was undertaking too much—that she would overtask herself, and be laid up. But Mary pleasantly combated all his fears by telling him that exercise always agreed with her, and that it would be no hardship to her to wait upon her own children.

"In a day or two Edward discovered that Tom, the shop-boy, was of very little use to him, that during a great part of the day he was idle, and, therefore, in mischief. He was accordingly installed in a similar situation, which Edward easily procured for him at a neighbouring grocer's, and thus two considerable items were at once subtracted from the weekly expenditure.

"Mary seemed at no loss to discover ways and means to lessen the general expenses, and bore her extra amount of work so cheerfully and uncomplainingly, that her husband loved her better than ever. When he was obliged (as occasionally he was) to leave the shop for a short time, Mary was always ready to take his place, and with pleasant manner and active hand to wait upon the customers. And during all this time the household affairs were carried on with as much care and regularity as ever. There was nothing like disorder or neglect, but all was in its place, and everything done at the right time.

"I can't think how you manage," said Edward one day, when he came into the neat sitting-room, and sat down to a comfortably dressed dinner, at a time when he knew Mary was in the midst of a large wash.

"Heaven helps those that help themselves," said Mary, kissing his cheek.

"In the course of a few months, from the effects of incessant care and attention, Edward's business began sensibly to increase; and in a year or two, from the struggling beginner, he found himself a well-established tradesman. And he felt and acknowledged that this prosperous turn in his affairs was mainly attributable to the influence and exertions of his wife, who, instead of lamenting her hard fate in being obliged to economise and exert herself in every possible way, had resolutely set to work, and, by her cheerful industry and careful management, had averted a melancholy crisis of failure and disgrace."

MANLINESS.—Learn from the earliest days to insure your principle against the peril of ridicule. You can no more exercise your reason if you live in the constant dread of laughter than you can enjoy your life if you are in the constant terror of death. If you think it right to differ from the times, and to make a point of morals, do it; however rustic, however antiquated, however pedantic it may appear, do it—not for insolence, but seriously and grandly, as a man who wore a soul of his own in his bosom, and did not wait till it was breathed into him by the breath of fashion.

THE TRAVELLING COBBLER.

THE TRAVELLING COBBLER.

We English people are somehow accustomed to associate respectability with the idea of a fixed dwelling-place; and to look rather with contempt upon such persons as are always on the move. We speak of them disrespectfully as tramps, vagabonds, and gipsies, though they may not have a drop of Romany blood in their veins; and in a general way treat them rather scurvily than otherwise. We are, perhaps, disposed to overvalue the importance of rent, rates, and taxes; and thus the position of the travelling pedlar or artisan is anything but an enviable one. He is, in fact, a very pariah among workmen, and as such he is treated. The worst "jobs," at the lowest remuneration, are reserved for him; and woe betide him, if, in utter disgust at the bad work and low wages, he should yield to the temptation of increasing his profits by anything approaching to speculation. He is immediately scouted. He is like the dog in the proverb. First we give him a bad name; and then we proceed without delay to hang him (metaphorically, of course).

They manage these things differently in France and Germany. In the former country we have troops of travelling artisans, and colporteurs, or pedlars; and throughout the greater portion of the German empire a recognised law of the various guilds provides that apprentices, after having served their time, should travel as journeymen through the land during three years, before they can be allowed to settle in any place, and produce some specimen or "master-piece," with a view to setting up as masters in workshops of their own.

In the rural districts of France the travelling shoemaker is an important member of the community; and his periodical visits are looked for with considerable interest by the inhabitants of the villages lying in his "beat." He is indeed a person in considerable request; and would be still more so but for a widespread and economical custom that prevails throughout France and Germany. This arrangement consists in a traveller's carrying his boots on the end of a walking-stick, and only donning them when he enters a town, and wishes to make an effective appearance. The big travelling boots are thus made to last an indefinite time, and not unfrequently descend, as a sort of heirloom, from father to son. But notwithstanding all drawbacks, there is plenty to do for the travelling cobbler. He establishes himself in some sheltered corner under a hedge, brings out a store of different kinds of leather from his basket, arranges his few tools, and is ready to attend to customers. These soon begin to arrive. A little girl, perhaps, brings her father's big boots, which require a few stitches before they can constitute the pride and glory of the fortunate proprietor at the approaching Ducasse, or fair. (N. B. They are worn outside the trowsers by the ostentatious, though some peasants eschew the practice, as displaying a boastful and vainglorious spirit.) Then comes an old dame with her Sunday clogs; and she is followed, in turn, by an anxious mother, wishing to contract for sabots, or wooden shoes, for a family of nine youngsters. Your thorough French travelling shoemaker is a bit of a Jack of all trades, be it noticed, and can work in wood as well as in leather.

At length the "understandings" of young and old have been patched up, mended, and renewed. Then the shoemaker packs up his stock-in-trade, lifts his hamper on his shoulder, and starts off in quest of fresh employment elsewhere.

The German "Handwerksbursch," or journeyman artisan, is a strange animal, whose natural history has yet to be written. We should describe him as decidedly omnivorous, for he eats everything, and to a certain extent predacious, so far as the orchards and vineyards are concerned among which his pleasant journey lies. He will sometimes remain for months in the same place, working for a master of whose kitchen he approves, or whose daughter has captivated him. Generally, however, he is of a roving disposition, and essentially gregarious; for if he meet nineteen of his brethren kicking up a row and quarrelling with the police, or singing patriotic songs about nothing particular, he will incontinently join them, on the principle that like attracts like. He is often rather a universal genius, and can do everything, more or less, when he chooses. But he has a decided propensity to do nothing. The occupation most congenial to his feelings seems to be riding in a wagon, with his legs swinging over the side. Of the three years he spends in travelling he usually passes about ten months at his work, and the remaining twenty-six in a vagabond kind of travel. During the whole time he lives from hand to mouth. Still, the three years are far from being thrown away. A man can scarcely travel over fifteen hundred or two thousand miles of territory without gaining something in the way of knowledge of the world, which will stand him in good stead in his future career. We have frequently met men on the German highroad who were very Scheherazades for the number of stories they could tell. One we saw who had penetrated as far as Semlin, in Turkey; and another had tramped to Constantinople itself. Almost every grievance may be turned to good in some way or other; and there is no doubt that the two greatest grievances of the Germans and Frenchmen—namely, compulsory military service and compulsory vagabondage—often prove of signal use to the handicraftsmen and peasants, opening the eyes of the former class to improvements in their callings, and rescuing the latter from the utter and hopeless boorishness into which they would fall but for their military drill and their experiences of travel.

At the same time, nothing can be more obvious than the evil of the cause which produces these effects. It is all very well to go on the tramp, if one pleases, but it is not pleasant to be forced on the tramp either by law or custom.

OCEAN DEPTHS.

The god of the tempest may send, from his cave,
Strong winds o'er the waters, till madly they rave,
Till the proud foaming billow is lashed into spray,
Or piled mountain high where the clouds float away;
And the swift gale may swell in its hurricane might,
And shiver to atoms the ship in its flight;
Yet, down in the depths of the emerald sea
Is stillness unbroken, unless it may be Mysterious murmurs from orient shells,
Whose cadences oftentimes the water nymph swells;
And in those strange caverns, most curiously wrought—
Where the pearl is imbedded, the coral-wreath caught—
Is hoarded lost treasure, most costly and bright;
And the diamond sheds its unquenchable light.

Down deep in the heart, many fathoms below
The surface of billows that come and that go,
Is a cave lit with more than the stalactite's glow;
Its floor is mosaic, most quaintly inlaid
With gems of deep feeling, which never may fade;
While the visions of fancy are wrought on its wall
In strange, startling figures, yet beautiful all.
It is thronged with the dead, with the absent for years.
They are instinct with life; they have smiles—they have tears;
There are whispers of friendship, and catches of song
While their soft blended voices are echoed along.
Kind memory her magical pictures has hung
All around; and the life to their tracery clung.
There stands the old homestead close by the hill-side,
With the elm-tree that sheltered it outstretching wide;
While the fresh mountain torrent, with murmuring song,
O'er a thousand smooth pebbles comes rushing along.

And bright flowers are strewn here, the very same flowers
We lovingly gathered in life's brightest hours;
But their beauty and fragrance can never depart—
How sweet the perfume down, down deep in the heart!
There's a throng of winged seraphs that haunt the strange places,
Now revealed is each figure, anon veiled is each face.
Sometimes through a misty wreath comes a clear gleam
From the star eyes of hope, like some exquisite dream;
And oftentimes we startle their presence to know,
Which inspire such wild and tumultuous flow.

Chemical Experiments.

SOME PECULIAR CASES OF COMBUSTION.

Copper burned in a Florence flask.—Combustion is usually treated of as involving a combustible and a supporter of combustion, but that mode of expression is quite inadequate to state the whole truth. Many cases can be adduced in which combustion takes place, and we cannot say one thing concerned is exclusively a combustible or exclusively a supporter of combustion. Take the following example: Procure at the shop of an operative chemist some thin copper turnings. Put them into a well-dried Florence flask, and pour in upon them a little powdered sulphur. That done, by shaking the flask, mingle all together. If sufficient heat be now applied to the Florence flask (heat of a spirit-lamp flame will suffice) a brilliant light will pervade the vessel, attended with much heat; the sulphur and the copper between them will produce combustion, though it is not possible to affirm with propriety that either one is the combustible or the supporter of combustion more than the other. In point of fact, all that we can with truth say, in the way of defining combustion generally, is to term it a rapid chemical union of certain bodies attended with the evolution of light and heat. The experiment first described had better be performed in the open air, or in a fire-place, so that in either case the fumes generated, which are disagreeable, may not contaminate an apartment.

The products of combustion may be either gaseous, liquid, or solid. The product of the combusive operation just indicated belongs to the latter category. Mark here a beautiful provision of the Great Creator. The products of all ordinary combustibles, such as charcoal, wood, oil, &c., are not solid and fixed, but volatile,—they fleet away, and do not encumber the earth. Just contemplate the position of mankind here if all the fires since the creation of the world had necessarily left solid results—cinders, we may say—bulkier and heavier than the materials burned. Under such conditions the world would have been converted, long ere this, into one vast cinder heap.

Combustion of iron by contact with sulphur.—As sulphur will aid the combustion of copper, so will it also aid the combustion of iron; but a stronger heat being requisite to insure success in the experiment, a Florence flask will no longer suffice as the means of accomplishing it. The best method of proceeding is as follows:—Heat a bar of iron to whiteness in a smith's forge (a common fire does not give out heat enough); then, removing the bar, bring it into contact with a roll of brimstone. Rapid combustion will at once ensue, determined by the combination of the sulphur and the iron together, forming the compound body termed sulphuret or sulphide of iron, and much employed by operative chemists.

A metal ignited in a candle flame and burned like paper, surrounded by common atmospheric air.—All metals are combustible. Even gold and platinum admit of being burned by adequate treatment; though the treatment is not such as an amateur of chemical experiments can command. A fine piece of iron, or rather steel—a small sewing needle, for example—may be consumed by holding it in the flame of a spirit lamp; but the metal which burns most readily under ordinary circumstances is zinc, in the condition of thin shavings, which may be procured of almost any zinc-worker. If a handful of these shavings be taken and held in the flame of a candle, or of a spirit-lamp, for an instant, they ignite quite as readily as paper similarly treated would have done, commencing with a bright white light, and yielding a solid white flocculent result, which is blown about the apartment in a very remarkable manner. Ancient chemists denominated the flocculent white shreds in question lana philosophica—philosophical wool.

Instance of tranquil combustion by contact.—Remove a piece of phosphorus, about the size of a pea, from the water, in which phosphorus is always kept, dry it for an instant by contact with blotting paper, and lay it on a plate, or stone, or earthenware slab. Taking now a fragment of iodine about equal in dimensions to the phosphorus, lay it also upon the slab, and bring both into contact. No sooner is this effected than combustion ensues.

To hold a slip of paper in the flame of a candle or spirit-lamp without burning the paper.—This very simple and very instructive experiment is performed as follows:—Take an iron bar, a fire-poker answers well, wrap the slip of paper tightly round it once, and thrust paper, bar and all, into the flame. The paper under these circumstances will not burn, because the iron underneath conveys away the heat so rapidly that the paper is retained below the degree of temperature necessary to bring about combustion. On the application of this very principle depends the safety-lamp of Sir Humphry Davy. It consists of an ordinary lamp-wick, surrounded by a cage of wire gauze. The fire-damp, or explosive gas, can readily enter the lamp through the meshes of the gauze, and ignite; but the flame cannot readily pass out through the same gauze meshes because of the cooling agency of the metal of which they are formed. A certain elevation of temperature is necessary to the existence of flame, and the metal of the wire gauze meshes absorbs heat too rapidly to permit the maintenance of that temperature. The safety-lamp is absolutely safe if the atmosphere around it be tranquil. It is not, however, absolutely safe when exposed to currents of air.

Adverting to the experiment just described, of folding a slip of paper around a metallic bar and thrusting it into the flame of a spirit-lamp without burning, the experiment may be now varied by substituting a wooden for a metallic bar. In this case the paper burns readily enough, simply because wood not being a good conductor of heat, the paper acquires sufficient elevation of temperature to establish combustion.

THE CANOE FIGHT.

THE following incident of wild life in America will be read with interest. It has all the excitement of romance about it. A party of adventurers having fallen on the shores of a body of Indians, determined to partake of the provisions they had found. In the field on the bank of the river, they kindled a fire for the purpose of cooking these, and were about, in the language of Dale, the leader of the party "to make use of the briled bones and hot ash-cake," when they were startled by the discharge of several rifles, and the sudden war-whoops of some twenty-five or thirty Indians, who came rushing towards them from three sides of the field. Dale's party immediately seized their rifles, and being too few to oppose the force of the enemy, dashed down the second or upper bank of the river, and took post among the trees, whence they kept in check the approach of the savages.

By this time the canoes had conveyed all but twelve of the entire force to the opposite side of the river, and one canoe alone had returned for the residue. This was the first thought of the little party, who were now hemmed in by the Indians. But simultaneously with the attack by land, a large canoe, containing eleven warriors, had issued from a bend in the river above, and descended rapidly, with the evident design of intercepting communication with the opposite shore. They now attempted to approach the shore and join in the attack, but were kept at a distance by the well-directed fire of a few of Dale's men. Two of their number, however, leaped into the river, and swam, with their rifles above their heads, for the bank, just above the mouth of a little creek, near the northern corner of the field. One of these, as he approached the shore, was shot by Smith; but Austill, in attempting to intercept the other, was thrown by the underwood and rolled into the water within a few feet of his antagonist. The Indian reached the shore and ran up the bank. Austill, in pursuing him through the cane, was fired at, in mistake for an Indian, by Creagh, and narrowly escaped.

During this by-scene, Dale and the other eight of his valiant companions were interchanging hot fires with the enemy. Those in the canoe sheltered themselves by lying in its bottom and firing over the sides. The party on shore were deterred from pressing closely by an ignorance of the number of Dale's forces. This cause alone saved them from certain destruction. But the circumstances were now growing more critical. Soon the Indians must discover the weakness of their opponents, and rush forward with irresistible superiority. A more perilous position can scarcely be imagined, and yet there was one in this contest.

Dale, seeing the superiority of the enemy, called out to his comrades on the opposite shore for assistance. They had remained, thus far, inefficient, but excited spectators of the scene. But now eight of their number leaped into their canoe, and bore out towards the enemy. Upon approaching near enough, however, to discover the number of the Indians, the man in the bow, becoming alarmed at the superiority of the foe, ordered the paddles to "back water," and they returned to land! Dale, indignant at this cowardice, demanded of his men, who would join him in an attack upon the Indian canoe? Austill and Smith immediately volunteered; and with a negro, as steersman, named Caesar, the little party embarked for the dreadful encounter. As they approached, one of the Indians fired without effect. When within thirty feet, Smith fired, and probably wounded an Indian, whose shoulder was visible above the canoe.

Dale and Austill attempted to fire, but their priming having been wet, their guns could not be discharged. Fortunately the Indians had exhausted their powder. The white party now bore down, in silence, upon the foe. As the boats came in contact at the bows, the Indians all leaped to their feet. Austill was in front, and bore for a moment the brunt of the battle. But, by the order of Dale, the negro swayed round the canoe, and "Big Sam" leaped into the enemy's boat, giving more room to Smith and Austill, and pressing together the Indians, who were already too crowded. The negro occupied his time in holding the canoes together. The rifles of both parties were now used as clubs; and dreadful were the blows both given and taken; for three stouter or more gallant men than these assailants never took part in a crowded mêlée. The details of the struggle can scarcely be given. Dale's second blow broke the barrel of his gun, which he then exchanged for Smith's, and so fought till the end of the scene. Austill was, at one time, prostrated by a blow from a war-club, and fell into the Indian canoe, between two of the enemy, and was about being slain by his assailant, when the latter was fortunately put to death by Smith. Austill rose, grappling with an Indian, wrested his war-club from him, struck him over the skull, and he fell dead in the river. The last surviving Indian had been, before the war, a particular friend of Dale's. They had hunted together long and familiarly, and were alike distinguished for their excellence in those vigorous sports, so much prized by the man of the woods. The young Muscogee was regarded as one of the most chivalrous warriors of his tribe. Dale would always say, when, long subsequently, he narrated these circumstances, and he never did so without weeping, that he "loved that Indian like a brother, and wanted to save him from the fate of the others." But the eye of the young warrior was filled with fire; he leaped before his opponent with a proud fury; cried out in Muscogee, "Sam Thlucco, you're a man, and I'm another! Now for it!" and grappled in deadly conflict. The white man proved the victor. With one blow of his rifle he crushed the skull of the Indian. The young hero, still holding his gun firmly in his hands, fell backwards into the water, and the canoe fight was over.

FOR MOTHER'S SAKE.

A FATHER and his little son
On wintry waves were sailing;
Fast, from their way, the light of day
In cloud and gloom was fading,
And fiercely round their lonely bark
The stormy winds were wailing.

They knew that peril hover'd near;
They pray'd, "O Heaven, deliver!"
But a wilder blast came howling past,
And soon, with sob and shiver,
They struggled in the icy grasp
Of that dark, rushing river.

"Cling fast to me, my darling child,"
An anguished voice was crying;
While, silvery clear, o'er tempest drear,
Rose softer tones replying,
"O! mind not me, my father dear;
I'm not afraid of dying;
O! mind not me, but save yourself,
For mother's sake, dear father;
Leave me and hasten to the shore,
Or who will comfort mother?"

The angel forms that ever wait,
Unseen, on men attendant,
Flew up, o'erjoy'd, to heaven's bright gate,
And there on page-resplendent,
High o'er those of heroes bold,
And martyrs famed in story,
They wrote the name of that brave boy,
And wreathed it round with glory.

God bless the child! ay, he did bless
That noble self-denial,
And safely bore him to the shore,
Through tempest, toil, and trial.
Soon in their bright and tranquil home,
Son, sire, and that dear mother
For whose sweet sake so much was done,
In rapture met each other.

LET fathers and mothers ponder over the following: "Indeed, where the life of the home is neglected there is no true manliness. Fathers! whose sons are growing up miserable shoots of dissipation, what nourishment have their best faculties received at home? Mothers! whose daughters are happy only in the whirl of vanity and extravagance, what has been their example? Members of fashionable society! there is not only excess, but inexpressible evil, in any method of amusement that breaks up domestic quietude, and leaves no time for domestic responsibility, and no delight in domestic pleasures."

Inventions and Science.

PRESERVING VEGETABLE SUBSTANCES.—The following methods for this purpose have recently been introduced:—In preserving potatoes they are first washed and peeled, as for ordinary use. They are then placed in a solution of salt and water, for thirty minutes or thereabouts, having been previously pierced all over. They are now placed in a vessel containing a solution of pearl barley, and left to simmer for about twenty minutes, after which they are taken out and left to cool. They are now broken or granulated into small particles, and placed on trays in a drying stove, at a temperature of about 110 deg. Fah., and when quite dry are packed in tins or casks for keeping. Carrots, cabbages, onions, turnips, cauliflowers, beans, peas, &c., are preserved by placing them in a solution of carbonate of soda and gum arabic, in the proportion of about one ounce of the former to two ounces of the latter, in every gallon of water, while in a boiling state, and allowing them to remain for about five minutes. Previous to this they are cut in slices, and placed in a bag, and then dried in a similar manner to the potatoes, and packed ready for use.

TO FASTEN LEATHER TO METAL.—The following is exceedingly useful:—Soak the leather in a hot solution of nutgalls, and apply it to the metal upon which it is to be fastened, having first given the metal a coat of glue. When dry, the leather will adhere so tight that it sooner tears than separates from the metal.

THE RATE AT WHICH THOUGHT TRAVELS.—If a cylinder divided into 360 degrees be caused to rotate 1,000 times in a second, it is evident that the passage of one of those degrees before a given point is equal to the 1-360,000th part of a second; this may be divided by a microscope so that a period of time equalling the ten-millionth, or even the one hundred-millionth part of a second may be measured. By this arrangement it is possible to measure the rate of nervous impulse. M. Helmholtz, a Swiss gentleman, has made some experiments with the utmost care, and has arrived at the following results. Sensations are transmitted to the brain at a rapidity of about 180 feet per second, or at one-fifth the rate of sound; and this is nearly the same in all individuals. The brain requires one-tenth of a second to transmit its orders to the nerves which preside over voluntary motion; but this amount varies much in different individuals, and in the same individual at different times, according to the disposition or condition at the time, and is more regular the more sustained the attention. The time required to transmit an order to the muscles by the motor nerves is nearly the same as that required by the nerves of sensation to pass a sensation; moreover, it passes nearly one-hundredth of a second before the muscles are put in motion. The whole operation requires 1½ to 2-tenths of a second. Consequently, when we speak of an active, ardent mind, or of one that is slow, dull, or apathetic, it is not a mere figure of rhetoric, but an absolute and certain fact that such a distinction, with varying gradations, really exists.

Small Change.

AN OLD WRITER'S ADVICE ABOUT PRESENTS.—When thou makest presents, let them be of such things as will last long; to the end they may be in some sort immortal, and may frequently refresh the memory of the receiver.

A PIECE OF ADVICE.—How to prevent the flies from getting at your bacon in summer. Eat it all in the early spring.

MAXIM OF CONFUCIUS.—A wise man does not speak of all his doings, but he does nothing of which he dare not speak.

THE WIFE'S CHANCE.—Late one night, the most miserable of all human beings, a drunken husband, after spending his whole evening at a public-house, set out for home. "Well," said he to himself, "if I find my wife up, I'll scold her: what business has she to sit up, wasting fire and light, eh? And if I find her in bed, I'll scold her; what right has she to go to bed before I get home?"

THE MENAGERIE.—"Mr. Showman, what's that?" "That, my dear, is the Rhynocery. He is cousin German or Dutch relation to the Unicorn. He was born in the desert of Sary Ann, and fed on bamboo and missionaries. He is very courageous, and never leaves home unless he moves, in which case he goes somewhere else, unless he is overtaken by the dark. He was brought to this country much against his will, which accounts for his low spirits when he's melancholy or rejected. He is now somewhat aged, but he has seen the day when he was the youngest specimen of animated nature in the world. Pass on, my little dear, and allow the ladies to surway the wonders of creation as displayed in the ring-tailed monkey, a hanimal that can stand hanging like a fellow-critter, only it's reversed."

CURIOUS ALLITERATIVE ACROSTIC.

She sings so soft, so sweet, so soothing still;
That to the tone ten thousand thoughts there thrill;
Elysian ecstasies enchant each ear—
Pleasure's pure pinions poise prince, peasant, peer,
Hushing high hymns, Heaven hears her harmony—
Earth's envy ends, enthralled each ear, each eye;
Numbers need nine-fold nerve, nor nearly name
Soul-stirring Stephen's skill; sure seraphs sing the same.

DECIDEDLY WORTH REMEMBERING.—A carpenter of our acquaintance says that cheerfulness is the best paying commodity that can be brought into a shop. In his opinion a man who whistles will do as much work in an hour as a grumbler will do in a day.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN CHEERFULNESS AND MIRTH.—Mirth is like a flash of lightning, that breaks through a gleam of clouds, and glitters for a moment; cheerfulness keeps a kind of daylight in the mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual serenity.

WORTH REMEMBERING, ON THE HUSTINGS AND ELSEWHERE.—The strongest nation is that which counts the most robust men, interested in the defence of the nation, animated with its spirit, and possessing the feeling of its destiny. The most civilised nation is that which counts the most intelligent men, interested in the preservation and development of public morality. The freest nation is that which counts the most citizens living independently by their work.

A CHEMICAL DEFINITION.—While a lecturer was describing the nature of gas, a blue-stocking lady inquired of a gentleman near her, what was the difference between oxygen and hydrogen? "Very little, madam," said he; "by oxygen we mean pure gin; and by hydrogen, gin and water."

SPANISH POLITENESS.—Spanish robbers are very polite. An Englishman was once accosted on a lonely road by a ruffian. "Sir," said he, "you have my coat on; may I trouble you for it?" The Englishman drew out a pistol and told the fellow he was mistaken. "Sir," said the robber, "I perceive that I am. Will do you me the honour to communicate your name, that I may remember you in my prayers?"

TRIALS ARE MORAL BALLAST, that often prevents our capsizing. When we have much to carry, Heaven rarely fails to fit the back to the burden; where we have nothing to bear, we can seldom bear ourselves. The burdened vessel may be slow in reaching the destined port, but the vessel without ballast is in imminent danger of not reaching it at all.

MAGNIFYING ENJOYMENTS.—Southey says, in one of his letters:—"I have told you of the Spaniard who always put on his spectacles when about to eat cherries, that they might look bigger and more tempting. In like manner I make the most of my enjoyments; and though I do not cast my eyes away, I pack them in as little compass as I can for myself, and never let them annoy others."

A HERO.—The Duke of Wellington, after the battle of Waterloo, joined in the pursuit, and followed the enemy for some miles. Colonel Hervey, who was with him, advised him to desist, as the country was growing less open, and he might be fired at by some stragglers from behind the hedges. "Let them fire away—the battle is won, and my life is of no value now!"

CLEAR AND CONCLUSIVE COMPARISON.—In a case of assault and battery, where a stone had been thrown by the defendant, the following evidence was drawn out of a Yorkshireman:—"Did you see the defendant throw the stone?"—"I saw a stone, and I've pretty sure the defendant throwed it."—"Was it a large stone?"—"I should say it wur a largeish stone."—"What was its size?"—"I should say a sizeable stone."—"Can't you compare it to some other object?"—"Why, if I wur to compare it, I should say it wur as large as a lump of chalk!"

WHAT SAYS SHAKESPEARE OF FAME?—He tells us that "if a man do not erect in this age his own tomb ere he dies, he shall live no longer in monument than the bell rings, and the widow weeps."

NEVER HARBOUR PREJUDICES.—They are like harmful weeds; the slightest effort suffices to eradicate them, if they be at once attended to; on the contrary, they grow with time, become inveterate, extend far and near, and their numerous ramifications seize upon everything that comes within their reach.

In a literary circle, some one asked if a certain author, who had wantonly injured his literary reputation, was married. "He is only wedded to his fame," was the answer. "Then he makes a bad husband."

White to move, and checkmate in five moves.

Problem No. 11. By E. D. C. (of Islington).
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Solution of Problem No. 7.

WHITE. BLACK.
1. Kt from Q R 5 to Kt 7. Black's moves are forced.
2. B to Q 2.
3. B to K 3.
4. B mates

DOUGLAS.—As the Kings cannot check each other, it is quite obvious that they cannot occupy adjacent squares.

T. A.—The object of the Black Pawn on Q B 2 in Problem No. 4, is to discover check if necessary. It is quite apparent that if the Pawn were White, Black would win.

T. A.—The King cannot be released from the check of the Kt by the interposition of a piece. The King must either move out of check or the Kt must be captured.

G. G.—Your letter does not indicate the precise point upon which you require information. As the position now stands, Black could win in about eight moves.

T. Root.—We will analyse the openings to which you refer, and let you know the result at the earliest opportunity.

R. T.—You fail to observe that Black can take Kt with K if White for his second move play R to Q sq. after having checked with the Bishop.

A. J.—Under the present laws of Chess the question submitted by you remains in doubt. We have generally treated the move as compulsory.

W. M'K. F. G. R., J. D., D. A. D., Jan., M. L., Wm. M., W. S. S., R. B. W., C. W., W. A., Lile Diel, and S. A.—Communications have been forwarded to you through the post.

* Thos. A., who commenced the study of Chess with the appearance of the Lessons in the FAMILY PAPER, will be happy to play a game with any player who may have attained his knowledge of chess through the same source.

† DOUGLAS will be happy to play a game of chess with any adversary of fair strength. Douglas suggests the Evans' Gambit Game, and to save time will concede the first move to his adversary.

Our Editorial Table.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—John Cassell begs to return his grateful acknowledgments to the numerous subscribers and friends who have honoured him with congratulatory letters on the change and improvement in the size and substance of his ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER. The management of a periodical which has so wide a circulation involves an amount of responsibility of which he feels the weight, and it has constantly been, and ever will be, his earnest endeavour to make the influence he exerts conducive, in every page, to the good of his fellow-creatures. In challenging, in this respect, a comparison with all the cheap periodicals of the time, he confidently asks whether, by any of his contemporaries, the mission to instruct as well as amuse has been so faithfully and successfully fulfilled? If, then, his aim in every page is to elevate and improve, he may surely ask whether the readers as well as the conductors of such a periodical do not incur some degree of responsibility? Is it not the duty of every existing subscriber to diffuse among his neighbours, relations, and fellow-workmen, the advantages which he himself acknowledges to have derived from the perusal of the ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, by inducing them each and all to become, in their turn, subscribers?

GAMMA.—Plenty of exercise, which will cause the blood to circulate freely through the whole system, local friction, with liberal and frequent use of cold water to the entire limb, are the best remedies we know for the annoyances of which you complain.

LEVIATHAN.—"M. or N. So-and-so, from his dutiful and affectionate son," would, we think, be as proper an inscription as you could fix upon. We know of nothing that will remove mildew from gloves.

OPTIMISM.—We do not by any means advise patience, as you seem to expect; on the contrary, we recommend you to go at once to the lady, inform her of the state of your affections, and ask (as at your age you doubtless know how to do) whether she can reciprocate the feelings she has excited.

JULIA NORMAN should be patient; her letter was answered a week or two since.

WAT TYLER had better, we think, make his sentiments known to the lady in prose. His poetry scarcely comes up to the mark; and to call up a smile instead of a blush upon the countenance of the adored one might be dangerous.

VICTORIA.—If the gentleman wishes for an introduction, he can easily find the means of procuring it, and he will respect and value you all the more for the retiring modesty you show in the matter. In the meantime, we recommend you to cultivate a quiet, decorous manner and carriage, which, far more than smiles or levity, will win what you desire.

MARTHA CHASOM.—The salaries of clerks in lawyers' offices in London vary from ten shillings a week to three, four, and even five hundred pounds a year, according to age, talents, and experience. The usual rates, however, range from between fifty to a hundred and fifty guineas a year.

A. E.—Whatever you think. If it has given you pleasure to make the chain, say so; if it has bored you, be wiser for the future than to undertake what you grudge the trouble of doing.

ETHELRED.—The Domesday Book, to which reference is so continually made in history, legal proceedings, &c., is a very ancient record, made in the time of William the Conqueror. It consists of two volumes, one large, the other small, and is now kept in the Exchequer. The contents are a survey of all the lands in England, except Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Durham, and part of Lancashire, which it is said were never surveyed. It was begun in 1081, by five justices of the peace chosen from each county, and finished in 1086. The question whether lands are ancient demesne or not, is decided by this work, from which there is no appeal.

HERALDUS.—Coats of arms were introduced about the time of Richard I., who brought them from the Crusades in the Holy Land, where they were first invented, and painted on the shields of the various knights of Christendom, who, without some such distinctive mark, could not, when cased in complete armour, have been distinguished from each other. They were the criterion of dignity and descent, and in 1798, when the subject of armorial bearings was brought before parliament, it was ascertained that in England there were 9,458 families entitled to bear arms, and in Scotland 4,000. These families, in the language of heraldry, are noble, either by creation as peers, or as gentry who have acquired their armorial bearings from time immemorial.

YORKSHIRE.—The word "hansel," so commonly used by pedlars, hawkers, and travelling merchants of all sorts, is, we think, a corruption of the old term "Handsale." Anciently, among all northern nations, shaking of hands was considered necessary to bind a bargain, which was then called "Handsale."

CYMO inquires "how a person is to know if his passions (he means love) are returned by the young lady?" By asking her, we suppose. At least that is our way of arriving at any information we wish to gain.

PENELOPE PUMPKIN.—When an evil is not to be remedied, the only course is to bear, and make the best of it. A little pleasant society would doubtless be both healthful and agreeable after the fatigue of the day, but if you can't have it, why you must even try to be content without it, and endeavour to find a substitute. Suppose you begin by cultivating the acquaintance and friendship of the elderly ladies you speak of. If they are good, discreet, and Christian women, they will do you moral good, even if their conversation does not satisfy your mental cravings. You say you possess firmness to a fault; a sentence which, being interpreted, means, that you are obstinate. Cure this; a woman can scarcely have a more disagreeable failing. As you are fond of teaching, we think you could not have done better than apprentice yourself to the profession. Judging from the bright faces of two young pupil teachers who pass our windows four times every day, we should think the life you have chosen a very happy—we are sure it is a very honourable—one, and trust you will not make it otherwise by repining at the little drawbacks to which your position, in common with all others upon earth, is subject. "Cassell's Illustrated History of England," or "Educational Course," will, we think, supply the want you feel. It is clear, concise, and cheap.

W. B. O.—Get some mutual friend to introduce you.

CUDDIE BLAKE.—It is impossible for us to give you forms of congratulatory letters to newly married friends. Consult your own sense and good taste. Avoid fine writing and extravagant language, and you can't go wrong.

A CONSTANT READER.—The word signifies higher.

CRINOLINE asks a question of so urgent and important a nature that, being ourselves unhappily ignorant of how to answer it, and unable to gain any satisfactory information upon the subject from the lady friends to whom we have submitted it, we publish it entire, hoping that if any of our fair readers know of a cure for the wilfulness of whalebone, they will kindly inform us. "How whalebone in petticoats can be made to keep its form, and prevented from standing out on one side and going in on the other?"

ZOE ST. CLAIR has, after the fashion of children who amuse themselves with playing at kings and queens, been playing at lovers, and expects us, as seniors, to give our opinion upon the matter, as if the game were reality. She must have a strange idea of the amount of our occupation and extent of our credulity.

A YOUNG TRADESMAN.—We advise you to call upon the person for whom you are security to indemnify you: as you are, and must remain, liable upon the note, if the holder thinks proper to call upon you.

M. D. R.—The landlord may distrain for rent upon goods in the office, as that forms part of the premises demised.

STANDARD OF FREEDOM (Taunton) best knows himself if he invades another man's patent. He may use an invention of his own in any way he pleases. A master may proceed against an apprentice for wilful injury, but not for that which was simply accidental.

CARADOC.—We consider that you would be entitled to claim six months' notice.

S. D. C. S. D.—If you paid for the work to be done, and the agreement became mutual by the party engaging to do it for you, he is subject to an action either in a superior or county court, in case of loss or damage to you accruing from his negligence.

GEOLOGY.—The substance you mean must be ASBESTOS. It is a white, silvery-looking mineral of long silky filaments, which, as its Greek name signifies, is incombustible. It is found in mountainous countries abroad, as well as in Scotland and Anglesea. The ancients used it extensively, although the cloth made from it was of immense cost. Pliny tells us that, notwithstanding the price, he has seen tablecloths, napkins, and even towels made from asbestos; but such extravagance was not general, the greatest demand for this valuable material being for cloths in which to burn the dead, whose sacred ashes could then be collected without the mixture of any foreign substance. The means used to clean this cloth are as singular as its properties:—When it becomes greasy or soiled from use, it is thrown into a clear, bright fire, which burns out the stains, but leaves the material of a pure, dazzling whiteness.

PUSSY.—We are sorry we cannot sympathise with your griefs. Cats are certainly very useful, but to us most unpleasant animals, nor can we enter into the feeling which causes "ladies of a certain age," for whom otherwise we entertain the profoundest respect, to cherish and pet these domestic tigers. We are free to confess, however, that we believe our antipathy is far from being well grounded. Cats are not generally disliked; nay, the Egyptians used to consider them as sacred; and Herodotus, the Greek historian, tells us that whenever a cat died a natural death, the inhabitants of the house where the calamity occurred shaved off their eyebrows in token of sorrow, and then embalmed and nobly interred the lamented animal. In later times their value has also been appreciated at a much higher rate than we should be disposed to give: for Southey, in his "History of the Brazils," says that the first pair of pussies taken to Cuyuba sold for a pound weight of gold. Oh, that we knew of such another mart, and had the unlimited power to effect the clearance of every easy-chair, hearth-rug, and lady's lap within the bills of mortality!

CLERK.—Your friend is right, and you are consequently wrong. His Grace the Archbishop of York is formally styled Primate of England, and his Grace of Canterbury Primate of all England. The distinction arose in the reign of Henry II., in consequence of a fierce dispute between the prelates as to precedence. The quarrel took place at a synod held in Westminster, at which the pope's legate was present. The next day the Archbishop of York appealed to the pope, who settled the matter by giving precedence to the See of Canterbury.

ANGLER.—You are in error. The only royal fish in England are the whale and sturgeon, which, when caught near, or thrown on the coast, belong in certain proportions to the king and queen. Of sturgeon the king claims the whole; but of the whale his majesty only has a right to the head, his better half claiming the tail. Ancient records give as a reason for this curious division, the necessity of supplying the queen's wardrobe with whalebone; but as that article lies in the head and not the tail, we think some other cause should be assigned.

NELLY X.—We have read your letter with the warmest sympathy and approbation, and are heartily glad to be able to remove your doubts on the subject. Such of the goods specified as belong to your mother, she ought to bequeath by will to you; those which are already yours will remain so after her death. You need not fear anything; your brother may threaten to do, but if at your mother's death he attempts any annoyance, you have the means of redress.

GREENHORN.—Your letter is much in character with the name you have taken; we can't tell what you mean.

B. D.—Prussia, as an independent kingdom, dates only from the commencement of the last century. Its importance as a military power is due to the exertions of Frederick William I., a cross-grained, ill-conditioned despot, and of his son Frederick II., better known among the Germans as "Old Fritz," and among the English as Frederick the Great. During the seven years' war, from 1756 to 1763, the first great successes of the new monarchy were gained. But they were dearly purchased: the country at the conclusion of the struggle was almost depopulated.

SQUIRE BUNDELL must study commercial arithmetic, improve his handwriting, and refrain from palpable and transparent corrections of bad spelling in his letters. Then he may try for his situation in the customs, and we hope he may become a director of the Board of Inland Revenue some fine day.

DARIEN.—Penal servitude has been introduced as a substitute for transportation for short terms. The colonists in Australia very properly refused to receive the monthly cargoes of swindlers, housebreakers, and ruffians of various descriptions; therefore they are allowed "to grace the mother country, under certain insignificant restrictions." Prisoners sentenced to penal servitude are employed in the usual convict labour about the dockyards and elsewhere.

MILES.—The letters I.H.S. embroidered on altar cloths, illuminated on church windows, and frequently affixed to figures of our Lord, mean "Jesus Hominum Salvator"—Jesus the Saviour of men. They have been in use since the twelfth century.

ZERLINA.—We should advise you in the first instance to procure an introduction to some well known and respected member of the musical profession in London, who would give you an unbiased opinion on the quality of your voice, and your consequent chance of success. Then, if the opinion be favourable, you will soon have an opportunity of appearing before the public at a concert. We should not advise you to attempt to appear as an opera singer, until you are quite sure of your nerve, as well as of your talent.

QUILL.—A short note may be written in the third person, and would begin—"Mr. — presents his compliments to Mr. —," &c. Of course such a note as this must not be signed. This was the mistake made by our correspondent, to which we referred in the answer you quote.

ACHILLES.—In studying any subject without the assistance of a master, be very careful to proceed gradually, and not to go to a new thing till you have thoroughly understood the last.

CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.—Our article, "How to cut and contrive Children's Clothing," was taken from a publication bearing the same title, published by Darton and Co., Holborn Hill, the price of which is 6d.; and in connection with which are other books on the proper management of children, &c.

PETIT JACQUES must be a very ambitious personage to wish to be his own harmonium manufacturer. We cannot undertake to teach him the art and mystery of making one of these instruments, but we wish his endeavours may be crowned with success.

D. J. B.—We cannot conceive any circumstances under which a Bible would not be a most suitable and acceptable gift to a Christian.

J. S. A. writes to ask us if the buyer or the seller of an article should say "Thank you." We think both might go through such a common form of politeness. The seller should thank the buyer for his custom, and the buyer should acknowledge the pains taken to please him. A little courtesy makes things go so much more pleasantly.

JAMES CROWTHER.—Fall-mail is pronounced Pell-mell. It takes its name from the game of mail, a popular pastime in former days. It was played with a ball and a long bat, and had some features in common with the modern game of cricket.

ONE IN PERPLEXITY.—We frequently feel inclined to remind many of our correspondents of the fact that "half a loaf is better than no bread," and "One in Perplexity" seems to be in a dilemma from having forgotten that useful axiom. A situation should not be given up until a better one has been obtained; for when a man has once thrown himself out of employment, he frequently finds it a matter of difficulty to get into a fresh "groove." We can only recommend our correspondent to canvass among his friends, and to answer every advertisement which appears at all tempting. To all who read these columns, we should say, "Whatever your present employments may be, do not give them up until you have secured something better."

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—We must have fuller particulars before we can answer the question.

AN ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—You must choose your library according to your own taste, but do not read any books which merely amuse without instructing, for it is like eating food which contains no nourishing principle.

INDIAN.—The storming of Seringapatam, at which Tippeo Saib was killed, took place in 1799, during the time of the dictatorship of Lord Cornwallis. Rohilcund is in the north of India, on the southern declivity of the Himalaya range.

A. CONSTANT READER.—Your handwriting is very bold, very plain, very black, and very well adapted for directing large parcels, but not for a merchant's or a lawyer's office.

G. W. A.—No, not without considerable improvement. HANDWRITING.—DURHAMITE wants freedom, letters well-formed and regular. J. B. F.—Very careless, almost slovenly. S. O. labours under the same want as Durhamite, that of ease and freedom. A. B. C.—Thick and clumsy, but arising chiefly, we suspect, from over haste. BOURNEMOUTH.—Not good enough for a lawyer's office, very irregular. RICHARD MARKHAM.—Bad, but of course improvable. Do not spell oblige with a d, nor Richard with a t, nor penmanship with two ns. HERB MAISTRAID.—Good: your other question has been answered before. A YOUTH.—The letter is well written. X. Z. A.—With care, your handwriting would pass muster; but it should be improved for a merchant's office. A LAD OF THIRTEEN.—Good. A. CONSTANT READER.—Tolerably good, but careless. ARREBOATH.—Very good.

J. N.—Advisee "To parish clerks," stating the name of the person whose baptismal register you want, and offering a reward.

MILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

Author of "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XV.

Harsh words are like seed at random cast:
Nine fall, and wither where they fall; the tenth
May strike deep root, and when it does, the plant
Bears nought but bitterness. Men should take heed,
Nor lightly scatter them.—OLD PLAY.

Some minds arrive at a conclusion by the slow and tedious process of deduction; others jump at it. The suit is much the same in either case; for instinct, especially where the inferior passions are concerned, is so marvellous a resemblance to reason, that it could puzzle a philosopher to decide where the former ends and the latter commences.

Now Jack Manders, being called upon for the first time in his life to form a conclusion, very naturally preferred the shortest and the easiest way—in fact, he had never heard of any other; and the result was, the perfect conviction in his own mind, that uncle Mike, Andrew was quite as great a rascal as uncle Mike, perhaps greater. The balance of opinion rather inclined to the side that he was so, and most of our readers, we doubt not, will agree with him.

Had any one told the poor friendless boy that his well-dressed, respectable-looking relative had committed murder, he would have believed it, without proof, and condemned him, as Judge Jefferies did the unfortunate adherents of Monmouth in Devonshire, on the strength of his internal convictions.

Fortunately for the old steward, the question between his nephew and himself was merely one of wounded feeling and disappointment on one side, and a heartless disregard of the ties of blood and struggling helplessness on the other. Had Mr. Sillex stretched forth a helping hand, or only uttered a kind word, which would have cost him nothing, he might have secured a grateful recollection, where he had wantonly planted bitterness and resentment.

It was unwise; for such impressions but too frequently grow with the growth, and strengthen with the strength of those who receive them.

Jack's designs for the present were directed to two objects: the first was to discover the abode of the mysterious relative whose acquaintance he had so unexpectedly made—a secret which had baffled all the penetration of Mike, and considerably aggravated his fraternal feelings; the second, to find out the name of the lady who appeared so anxious to place her child under such respectable guardianship; for her child the boy naturally supposed it to be, not comprehending why any one should pay for the support of other people's children.

He had never met with such disinterestedness—no one had ever offered to pay for him.

As to any use the discovery, in either case, might be to him, he left that to Providence. It was the first stroke of business out of his regular line he had ever ventured upon; and, like a new speculator launched on the world's exchange, he naturally felt hopeful.

Full of determination, Jack proceeded, at an early hour the following morning, to the park—the peak of his cap pulled closely over his eyes, a large worsted comforter twisted carefully round his neck so as to hide the lower part of his features—and seated himself at the end of one of the benches, which, in summer, are generally occupied by sentimental nursery-maids and the noisy, laughter-loving band supposed to be under their charge. We have often watched these groups, with here and there a red coat, off duty, phandering away the hours he knows not how to dispose of, and a solitary policeman, on duty, giving himself officious airs, and looking dreadfully stern at his military rivals.

The position was well selected, and did great credit to the boy's tactics, commanding, as it did, not only the steps leading to Waterloo-place, with its column erected to the memory of the royal duke, who has left a name written indelibly, we fear, in the ledgers of so many of his too trusting countrymen, but the passage to Spring-gardens, and the long walk extending from the palace to the parade-ground.

If Mr. Sillex should, by any accident, happen to pass through the park, his nephew must be blind indeed not to perceive him.

It is astonishing with what patience the boy watched and waited—not even the ice in the inclosure, with its crowd of merry skaters, most of them lads of his own age, or, what appeared still more tempting, the famous long slide outside the rails, could draw him for a single instant from his post: a proof that though his hands and feet might be half frozen, his heart remained warm with the bitterness of resentment.

The only recreation he allowed himself was an occasional short run, accompanied by the swinging of his arms athwart his chest, or, when in serious doubt as to the exact locality of his toes, sharply striking the soles of his bluchers against the trunk of the nearest tree; by way of ascertaining, we suppose, whether the usual inmates were at home or not.

It would have been hard, indeed, if so much perseverance had failed of success.

Jack had been several hours in the park, when a man and woman made their appearance, leading a child between them. After looking around, as if to make sure that they were right in the locality, they seated themselves on one of the benches facing the largest of the butts or counters on which the vendors of milk and whey arrange their pans and bowls during the summer season.

"From the country," thought Jack, after examining them with a critical eye.

No wonder that his curiosity was excited, for the female seemed overwhelmed with grief. And yet it could not be poverty—that is to say, poverty according to Jack's idea—that caused her tears. For she was both warmly and comfortably clad, and the child dressed in a velvet mantle, worn over a dark cloth frock.

A more experienced eye might have detected, perhaps, that the mantle was considerably used, and the frock had not been made for the wearer. But the boy, although expert in many things, was no great connoisseur in dress.

At first he naturally supposed that they were merely resting themselves, and expected every moment to see them resume their walk. Finding that they remained, he jumped to a second conclusion—they must be waiting for some one. And he asked himself, for whom?

He had not long to wait for an answer to this mental inquiry. Casting his eyes towards the Duke of York's column, he recognised his respectable relative, Mr. Sillex, descending the steps with a lady on his arm; and in an instant he understood the whole affair.

"Only to think," he muttered, "that I should be the first to see uncle Mike's new parlour boarder;" and strange to say he began to feel an interest in the child.

With a promptitude that did great credit to his self-possession, Jack darted behind the before-mentioned counter or butt, knelt down upon the snow, and puffing the comforter from over his ears, prepared to listen.

"You see, Rose, I have kept my word," said Lady Boothroyd, as she approached the bench where Mark Rayner, his wife, and Lillian were seated.

The poor woman regarded the orphan with a piteous expression.

"And I mine," replied her husband, with a flush of shame. "God knows how hard it has gone with me. I never thought I should live to turn child stealer."

"Ho!" thought the listener, "the child has been stolen."

"You see what poaching leads to," gravely observed the steward.

Mark was silenced.

"I should not feel quite so miserable," exclaimed Rose, "if your ladyship would only condescend to tell me what you intended to do with Lillian."

"She is a ladyship, is she?" mentally ejaculated Jack, on whom not a word was lost.

"Provide for her," replied Lady Boothroyd, "handsomely."

"Send her to school," added Mr. Sillex.

The boy could not repress a grin at the idea of Mike being intrusted with the education of any one. He had never known him to have but one pupil, and that was himself.

"I have no time to waste on explanations of my intentions," observed the mistress of Meldown Park, haughtily, "nor have you the right to question them. My rank and character ought to be a guarantee that they are kind ones. Give me the child," she added. "Mr. Sillex will arrange the rest."

His nephew repeated the name several times, to imprint it on his memory.

Fully believing that by arranging the rest, the speaker meant that the steward would restore the proofs of her husband's guilt, Rose, after kissing the child, placed her little hand in that of her persecutor.

"I'll not go with her!" exclaimed Lillian, fixing her large dark eyes upon the countenance of Lady Boothroyd. "Take me home to uncle Simon and dear aunt Hester."

"She will be very good to you," whispered the woman.

The orphan shook her head doubtfully.

"And send you to school, where you will have playfellows of your own age," added Rose, "and nice dresses."

"A precious lot o' them Mike will give her!" was the mental commentary of Jack on the last promise of the speaker. "Poor little thing! He is more like to strip her of the fine things she has got, and sell them to buy gin with."

It required but little art to persuade the child out of her objection to accompany the fine lady, who was to do such great things for her. Still she parted from Rose reluctantly; and more than once, as her cruel enemy led her triumphantly away, turned and kissed her hand to her.

Of Mark she took no notice, evidently feeling little or no regret at leaving him.

The boy made no attempt to follow them, knowing well enough where they were going to, but directed all his attention to overhear what was to follow between his uncle and the man and woman.

"You have got the—you know what I mean," said Mark; "the—"

"Her ladyship gave it to me," interrupted the steward, "before setting out; but we must have a little conversation first," he added. "Where are the chain and locket?"

"What chain and locket?" demanded Rose.

"The ones Mark took from Lillian," was the reply.

It was perfectly useless for her husband to protest that he had never seen them. Mr. Sillex was not to be convinced, added to which it was no part of Lady Boothroyd's plan to part either with the bible or the leaf.

"Why should she keep them," exclaimed the guilty man, passionately, "if she intends to act fairly by me?"

"Why should you keep the chain and locket?" retorted the old man.

"I have them not."

His hearer smiled incredulously.

"I'll tell you why we intend to keep them," he said.

"I should like to hear that," thought Jack.

"Why do children," continued the crafty speaker, "when they catch a bird tie a string to its leg? Shall I tell you? To pull it back when it attempts to escape—cut short its flight—to have a hold upon it. You are the bird: the string is round your leg—neck, perhaps, would have been a better word, only I don't wish to make any remark that might sound unpleasantly. Keep your proofs; we will guard ours. You see the game—check for check. Clever, isn't it?"

"Rascally, you mean," ejaculated Mark, indignantly.

"In this world you will find them much the same thing," philosophically observed the old man.

"Had I known!"

"But you didn't know—you couldn't know," interrupted Mr. Sillex, a second time. "How should you? Still, it is her ladyship's intention to act liberally by you. You are about to emigrate—a prudent decision; but it will be a still more prudent one never to return to England. Great people do not like to live in fear. You understand me? Here are fifty pounds," he added, "to pay your passage out."

"But the child?" exclaimed Rose, who, in the midst of her terror and anxiety for her husband's safety, could not forget poor Lillian, and the wicked part they had been driven to act towards her.

"The child will be taken care of," replied the steward, at the same time placing the notes in the hands of Mark Rayner. "You understand your position—are aware you have had a lucky escape; for if Sir Norman had only known—"

At the name of the baronet, husband and wife both shuddered.

"Sir Norman!" repeated Jack to himself; "that's another name to think of."

The gentleman looked at his watch, and observing that it wanted a quarter to one, directed the unhappy dupes of Lady Boothroyd's promises to remain where they were till the clock of the Horse Guards should strike the hour. This arrangement would give him time to reach the carriage of the baronet, which was waiting for him close to the column in Waterloo-place. He did not wish the servants to recognise either Mark or Rose.

As to being followed by any one else, the idea never once entered his imagination. He had quite forgotten his nephew.

"The villain!" muttered the man, crumpling the notes together. "O Rose, Rose! what have my recklessness and imprudence brought you to? a felon's wife, nay, almost a partner in his crime. I shall go mad to think of it."

The concealed listener had no time to attend further to their conversation; his aim was to follow his uncle, track the old fox to his covert, and then smoke him out, or, in other words, employ the knowledge he had obtained to the best advantage. Mike, he knew, would stand something handsome for the discovery.

Like many older and more-experienced generals, Jack had never calculated on the strategy of the enemy. Great was his mortification, therefore, when, after dodging him from tree to tree, and creeping up the steps on his hands and knees, he reached the topmost one just in time to see him drive off in the dashing, well-appointed equipage.

In the bitterness of his disappointment he had one consolation. He had not been recognised, and that was something.

Most boys of his age would have given up the pursuit, confessed themselves baffled, and thought no more upon the subject. Not so with Jack: he had been trained in a very different school—cunning and danger. A few moments' reflection decided him how to act.

Taking from his jacket a neat-looking pocketbook—the possession of which might have puzzled him to explain—he ran back to the spot where Mark and Rose were still seated, waiting the signal which was to release them.

"Please, who was that old gentleman I saw you talking with just now?" he exclaimed, apparently very much out of breath.

"Why do you want to know?" demanded the man.

"See what he has dropped," replied the boy. "I tried to overtake him; but he rode away in a fine coach before I could get up to him."

The possibility that it might contain the fatal leaf from the bible struck both husband and wife.

Mark eagerly demanded to see it.

"Can't you see it?"

"But I wish to examine it."

"That wouldn't be honest!" exclaimed the lad, with an expression of well affected frankness. "Why I haven't looked into it myself."

"We will restore it to him," suggested Rose.

"And get the reward. No, I thank you."

A few moments' reflection convinced the unhappy pair how unlikely a thing it was that Lady Boothroyd should have parted with the proofs, even to her confidant; or that he would have brought them with him. It could do them no good to prevent the pocket-book being restored to its owner.

"His name is Sillex," said Mark.

The querist knew that much already.

"He is steward to a very rich gentleman, Sir Norman Boothroyd," added Rose, struck by the seeming honesty of the lad, "but we cannot tell you where he resides in London; most probably, though, with his master."

"And where does his master live?" demanded Jack.

"We do not know—the family have only just come to town. The residence of Mr. Sillex in the country is called the Home Farm, St. Faith's, Devonshire."

These were a great many names to recollect, but somehow, although he could neither read nor write Jack did contrive to recollect them. He had a peculiar system of mnemonics of his own—a system which danger and crime had taught him.

Thanking his informants for their kindness, he quitted them, not without a secret contempt for their lack of intelligence.

"No wonder," he thought, "that uncle Andrew made such fools of them: they could no more smell a dodge than a canary could a mouse."

The track was getting more easy to follow: one clue more would bring the steward and nephew face to face.

Whilst the scene which we have described was being acted in the park, the returned convict was on the watch in his cottage, waiting like some spider in its web in expectation of its prey. As the hours passed on, he began to feel impatient, and the suspicion that his brother had been jesting with him crossed his mind. It was soon, however, dismissed. Whatever else his peculiarities, Andrew had never been remarkable for a playful humour. Besides, he could have no motive for trifling with him, and Mike was a great judge of motives.

A knock at the door put an end to his cogitations and surmises on the subject.

"Come in," he shouted, briskly.

The next instant Lady Boothroyd, thickly veiled, entered the wretched abode, leading Lillian by the hand. Her ladyship's first act was to close the door; her next, to take a chair.

"A woman of business," thought the man, watching her movements attentively.

"Are we alone?" inquired his visitor.

"Quite alone, marm," answered Mike, "if you have anything to say to me."

"You have been represented to me," said the artful woman, "as a person who may be trusted."

"With untold gold, marm," exclaimed the convict, clapping his hand upon his breast, as if calling upon his heart to witness the truth of his assertion; and trying, at the same time, to look exceedingly honest.

"That is not exactly the kind of confidence I wish to place in you," observed the lady, drily.

"Well, marm, it might have been; I am quite ready to take charge of anything—it will be safe in my keeping—I've the best of characters, and can—"

"No doubt!" interrupted her ladyship, somewhat impatiently; "but it is perfectly unnecessary for you to tell me so: I informed myself thoroughly of your character, before I decided on employing you."

"That villain Andrew has been splitting on me," thought Mike; "my own twin brother too!"

"I wish to ascertain," continued the speaker, "whether you are disposed to take charge of a child?"

"A child!" exclaimed the ruffian, with affected surprise. "It ain't much in my way, but, perried it ain't a baby—"

His visitor pointed to Lillian.

"Well, she is a pretty creature," he continued, in what was doubtless intended to be a very soft, affectionate tone; "come here, my love."

The child instinctively shrank from him, and clung to Lady Boothroyd.

"Unfortunately she is illegitimate," observed the latter, "and cannot be acknowledged. She is also exceedingly obstinate," she added, "and requires a firm hand to restrain her."

"I am firm enough, marm," replied Mike, scowling on Lillian for the repugnance she had involuntarily displayed; "and as to her being ill—ill, I know what you mean, though I can't exactly remember the word—it don't so much matter; you ain't the first woman," he added, "who has met with a misfortune."

"What does the wretched man mean to insinuate?" exclaimed the mistress of Meldown Park, greatly shocked at a supposition so offensive to her chastity; which being the only virtue she possessed, she naturally felt the more tenacious about.

"It's all right, marm," said Mike, with a knowing wink; "no offence."

A little reflection convinced his visitor how absurd it would be to argue on such a point with the fellow; and after all, the idea was not unfavourable to her view. Curiosity she well knew to be inseparable from vulgar minds, and by letting him entertain his opinion, the probability was in favour of his making further inquiries respecting her.

The pecuniary part of the transaction was soon arranged. Fifty pounds were to be paid annually, and in advance, for the board and education of Lillian.

"I forgot to add," said the unprincipled woman, as he rose to depart, "that the child is entitled to five hundred pounds."

"Is she, though?" exclaimed Mike, secretly wondering at the confidence so unexpectedly placed in him.

"Which, in the event of her death," continued the lady, "I should feel it my duty to pay over to you, in consideration of the trouble which you will doubtless have had with her—provided, of course, that you take proper care of her."

"I'll take care of her," muttered the convict.

"And are kind to her."

"As kind as you desire, marm," replied the ruffian.

"But suppose, now, anything should happen to her," he added, speaking very deliberately, "and some children is very delicate, how am I to let you know of it?"

"I shall send a person in whom I can confide, every six months, to see the child," answered her ladyship.

"Couldn't I call anywhere?" suggested Mike, insinuatingly.

"No."

"Or write?"

To this modest proposal the negative was pronounced in a tone still more decided than to the first, and the speaker took her leave. She was far too wary to be caught in that spring.

Lillian, terrified at the thought of being left alone in such a wretched-looking place, attempted to follow her, but the master of the cottage dragged her roughly away, threatening, with fearful curses, to twist her neck if she cried or stirred.

"Sit there," he said, forcing her into a chair in one corner of the room; "and only let me see you move, that's all. I'll soon teach you."

The sobs which, despite her efforts to repress them, would break convulsively from time to time from the helpless orphan, and the mute agony of her looks, failed to make the least impression upon Mike; in fact, he had something else to think of. The parting words of his visitor still rang in his ears: they had produced the effect the speaker calculated.

Five hundred pounds in the event of the death of his charge! He had never been the possessor of such a sum in the whole course of his career of crime. It appeared enormous to him, and yet how easily a little exertion and honesty might have made him the master of it.

Five hundred pounds! It was independence—positive wealth, according to his estimation of money.

"Why didn't she speak out?" he muttered.

"Women always shilly-shally with what they wish. Not that I'm a-goin' to run any risks—no, no. Too wide awake for that; but it is an awful lot of tin," he added, musingly, and his eyes sparkled greedily as he mentally calculated all that it would purchase.

Then the thought of Andrew's threat, that it would cost him his life if he harmed the child, occurred to him, and somewhat checked his imagination.

"She is one day to be worth her weight in gold to him," he said, repeating his words. "I wonder what she will be worth to me!"

The answer was still the same—five hundred pounds.

There seemed to be a sort of magic in the sum. Mike had heard of such an amount before—nay, of much larger ones; but never had his mind grasped the idea so completely. He counted upon his fingers how many tens and twenties it would make, divided it into fifties, and, if his arithmetic had carried him so far, would have reduced it to half-crowns, shillings, sixpences, and pence, in order to form an exact estimate of its value.

Although sorely tempted, he came to the conclusion to do nothing rashly. In the first place, he wanted to be assured that in the event of any accident to his charge, the money would be really and truly paid; for he was quite shrewd enough to know that there was no recovery on a verbal promise in a court of law. Besides, he had had enough of law: its chances had been unfavourable to him. In the next, how the affair might be arranged in a business-like manner without danger to himself.

The last consideration, however, embarrassed him the least; for, as he before observed, "some children are uncommon delicate."

"Only think, now," soliloquised Mike, in a philosophic vein; "five hundred pounds a-goin' a begging! It's aggravatin' to think on it. Five hundred pounds just for placing one's hand over her mouth for a few minutes, and stoppin' her breath! I could do it as easily as—but what then?"

It is astonishing what power those two words have exercised on the world, both for good and evil. What then, have cooled the courage of many a desperate man, kept rogues within the pale of legal honesty, arrested hands upon the verge of crime, and sometimes driven them to commit it, in the vain hope of concealing it. They exercise also a political influence. Many a member would sell his constituents; ministers betray their country, perpetrate jobs too scandalous even for the cynical age we live in, to pass over in silence, but for the terrible question, "What then?" They form, as it were, part of the police of society, and are most efficient in the preventive service.

Mike's reveries were broken by the return of Jack, who affected great surprise on seeing Lillian, and asked all kinds of embarrassing questions respecting her. Who was she? would she stay long with them? what was her name, and how came she there?

"You are plaguily curious," exclaimed the old convict, impatiently; his conversational powers, nearly exhausted by the succession of falsehoods he had been forced to tell. "She is the daughter of a friend of mine; will remain here just as long as I please; and her name is—what is your name?" he asked, roughly.

"Lilly," answered the trembling child.

"Don't speak so gruffly," said the boy; "you frighten her."

"I shall speak as I please," was the reply.

Jack's heart was naturally a kind one, but his affections had run wild, for want of proper limits to restrain them. We do not mean wild in the ordinary acceptance of the word: he was too young for that, but just that sort of wilfulness which renders youth unsettled. Children require some one to love as well as to be up to. It is the strongest instinct of their nature. Had he had a mother or a sister, ten to one but what he had turned out a very different character. But the poor boy had only his uncle Mike; and our readers are aware how impossible it was even for the most loving disposition to attach itself to him.

The want of something to rest his heart upon had shown itself in his kindness to little Mary, and his rough and ready sympathy with Richard Markham. It had now discovered another object; and acting under the same mysterious law which leads the solitary plant rooted in some dark and humid cell to direct its sickly leaves towards the only ray of light which penetrates it, Jack turned towards it intuitively.

If Mr. Silcox had an enemy, poor Lillian had a friend in Jack.

"Don't cry," he said, taking the child by the hand. "Uncle Mike is very rough in his speech, but he won't harm you."

The convict uttered an inarticulate "Umph!" and Lillian looked up in the face of the boy, and tried to smile.

CHAPTER XVI.

When heaven and angels, earth and earthly things,
Do leave the guilty in their guiltiness,
A cherub's voice doth whisper in a child's.—MATURIN.

It was many a long year since Mike had been so flush of cash, and he determined to indulge the coarse passions of his nature by what he called enjoying himself—in other words, to drink and swill at his ease in one of the low pothouses in the neighbourhood. In order to do this without risk of his charge escaping, Jack was ordered to remain at home, and for two days the boy never quitted the house. It was no great punishment to him, for, without knowing why, he already detested the mode of life to which his uncle had trained him.

It is not to be supposed that this repugnance arose from any moral considerations. The danger attending his exploits, perhaps, might have something to do with it, as well as the mysterious disappearance of Richard Markham, for both weighed upon his mind, which, as far as right and wrong were concerned, was a mere blank. He certainly understood that certain things were punished, provided they were found out,—had heard of laws and magistrates, and knew what the police were for; but of honesty as a principle—a rule to be the guidance of his conduct towards his fellow-creatures, he was as ignorant as though the divine command had never been given.

How many hundreds—nay, thousands of children in this vast empire are in the same position! our streets teem with them—our goals yawn to receive them! From the dark alleys, where the stagnant air is laden with miasma, the narrow courts, the nameless dens, they are belched forth to infect society, the seed of a future pestilence—victims making victims.

Not one of these helpless creatures—born in ignorance, reared in ignorance, living in ignorance, and, what is far more appalling, destined to die in ignorance—but, under other auspices, might become valuable members of society, add to their country's strength instead of weakness, assist her industry, develop the resources of her colonies, and act a useful part in the great drama of humanity.

Let any man try to enter into communication with one of these little outcasts, and he will be struck by one of two things: his advances are either received with shyness amounting to terror, or a display of effrontery still more painful to contemplate. Who is to blame? Young as the archaic may be, he knows that he is already at war with society, or destined to become so, and he cunningly attempts to deceive, or insolently brave it. He looks upon the well-dressed portion of his fellow-creatures as his natural enemies, and his feelings betray themselves according to age or hardihood.

The embryo felon is right. Society is his enemy, for it has left him in ignorance, instead of educating him; drawn the best trumps from the pack, and, confident in its strength, plays the game of life against him.

How frequently do we hear those who have never contributed a shilling towards the education of the poor, complain of the prevalence of crime, suggest plans for prison discipline, penal colonies, and the employment of convict labour. They had much better turn their attention to schools; they will be found cheaper in the end.

Prevention is better than cure; and on this principle we prefer school-rooms to reformatories. Not that we consider the latter unnecessary—far from it; they have done, and are doing, excellent work.

But why wait till the spring is sullied, the sapling bent, the disease developed, when the means of avoiding so great a portion of these miseries are at hand, easy of application, and comparatively inexpensive.

Should any one accuse us, in consequence of these observations, of wandering from our legitimate sphere, we boldly answer—No; our office is to instruct as well as amuse. A great truth may be advocated even by a novelist; and possessing as the FAMILY PAPER does, an almost unrivalled power of publicity,—a voice, as it were, at every fireside in the kingdom, we should ill perform our duty if we did not occasionally scatter through its pages thoughts for age to dwell on—subjects worthy the attention of the young.

There is a kind of freemasonry in childhood; it requires no introductions: innocence introduces itself, ignores the distinctions of social rank, and in making a friend, never inquires where the object of its preference banks, or whether, in a worldly phrase, the acquaintance is likely to prove an eligible one.

It is a happy thing that it is so. Such lessons are inculcated and acted upon quite soon enough.

The two days that Jack and Lillian were left in the cottage together were quite sufficient to make them understand each other; the orphan felt that she had acquired a friend, almost a protector, and the boy, that he had at last found something more intelligent than a dog or a rabbit to place his affections upon.

Jack never seemed to tire in his endeavours to amuse his little playfellow. From the first night he had given up his bed to her; an arrangement that uncle Mike wondered at, but did not object to, for the room—if the gloomy den over the outhouse might be designated one—was lit only by a narrow skylight in the roof, far too high for a child to reach, and the door had a lock to it, advantages which did not escape the calculation of the convict.

The boy had made himself a sleeping-place at the head of the staircase. True, the night wind blew keenly on him from the broken window, and the draft from the kitchen came whistling up the stairs with a low, moaning sound, but he paid little attention to either of these inconveniences. He was used to the night air, and if by chance he awoke and found himself unusually cold, he curled himself up with his head under the bed-clothes and slept till morning, or the return of Mike drunk from the pothouse caused him to run shivering down the creaking stairs to let him in.

In the morning Jack was the first up, the kitchen made as tidy as he knew how to make it, the fire lit and breakfast ready before he called Lillian. Twice on entering the room he had found her upon her knees, and her hands clasped together by the side of the truckle bed; and though he had but a faint idea of what she was engaged in, a feeling of awe came over him, and he crept silently away, not to disturb her.

The third time he caught her thus occupied he determined to ask her about it.

"Lilly," he said, when she descended, "what were you a-doin' just now?"

"When you came to call me?"

"Yes."

"Saying my prayers," answered the child, astonished at the question.

"And to whom do you pray?"

"To God."

"Who taught you?"

"Mamma," replied the orphan, her eyes filling with tears, "a long while ago."

"There, don't cry!" exclaimed the boy, kissing her; "I won't tease you any more about it."

"You don't tease me."

"Don't I? Well, then, isn't it odd that no one taught me to pray?"

"Perhaps you had no mamma," suggested Lillian, innocently.

"I must have had a mother, which is the same thing, I suppose," said Jack; "only I can't remember her, though I often try. I thought people only said prayers when they went to church; and one must dress fine to go there," he added. "I know that, for I have often watched them in on a Sunday."

"And did you never go?" inquired the child.

"Lord, Lilly!" exclaimed the boy, "what should I do there?"

"Pray, as other people do. Do you never pray?"

"I used to do to Mike, to let me off when he was a-goin' to larrup me," answered the lad; "but he doesn't try it on now. The last time his shins was black and blue for a fortnight, so he found he'd got enough of it. What do you say?"

"Shall I teach you?"

"If you like," answered Jack, hesitatingly, for he felt a singular sensation creeping over him.

"You must kneel, then."

"Kneel?"

"Yes," said Lillian, seriously. "Mamma always made me kneel when she taught me."

For the first time in his life the knees of the young outcast were bent where they cannot be trained to bend too early, and he repeated the words of the Dominical prayer as they fell from the lips of his instructor. There was much in it that he could not comprehend.

"What do you mean," he asked, "by 'Give us this day our daily bread'? I thought people had to work for it, or steal it."

"God knows," was the reply.

"And 'Deliver us from evil'?" he added.

Lillian's answer was still the same.

Jack Manders did not forget the latter phrase. It seemed to have made a peculiar impression on his mind, and several times in the course of the day he repeated it to himself, musingly.

The heavy footsteps of Mike upon the stairs put an end to his questioning and Lilly's teaching. The latter shrank into a corner, and the boy began to busy himself about the breakfast.

The convict was in no very amiable humour. His eyes appeared bleared and red from the over-night's debauch: he loathed the very sight of food, but eagerly poured cup after cup of tea down his parched throat.

"What is the fool a-starin' at?" he exclaimed, scowling on the child, who, fascinated by terror, could not take her eyes off him.

"Don't speak so roughly, uncle," said Jack; "you only frighten her."

"And why should I frighten her?" demanded the brute, savagely.

"She ain't used to you yet."

"You're a-gettin' as great an idiot as the gal," muttered the convict; "but it all comes of staying at home, eatin' and drinkin' and doin' a nothink. You'd better be off," he added, "and see what you can pick up—I ain't a-goin' to keep you in idleness as I have done."

The assertion was rather a modest one, considering that for years the boy had kept him.

Never had Jack felt so disinclined to quit the house as on that morning, but there was no help for it; it was only by bringing him money that he could hope to keep his taskmaster in good humour. He lingered as long as it was possible, saw that Lilly made a good breakfast, and when he bade her at last "good-bye," promised soon to be back to her.

"Come here," said Mike, addressing the child as soon as they were alone.

With desperate courage the orphan advanced to him.

"That's right," he continued: "now, mark me. You see that door; if you attempt to pass it, without my leave, I'll cut the flesh off your very bones—do you hear?"

"Yes," gasped Lillian.

"See you mind me, then—I ain't a-goin' to stand no nonsense with you, I can tell you."

During the morning the convict absented himself for nearly an hour, carefully locking the door after him. On his return he brought several bottles of gin with him, two pipes, and some tobacco, which he placed upon the table. From this arrangement it was evident that he expected a visitor.

"Sit there," he said, pointing to a stool near the fire. "I don't want to keep you a-shiverin' in the cold."

The little victim obeyed him.

"Where do you come from?" he added.

"From a long way over sea."

"And have you no father or mother?"

"No, they are both dead," answered Lillian, bursting into tears.

"I thought as much," muttered the wretch.

He could draw but little further information from her, which was not very surprising, seeing that Lillian was only six years old when she left India, and till the last few weeks had spoken but little English. All she remembered was that her papa used to wear a red coat, with gold somethings—she had forgotten the name of them—upon his shoulders, and a sword by his side. That he died first, and her mamma a few days after him.

"An officer," mentally ejaculated Mike. "I'll be bound," he added, "that Andrew knows all about her; only to think of his being so close with his brother, and we are twins too! but I'll larn all about her too, afore I've done, cunning as he thinks himself."

Having come to this praiseworthy conclusion, he lit his pipe, and gradually fell into a profound meditation, which was only broken by the impatient glances he cast from time to time at the window.

The party he was waiting for, and had sent his nephew out to avoid meeting, had not yet made his appearance, a delay which the impatient host considered very unhandsome, after the preparations he had made to entertain him.

We must now follow Jack, who had hitherto pursued his peculiar avocation in St. James's Park, the purlieu of Westminster, and Parliament-street—rarely had he ventured beyond Charing-cross. This time, however, he determined to vary the field of operation. The old ground was too dangerous; every policeman as he passed him, appeared to eye him suspiciously. So he walked nervously on till he found himself in Regent-street, which at that early hour was nearly deserted, so that he had ample time to gratify his curiosity by taking a good look at the jewellers' shops, and wondering in his ignorance what the golden glittering things he saw there could be meant for.

Anon the streets began to fill; yet he saw no opportunity of exercising his craft. The weather was cold, every one walked briskly, and were closely buttoned up,—a reason which may account for the fact that not half so many pockets are picked in winter as in summer.

"I shall have no luck to-day," he thought.

Then he remembered the prayer Lilly had taught him, and muttered to himself the words, "Deliver us from evil," and again wondered what they meant.

Although yet a stranger to honesty as a principle, it was evident that he had no inclination for his task, for he suffered opportunities to escape him which a few weeks previously he would fearlessly have seized upon. Heart and hand both felt unnerved; and yet how readily each would have strung themselves to work. But that appeared hopeless: as he told his uncle, he wanted a character, and could find no one to give him one.

Youth would do well to reflect that labour, no matter how skilful or willing, without character is—like an anvil without a hammer, or a saw without a handle—comparatively useless. Character should be the workman's first stock-in-trade, industry the next. Time and perseverance will do the rest.

In this musing, listless humour, Jack had wandered as far as the entrance to Regent's Park, when a carriage passed him. In an instant he became all life and activity, for he recognised the brown and orange liveries of the servants.

It was the same his uncle Andrew had driven away in.

Without a moment's hesitation or reflection, the boy took to his heels and followed it; and, after running till all but out of breath, had the satisfaction of seeing it draw up in front of one of the stately mansions in a line with Chester-terrace. A domestic in similar livery opened the hall door as a lady and child alighted.

Jack grinned with delight. The clue was found at a moment when he had neither been searching nor thinking of it.

As the vehicle drove round towards the stables, he advanced, and boldly inquired of the porter if Sir Norman Boothroyd did not live there.

"What can you possibly have to say to him?" demanded the pampered menial, with a stare of surprise.

"It ain't him," replied the lad; "it's Mr. Sillex."

"Mr. Sillex?"

"Yes! Mr. Andrew Sillex, the steward."

"And what do you want with him?"

"Perhaps he wouldn't like me to tell you," answered Jack.

The porter thought so too; and as the steward was a person whom few cared to offend, he directed one of the footmen to call him; prudently remaining in the hall himself, with an eye to the safety of the great-coats.

In a few moments the old man made his appearance. His countenance changed to a cadaverous hue when he saw who it was that had inquired for him. The possibility of being tracked so perseveringly by a mere boy, and hunted down at last, had never struck him. The boy took off his cap, gave him a repetition of the bow with which he had saluted him on Westminster Bridge, and, with an arch smile upon his features, asked him how he did.

"You here?" said Mr. Sillex.

"Yes, uncle."

His relative did not ask him this time what he wanted: it would not have done for the servants to have heard the reply, "A character, if you please," which he doubted not would follow.

The steward was a man not only of firmness, but, what is much more rare to meet with, great promptness in his decisions. All ideas of hostility on his part, that is to say overt hostility, of course were at an end; he was disarmed, and he accepted the defeat without attempting to disguise it to himself.

"Give me my hat, John," he said.

The porter brushed it carefully before handing it to him. Perhaps he was in hopes of hearing something further, for his curiosity was excited; if so, he was doomed to disappointment, for the old fox did not address another word to his nephew while they remained in the house.

"And my coat, if you please," he added, blandly.

The servant gave it him.

When dressed, Mr. Sillex beckoned Jack to follow him, and they walked into the park together, for some time in silence. Not that he required time to collect himself, or arrange his plans. They were settled already.

"Why do you call me uncle?" he demanded, turning suddenly round upon the boy, as soon as they reached one of the retired walks.

"Because you are my uncle," answered Jack.

"Pooh, pooh! nothing of the kind."

"It won't do!" exclaimed his nephew, with a broad grin; "did not I hear every word you said to Mike about mother and me, after you had settled for Lilly; and the lady who was to bring her? I know who the lady is, too," he added, "and where St. Faith's is, the Home Farm, and all about you."

"Umph! rather a clever boy," muttered the steward.

"I am not quite a fool, uncle."

"Evidently not. And does Mike know of this discovery?"

"Not yet. I only found you out myself this morning, by folloerin the coach you rode home from the park the other day in."

A smile of satisfaction played for an instant on the thin lips of the old man, and disclosed his very peculiar teeth. Jack did not much like the look of them. A vague impression entered his head that his very respectable relative could give an awful bite; and he felt somewhat more comfortable when the aforesaid lips were compressed again.

"My dear boy," said Mr. Sillex, speaking in his very softest tone, "it is necessary that we should understand each other—in fact, that I should justify myself to you. You are quite intelligent enough to feel the impossibility of my acknowledging the relationship between myself and Mike. It might cost me my place, in the first instance; and could do him no good, in the second."

"He is a rum 'un!" gravely observed Jack, who had been straining the intelligence his uncle had complimented him on to the utmost to comprehend him.

"But with you," added the steward, "it's a very different thing. In fact, I have half made up my mind to try and do something for you."

"Have you, though?" ejaculated the boy, and his little round, dark eyes sparkled hopefully.

"Yes. You say you want a character."

"That's all."

"And are anxious to work."

"Only try me."

"I will try you," said Mr. Sillex, emphatically. "You shall go with me into the country; I start in a few hours, and I will employ you on the farm. It's a nice place, and farming is a very pleasant life. Of course," he added, "I can't expect much from you at first. All you will have to do is to ride on horseback through the fields and see that the labourers do not neglect their work. You can read and write, I suppose?"

Jack hung his head despondingly.

"No matter," added the old hypocrite, encouragingly; "they are soon learnt. The winter evenings are long, and I shall find time to instruct you."

All this, especially the horse, sounded very magnificently in the ears of a boy who had never mounted anything bigger than a donkey in his life, and that only on one occasion, when Mike took him to Greenwich Fair. A new feeling was created in his breast: something seemed swelling at his heart, and his eyes filled with tears.

"Well," he exclaimed, "you are a trump of an uncle."

The steward smiled.

"And I to be such a fool as to think you wor no better nor Mike."

"Indeed!"

"Nay, wuss, of the two."

"Never judge by first impressions, my dear boy," said his relative, meekly; "they generally mislead us. And now that we perfectly understand each other, and everything is settled, you had better return with me to the house."

"I must go home first."

Mr. Sillex shook his head disapprovingly.

"But I must," repeated Jack; "I've got another shirt and three collars there."

"Never mind the clothes. I will buy you much better ones at St. Faith's," replied the old man, whose great object was not to lose sight of him an instant, for fear of his communicating with Mike. "Your wicked uncle might detain you."

"No fear of that."

Jack's great desire was to see Lillian again. He didn't like the idea of leaving her in the hands of the convict, whose temper was not likely to be improved by his disappearance. This feeling, however, was not sufficiently strong to counterbalance his own interests,—the horse, the farm, the new clothes, to say nothing of disoblighing his kind relative, whose tone, manner, and words had gradually been growing quite paternal; so he gave up the project, and consented to accompany him back to the mansion of Sir Norman.

As they retraced their steps, the wily tempter, who gave his nephew credit for less shrewdness than he really possessed, continued the same strain of promises, described the country as a perfect Arcadia, talked of allowing him a gun, and assured him—the only bit of truth in all he said—that there were abundance of hares and partridges on the land at St. Faith's.

Several times Jack felt inclined to exclaim "gammon!" but respect restrained him: the dose was not yet sufficiently strong to nauseate him.

At last Mr. Sillex, like many other accomplished artists, overacted his part by telling him that he looked upon him as his son, and would make a little gentleman of him. He even went so far as to place his hand affectionately upon his neck.

The lad shuddered at the contact of his long bony fingers, and a cold chill ran through his veins, as if a snake had suddenly coiled itself round him. Whether a warning or an impulse, we cannot pretend to decide, but he sprang with a bound out of the old man's reach.

"I won't go with you!" he exclaimed; "and I don't believe a word you have said."

"My dear boy."

"Don't 'dear boy' me; you only want to murder me; and you would murder me, if I were fool enough to give you the chance."

For several instants uncle and nephew regarded each other. One with the feeling of a disappointed tiger, which had failed in its spring; the other, with the half-frightened air of the nimble antelope, escaped from its fangs. Both were exceedingly pale.

"That's a very wicked thought," observed the former, struggling to repress his rage.

"It's a true one."

"Heaven forgive you," said his uncle.

"Forgive you for the lies you have told," retorted Jack. "You'll give me a horse to ride about the farm on, will you! and a gun! and new clothes! I don't believe you'd give me anything; unless it wor a sly knock on the head, or a twist of the neck; and as for a makin' of a little gentleman of me—gammon, it's a croker you mean."

"Stay."

"Not I," replied the boy; "I've seen quite enuff on ye; I'm off."

"I shall have more trouble than I bargained for with that young rascal," thought Mr. Sillex. "He knows too much, a great deal too much; Lady Boothroyd and myself are both in his power, and cost what it will, he must be put out of the way of annoying me."

With this reflection he returned to the mansion of Sir Norman.

Whether he really intended to attempt the life of Jack, was a secret confined to his own heart, and to Him who alone could read it.

Jack felt quite merry as he walked briskly through the park; merry as the bird escaped from the fowler's snare. He had received a lesson, and it had not been thrown away upon him.

A second time the words in the prayer Lilly had taught him recurred to his memory, and he exclaimed aloud—

"Deliver us from evil."

This time he had a shrewd idea of what they meant.

(To be continued.)

Hopes and Helys for the Young.

BOOKS AND READING.

THE origin of writing is involved in obscurity. It has never yet satisfactorily been explained how alphabetical characters first came to be employed. But it really is not a matter of very much importance. Wherever or whenever letters were invented may never, perhaps, be known. That we enjoy the privilege of using them is the main thing, after all. A river is none the less useful, and none the less pure, though its source be undiscovered.

Letters, to those to whom they are strange, appear the oddest things in the world. A picture, of course, tells its own story, with more or less accuracy; an hieroglyphic is a sort of picture writing; but that certain arbitrary marks should convey certain ideas, seems one of the strangest things under the sun.

Thus it was that the Peruvian Inca, in the days of Pizarro, could not at all understand the art and mystery of writing. You remember he made one of the Spanish soldiers scratch the word Dios on his thumb-nail; and then tested the others with it, and was much surprised that they should all understand it in the same way. All? Well, not all; for the leader of their company, that high-blooded hidalgo Pizarro, had to make the humiliating confession that he had never learned to read!

Never learned to read! That is, without doubt, a very sad confession for any one to make. It amounts to saying, "I am intellectually pauperised; the treasures of literature are shut up from me; all that books can teach, all the information they can impart, all the lessons they can enforce, all the pleasures they can afford, are denied to me. I know nothing about them. To them I am deaf and blind. To me they are as much a mystery as the hieroglyphics of old Egypt."

This sort of confession is now exceedingly rare, in comparison to what it was in former times. Then the commonest scholarship was at a premium; and a felon cheated the gallows if he could read like a clerk. Now the case is altered. Most people can read. But how few either understand or avail themselves of the advantages of literature.

Our forefathers were desperately ignorant; and the times in which they lived may appropriately be described as dark ages—dark as the valley of the shadow of death! And, in considering this subject, we are not travelling far out of our course if we turn aside, for the purpose of taking a cursory glance at the means of instruction afforded by "the good old times."

Our forefathers cared little about literature and science. They threw learning—like physic—"to the dogs;" and here and there a poor witless wretch—a human dog—gnawed at the dry bones, and tried to get nourishment of them, and failed, of course.

In those good times learning was almost exclusively confined to the Church. The cost of materials and the labour of transcribing were so great that few but the very opulent possessed books. Eight hundred acres of land were given for one book called "The History of the World." The monks obliterated honest, upright classical literature from the parchment, and substituted legends of saintly heroes which, as Dr. Johnson said of the blue lady's tragedy, sadly wanted fire. In such a state of things you may be sure the common people knew nothing at all of letters. They could not read, they could not write; the very courtiers were often more ignorant than a child on the lowest form of a national school. The only means of obtaining information was from the priests. It was not all of that order who were disposed for the work, and those who were could only receive a limited number of pupils. Suppose an individual, for instance, had been fortunate enough to receive instruction from one of these priestly pedagogues, it would have been more fantastic than useful.

But leaving the Anglo-Saxons and coming down to the times of Plantagenets and Tudors, we find the facilities of acquiring information just as scanty as before. We learn, for instance, that Bishop Richard de Bury pronounced it as his opinion that "laymen are utterly unworthy of any communion with books; and that to them, with their greasy elbows, dirty nails, and unwashed hands, it matters not whether they look at a book turned wrong side upwards or spread before them in the wrong order." Then it was the custom of the University of the University to give out one book to each religious fraternity, diligently to be read for one whole year. Then, also, if a monarch or noble wanted to borrow a book, he had to deposit a valuable quantity of plate in pledge for its safe return; and on the fly-leaf of the volume was written, in church-text,—"Cursed be he who shall in any way injure this book." Then, fitly enough, Shakespeare makes Jack Cade say—as there is no doubt the feeling popularly prevailed, and the last statement was correct,—

"Thou has most traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm, in erecting a grammar school; whereas, before, our forefathers had no other books than the score and the tally."

The people's literature—if we may use the phrase—was at that time in the hands of the minstrels. These men went up and down the country telling stories and singing songs, and were regarded by the nobles as mere vagrants, deserving the stocks and the whipping-post. The acquaintance of the people with Bible history was chiefly confined to the Mysteries enacted by the priests at festival times; and, as truth was very often sacrificed to dramatic effect, the information derived was anything but reliable; to wit, that St. Peter—a sort of low comedy man in the Mysteries—cheated a Jew tavern-keeper by not paying his score!

When printing was invented, information began to spread; but even then it spread very slowly. It was covered with pedantry, verbal criticism, solemn quibble, impracticable dreamings; or it put on a lower form, the garb of vicious buffoonery; and thus arrayed, was the toy of a king and his corrupt courtiers. Even then the middle classes were destitute of the keys of knowledge, and tradesmen and farmers hardly knew an "I" from an "izzard." Then periodical literature fluttered into existence; but it chiefly settled amongst chocolate and rolls on the breakfast tables of notabilities. The schools were mere wretched institutions, veritable Dotheboys' Halls;—and as to the girls! who wanted a woman to read or write if she could work triangular trees on a sampler? If the maid at her distaff could spell a ballad, she was a wise woman; if the eight year old urchin could tell his "apey" book, he was a prodigy; if the collegian worked at his books (his Virgil and his Cicero), he was a puritan; if the 'prentice took to reading, he was an idle dog that would dance at Tyburn.

Now, from all this, the inference is plain—the merry days of England were not knowledge-getting times. Contrast them with our own. We have seen what they were. What are ours? The advantages we possess are innumerable. With books, and libraries, and lectures, and classes, and institutions, and colleges, every facility is ours.

Books! "Of making many books," said Solomon, "there is no end." But there was no Paternoster-row in Jerusalem. Contemplate the immense number of volumes which are issued from the press on all subjects—from the pattern of your cuff to the salvation of your soul. Consider how simple and plain in their style of teaching, if you will be taught, compared with bygone books on science; how technical difficulties are smoothed away, and the student is not stuck fast in a word bog. Think again how cheap they are!—how much you can get for a penny! What marvels for a few shillings! How complete a library you may obtain for a few pounds!

A taste for reading is not only important, but necessary, to all intellectual beings. It is impossible to over-estimate its advantages. The question is not what it can do, but what is there it cannot do? It is the key which opens every door in the temple of learning. It is an armour of defence against the atrophy of ignorance and the vanity of superficial knowledge. It is a treasury secure from degradation, and a refuge free from interruption.

The great men of all ages have been great readers. Pliny employed a person to be always reading to him as he rode from place to place in his sedan. He made extracts from the commonest of books; "for," said he, "there is no book so poor as not to afford something valuable." Cicero read with a pen in his hand, for the purpose of making comments. Queen Elizabeth, to the last year of her life, had her regular hours for reading, as systematically kept as any young student. It is unnecessary to enumerate instances of this kind, for they form an integral part of the life of every celebrity.

Books have been prized by the wisest and best of mankind ever since they were known. But then there are bad books, as well as good books; and the choice of books is as important as a taste for reading. The materials for miscellaneous reading are so multifarious, that it is difficult to show how to select, or where to fix a limit. May we not say with Lord Bacon, "There seemeth to be a superfluity of books. But shall no more be made? Yea! make more good books, which, like the rod of Moses, may devour the serpents of the enchanters."

In our books, we should, I think, select both those which furnish facts and fancies, sanctified by religion and purified by morality. Facts in history, and the philosophy founded on those facts; facts in political economy, and the science built on those facts; facts in natural philosophy, and the science defined from those facts; facts in philology, and the history and diversities of language; facts in astronomy and geology—facts not clipped or modified—not shorn of their original proportions—but freely admitted as such. But do not confine study only to hard facts.

Do not be afraid of fancy. Do not imagine that an eternal separation exists between the beautiful and the true; that all that is graceful and lovely, touching and affecting in the literature of our language—or of other languages—is in any degree less worth the having than stern truth. Do not join the cry against poets, and novelists, and dramatists. Do not imagine (one of the greatest of fictions!) that these are merely to be regarded as playthings, just to pass a little leisure time. A fiction may do us far more good than a fact. Therefore these things never should be shut out. It is quite true that fiction has produced much that is unmistakable rubbish—that is worth absolutely nothing but its weight as paper; but fiction does not stand alone in this. How very many books on dry, hard topics are absolutely rubbish also—law, physics, and divinity; no more worth the reading than the shallowest fiction that ever figured in prose or verse. Plato would have no poet in his model Republic—no, not even Homer. But the "Iliad" is better known than the "Phædo."

I purpose returning to this topic, to point out, as well as I can, the outline of study most useful for a young reader; to show, so far as I am able, not only the personal, but the relative advantages of books and reading—to the family, the workshop, the world. So, for the present, I conclude, in the language of one whose opinion in such a matter is undeniably valuable,—I mean Herschel.

"If I were to pray," says he, "for a taste which should stand by me under every variety of circumstances, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me through life, and a shield against its ills, however things might go amiss and the world frown upon me, it would be a taste for reading. I speak of it, of course, only as a worldly advantage, and not in the slightest degree derogating from the higher office, and sure and stronger panoply of religious principles, but as a taste, an instrument, and a mode of pleasurable gratification. Give a man this taste and the means of gratifying it, and you can hardly fail of making him a happy man, unless, indeed, you put into his hands a most perverse selection of books. You place him in contact with the best society in every period of history, with the wisest, the wittiest, with the tenderest, the bravest, and the purest characters who have adorned humanity. You make him a denizen of all nations, a cotemporary of all ages. The world has been created for him."

"It is hardly possible but the character should take a higher and better tone from his constant habit of associating in thought with a class of thinkers, to say the least of it, above the average of humanity. It is morally impossible but that the manners should take a tinge of good breeding and civilisation from having constantly before our eyes the way in which the best bred and best informed men have talked and conducted themselves in their intercourse with each other. There is a gentle but perfectly irresistible coercion in a habit of reading well directed over the whole tenor of a man's character and conduct, which is not the least effectual because it works insensibly, and because it is really the last thing he dreams of. It cannot be better summed up than in the words of the Latin poet,—'Emollit mores, nec sinit esse ferus.' It civilises the conduct of men, and suffers them not to remain barbarous."

TRUE COURAGE.

True courage is not moved by breath of words,
While the rash bravery of boiling blood,
Impetuous, knows no settled principle.
A feverish tide, it has its ebbs and flows,
As spirits rise or fall, as wine inflames,
Or circumstances change: but inborn courage,
The generous child of fortitude or faith,
Holds its firm empire in the constant soul;
And like the steadfast pole-star, never once
From the same fixed and faithful point declines.

THE MISTAKE OF A LIFE-TIME.

Mr aunt, Polly Price, was the neatest of house-keepers—the very neatest. Pardon the repetition, kind reader. Had you known her as I knew her, you would not wonder at my inability to conceive of her being excelled, or even equalled by any person, in this particular trait.

During the summer months, there was a continued warfare kept up with flies and spiders, and various creeping things, whose innocence and beauty failed alike to excite her mercy or her admiration. And the dust from the street was an annoyance which she often declared she knew not how to endure, and her hatred of it was plainly read in the closed windows and doors, which the greatest rise of mercury could not tempt her to let stand open, except after a shower, or after the dew had fallen at night.

The winter months were also full of trouble. The continual tracking in of snow or mud, and the every-day gathering of dirt around the stove and the wood-box, called for the almost constant application of the broom or mop; so that, altogether, my aunt had a hard time of it "to keep decent for company."

Poor aunt Polly! Everybody called her cross, and almost everybody hated to go into her house, for fear she would scowl at their dusty feet, or run with her polishing powder to clean the door-knob they had touched.

But the one most of all annoyed by this scrupulous neatness was her son John, her only child, a fine, sprightly lad, who, notwithstanding his mother was continually chiding him for his carelessness, was, in reality, "the light of her eyes—the joy of her heart."

Her husband, good old uncle Hezekiah, was a passive inmate of the house; coming in and going out, rubbing his feet, brushing his coat, and working his little farm just as his wife directed; never doubting but it was so intended from the beginning, that the daughters of Eve should hold rule over the sons of Adam.

But John, saucy cousin John, when he arrived at that age when boys begin to think they are going at once to be men, began to question the propriety of so much scolding, and fussing, and cleaning; working constantly to keep the house in order for company who never came, and uncomfortable for those whose home it was. He could never have any pleasure asking his school-mates home with him for an hour, for they were sure to go away offended with his mother.

He had listened daily, if not hourly, from the first of his remembrance, to long lectures about keeping out of the dirt, keeping his clothes nice, and putting things in place; the effect of which was to make him vexingly careless, and shockingly undutiful.

My poor cousin had fretted and chafed under this unwise treatment, until his feelings were fast approaching a climax. He had called for me one day to go and pick berries with him, and after filling our baskets, we were slowly returning, when, all of a sudden, he turned his bright face towards me, and remarked with singular firmness—

"Cousin Lizzie, I'm going to sea."

"Going to sea! What do you mean, John?"

"I mean just what I say. I'm going to Plymouth to get a situation in a whaling ship. I saw an advertisement in our paper last week, for one or two under hands for a ship that is to sail soon, and I am going there to offer myself! If I'm refused, I shall come home again; if not, I shall go!"

"Why, cousin John, you are crazy! What will your mother say?"

"That's just it. 'What will mother say?' There is one she won't say as much to as she does now. The fact is, cousin Lizzie, she is teasing my life out of me, and I am losing my patience more and more every day. I can never stir in the house, but she is close upon me, with a sponge and a clothes-brush, and just so many times as I go out and come in, just so many times do I have to hear the same thing repeated—"Wipe your feet, John; wipe your feet." And she always gets the water for me to wash in the morning, for fear I shall drip it between the pail and the basin, and watches to see if I rinse the soap all off my hands; and she always runs with a towel to pin round my neck when I brush my hair—and indeed, Lizzie, I never shall be a man without I go away, away where she cannot follow me."

I did not undertake to do away with this long list of grievances, by apologising for my aunt; neither did I dare to encourage a spirit of complaint in my cousin, or favour the wild project he had mentioned. Being his senior by some two or three years, I felt the responsibility heavy upon me to dissuade him from anything that might be wrong. But my sympathy for him was strong, for I was well aware of the annoyances to which he was subject—annoyances small in themselves, but terrible in their multiplicity.

We had a long and serious talk, which resulted in more than half convincing me that my cousin's idea of leaving home was reasonable. But the thought of his going to sea was dreadful, and I knew would fill his parents' hearts with the keenest anguish. Still, it seemed the only alternative, for, as he said, his mother would never let him rest in peace, anywhere where her footsteps could follow him; and with my girlish ideas of a man, it seemed as impossible to me as it did to him, that he could ever become one until he could wash himself and comb his hair without assistance.

Thus sagely did we—a foolish girl of fifteen, and an aspiring boy of thirteen—exchange ideas upon a subject of so much importance. I have never since been able to rid myself of the belief that he took just that amount of encouragement from what I said to him that was needed to decide his course, and though I have often tried to coax my conscience to be quiet about the matter, I have never entirely succeeded.

When we came to the turn of the road where we were to separate, cousin John fixed his full, earnest eyes upon me, and said, entreatingly—

"You won't mention this to any one, Lizzie?"

I gave the desired promise, though with strong misgivings as to whether I was doing right, and made my way home, filled with agitating thoughts, and trying to console myself with the belief that he would yet change his mind.

I waited three or four days with the most nervous anxiety, but not seeing or hearing anything of him, I started one morning, after breakfast, for my uncle's house, determined to make a decided effort to prevent cousin John's leaving home.

On arriving there, I looked all around the yard, but seeing nothing of him; I wiped the dust from my shoes with my pocket handkerchief, and tremblingly rapped at the kitchen door.

A faint "come in" was the response. Carefully raising the latch, I entered, and saw at a glance that I was too late—and with a feeling of self-condemnation, I softly closed the door, and sat down in the chair to which aunt Polly pointed me.

A most distressing silence followed, during which I had time to look around the room and observe a confusion such as I had never before seen in the house, and which told plainly that something uncommon had happened, or aunt Polly Price would not have been sitting down at nine o'clock in the morning, her breakfast dishes unwashed and her room unswept!

The table stood in the middle of the floor. The toast and coffee had hardly been tasted. A plate of baked potatoes remained untouched, while the butter and cream-cup showed that the old family cat, which had jumped from the table as I opened the door, had no idea of losing her breakfast because her mistress was dispirited.

Aunt Polly was sitting by the stove, seeming to forget that the weather was warm, her feet upon the hearth, and her hands in her lap, clasping a bit of paper, which, from her spectacles lying upon the floor beside her, I concluded was something she had been reading.

I made a violent effort to swallow the bunch in my throat sufficient to inquire for cousin John; but just as I was about succeeding, aunt Polly looked up, and with all a mother's tenderness in her voice and countenance, asked,

"Lizzie, do you know where John is?"

I was ready to burst into tears, but commanding myself as well as I could, I replied without speaking falsely—

"Why, no, aunt Polly. What is the matter?"

She did not reply, but handing me the paper she held, she covered her face with her hands, and bent forward in an agony of grief.

Through blinding tears I read these few words of pencilling:—

"Mother, I'm going away. Perhaps I shall be gone three years—possibly I may return in a week. You will see or hear from me within ten days. Good bye. JOHN."

This little note my aunt had found in cousin John's room, when she went to call him to breakfast, and the terrible surprise and distress it occasioned can better be imagined than expressed.

I felt condemned, and yet I was not sure that I had any cause for feeling so, as it was by no means certain, had I betrayed my cousin's designs, he could have been prevented from leaving home. Though, as it was, I felt bound to do all in my power to console his distressed parent, and encourage the hope that he would return within a few days. Although, when I remembered his determined look and words, and thought of his bright, honest, intellectual face, which it seemed to me would be all the passport he would need, I felt but little hope myself of seeing him until a three years' voyage had been accomplished.

Aunt Polly condemned herself in the strongest terms, saying that her punishment was just—that she ought to have known better than to find so much fault with so good a boy. "He was sometimes careless, to be sure," said she. "But, O! I ought to have remembered that no one is perfect—surely I am not—and what right had I to blame him? O! it was that, I know, that made him leave us—because I scolded him, to make him do just right, which nobody does—O! O!" And a fresh flow of tears relieved my distressed aunt, and told of her penitence.

I staid an hour or two, offering what consolation I could, and took my leave, promising to go in often, and repeating the hope that possibly the absent one might return, as he had intimated, in a few days.

I saw uncle Hezekiah, as I passed through the yard. He was leaning upon the fence, and the application of his coat-sleeve to his eyes betrayed his thoughts. He did not see me, and I passed on, forbearing to disturb a grief for which I had so little to offer as consolation.

At the close of the week I began to watch the mail with eagerness, with the unusual desire that the watching might be in vain. But I was disappointed; for, upon the tenth day of my cousin's absence, the postmaster handed me a letter directed to my aunt, in a well-known, schoolboy's hand.

Trembling in every limb, I proceeded with it to my poor uncle and aunt. I opened the gate, and passed through the yard with nervous quickness. I stopped at the open door. Aunt Polly was sweeping. She turned suddenly, and seeing the letter in my hand, she gave one wild shriek, and fell senseless on the floor.

The noise alarmed uncle, who was in the garden, and he hurried into the house; and with much difficulty we brought back the life-blood to the face of the poor, heart-broken mother, and got her into her little bedroom, which she never left again until she was robbed in her shroud, and prepared for the last resting-place earth has to offer those weary of life.

The dreaded letter read as follows:—

"MY DEAR PARENTS,—I have engaged a berth in a Cape Horn whale ship, which is to sail within three days. The captain has provided me with a fitting-out, and I shall soon be far away upon the ocean! Do not be worried about me. I shall be a man when I come home again, and I hope I may be a good man. I do not like to stay at home, but I shall come and see you again, if I live.

"Good-by, father—mother. Be kind to each other, and remember your absent and affectionate son,
"JOHN."

As the last words fell upon her ear, my poor aunt uttered a groan, which told of the terrible anguish that had entered her soul; and the dreadful silence that followed made us painfully sensible of the uselessness of trying to lessen that anguish by anything like an attempt at condolence, or an expression of hope, the realisation of which must be postponed three long, dreary years.

Days and weeks passed, but she never recovered from the shock she had received. I spent much time with her, and I was astonished at the change that had come upon her. She became gentle and docile as a child. She seemed displeased with no one but herself; and in answer to my frequent inquiries, how she would have this or that thing done, her invariable reply was—

"Just as you please, Lizzie; just as you please."

I wondered how I could ever have thought her cross or unamiable, and I daily felt my obligation become heavier to supply, so far as was possible, the place of her absent, wandering child.

Her form, already thin by incessant labour, gradually wasted until there seemed scarcely enough left to support vitality. A cough, to which she had long been subject, increased rapidly, and it soon became evident that her life was drawing to a close.

It was touching to hear her moaning, at times, and heart-rending to witness her distress when the autumn winds swept around the house, and told of the winter storms that were coming, and the cold that was waiting its time. She could not be convinced that her dear child was beyond their influence, and was not already suffering a thousand fancied ills.

"Oh! my child! my child!" she would exclaim, "driven from home by your mother's fault-finding—away, away upon the mighty ocean, with only a frail bark to separate you from the great deep, where so many find a gloomy grave! Oh! my child, my child!" And ceasing only from exhaustion, her words would be lost in moans, and her hands clasped in helpless agony.

The wintry snows had but just come when we laid her in the grave; and though no child was there to mourn a mother lost, I gave freely of my own tears, to mingle with my uncle's, over the remains of one whose last days were full of penitence—heaven-born.

I had left the place before my cousin's three years' voyage was ended, but I learned, through correspondence, of the grief felt at the melancholy result of his experiment; and also of the respect he paid to the last resting-place of his mistaken parent.

I look back on the whole as a sad dream, from which there is no clear awakening; and the dark remembrance hangs around me, at times, like a flying phantom, dimming the light of the past. But—peace to thy grave, aunt Polly!

MICHAEL WILLIAM BALFE.

A MARRIAGE is at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances, an exceedingly interesting and attractive event. Nowhere do we find people entering on the holy estate without some recognition, more or less appropriate, of its obligations and enjoyments. Marriage ceremonies, and matrimonial festivities, are not things to be lightly laid aside. The step which crosses the threshold of a new and happier state of existence, should be celebrated with some description of rejoicing, and we have no sympathy with those who, regarding it only as a legal engagement, would strip it of all its poetry and sentiment, together with its orange blossoms and white gloves.

Interesting and attractive in any position of life, a royal marriage is especially attractive. The whole nation is concerned in it—the whole population feels more or less sympathy with the royal couple: though they wear diadems and dwell in palaces, they are not removed from the sphere of love and joy. The Public, like a good-natured, generous father, deals liberally in the giving of a handsome portion, and kindly and thoughtfully in making the marriage ceremony pass off as comfortably as possible; it stands by with the pleasantest of smiles, and gives the bride to the bridegroom with an expression of countenance that seems to say, "There, take her—God bless you both!"

The marriage of the Princess Royal to his Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia is engaging public attention. And among the festivities which are to take place in honour of that auspicious event, nothing is more grateful, or more calculated to be popular, than the encouragement given to native talent by the Queen. At Her Majesty's Theatre a series of entertainments is to take place, thoroughly English in every department. The tragedy of "Macbeth" is to be played, Mr. Phelps and Miss Helen Faucitt sustaining the principal characters; Goldsmith's comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer," is to be represented by our leading comedians; and on the third evening the English opera of "The Rose of Castille," by our English composer Mr. Balfé, is to be performed by English vocalists. This is as it should be. There is something popular about it; something that recognises the worth of English talent, and the appreciation in which that talent is held.

Italian opera has taken so firm a hold of the stage, that native talent has been a homeless wanderer on the face of the earth. Even the dwelling-place that was once on a time erected for it,—the temple which was dedicated to its service and named with its name, has been turned to other uses. There comedy and spectacle have worked; there exhibitors of all kinds, especially conjurers, have met with success; there the Italian company encamped, when burnt out of house and home by that great blaze of splendour the Wizard's bal masque, Covent Garden; but English composers and English vocalists have tried there in vain to obtain public favour.

Not quite in vain. Last season witnessed a change for the better. The Pyne and Harrison Company ventured to invite the public to hear a new English opera. It was really what it promised to be. It was not an Italian opera adapted to the English stage, nor an English play with a few songs introduced, nor an old opera retouched, but a completely new work by an old favourite, one whose reputation was so well established that his music was as much appreciated all over the Continent as at home. We allude, of course, to Mr. Balfé, whose portrait we have the pleasure of presenting to our readers.

Mr. Balfé's new opera of the "Rose of Castille" was an unequivocal success. To say that it was equal to the "Bohemian Girl" is high praise, but not more than it deserves. The musical world was fairly taken by surprise. It had so long existed on foreign importations, so accustomed itself to the Italian school, that it had almost forgotten its old favourite. Now and then it heard of one or two of his former productions being performed by wandering minstrels in some out-of-the-way place, or with considerable éclat on the Continent, or in the United States. But the idea of a new English opera seemed altogether out of the way; and the notion of playing an English opera—even one of Balfe's—in a house devoted to Italian, utterly preposterous. However, this has come to pass. Nobody can doubt the success of the "Rose of Castille," nor the genius of Balfe, nor the unimpaired ability of Miss Pyne and Mr. Harrison; and so the public is treated to something it has longed to see—a thoroughly English opera supported by a thoroughly English company, performed in the most magnificent of our theatres, and patronised by Her Gracious Majesty the Queen.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

M. W. BALFE, ESQ. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

Mr. Balfe has done so much good service that he fully deserves all the honour that can be given to him. His musical ability is something more than talent; it is genius of no mean order. The love of music is inherent in his nature. When he was only four or five years old, his taste was seen in the anxiety which he manifested in listening to musical strains. He would follow with the utmost eagerness the military band—the barrack yard, when the band performed, was a place of immense attraction to him; there he was as regularly to be seen every morning as any one of the performers. The bandmaster himself noticed the boy, and became interested in him. He spoke to the child, asked him to his home, discovered his latent genius, gave him instructions on the violin; and, much to his surprise, found the boy tolerably proficient before most lads could have accomplished the scale.

As the "little fiddler," Balfe composed a polacco for the band. The musicians would scarcely believe it to be his, and the bandmaster was so impressed with the genius of his pupil that he gave up the task of teaching him, and persuaded his father to afford the child more competent instruction. The suggestion was adopted. The success of the experiment was complete. At eight years of age he made his first appearance at a concert in the Royal Exchange, Dublin, and the next year wrote the ballad of the "Lover's Mistake," which was sung in Paul Pry by Madame Vestris.

On the death of his father, Mr. Balfe, then about seventeen years old, came to London and obtained an engagement as principal violinist at the Drury Lane Oratorios. Mori and he played solos on alternate nights during the season. He subsequently got a position in the regular orchestra, and on several occasions acted as conductor. His rich baritone voice, which he had carefully cultivated, induced him to leave the orchestra for the stage; and, before he was nineteen, he played the part of Caspar, in Der Freischütz. But, wielding the baton and treading the boards require very different sort of ability. Cowper, with all his poetic ability, could not read a paper at the bar of the House; the same timidity stood in the way of Balfe. He could neither sing nor act with so many eyes upon him, so the critics wrote down his début as a failure, and the poor youth gladly accepted the liberal offer of Count Mazzara, and started for Rome.

At the mansion of his Italian patron Balfe remained for more than a twelvemonth, studying under the best masters money could procure. In the following year he was introduced to M. Glossop, impresario of the San Carlos at Naples, and La Scala at Milan. At Milan he remained for three months writing choruses and a few overtures. Rival jealousies prevented his doing anything more considerable, until the libretto of a ballet called "La Perouse" was placed in his hands. The masterly manner in which he accomplished this work won for him considerable reputation.

From Milan Mr. Balfe went to Paris. There he made the acquaintance of Rossini. Fortune favoured him everywhere. A wealthy banker offered him ten thousand francs in monthly instalments; Rossini procured him an engagement on condition of his studying under Bordogni for ten months. He accepted both offers, and at the expiration of the appointed time appeared as Figaro in the "Barbier de Seville." His success was complete, and this triumph procured him from M. Laurent the impresario of the Italian opera. Here began Balfe's brilliant career. He was everywhere successful, everywhere a favourite; his progress an ovation, and every fresh performance a fresh triumph. In those days he was better known on the Continent than in England; and more highly appreciated in the land of vocalists than in a country little remarkable for its musical celebrities.

In 1835, however, Balfe came back to England, and appeared at Drury Lane. There he played in his own opera, "The Siege of Rochelle," one of his best and most popular productions. This was followed by BRITISH HEROISM IN INDIA.

"The Maid of Artois," "Catherine Grey," "Falstaff," "Joan of Arc," "Kiolanthe," and many others.

About the year 1839 Mr. Balfe ventured on theatrical management, but this turned out a failure; and at Drury Lane were produced "The Bohemian Girl" and "The Daughter of St. Mark." These admirable compositions have been followed at intervals by other highly meritorious works, including "The Enchantress," "The Bondman," "The Star of Seville," "The Maid of Honour," "Elfrida," and last, but not least, "The Rose of Castille."

For a considerable period Mr. Balfe fulfilled the responsible duty of conductor at Her Majesty's Theatre. He subsequently visited America, meeting with much encouragement from our transatlantic friends. His welcome home has been most hearty, and the success which has attended his last composition has certainly equalled, if it has not exceeded, that of any of his former productions. The highly flattering reception with which his accomplished daughter was greeted last season, added fresh laurels to the wreath so well merited by this eminent musician.

INCIDENTS IN THE INDIAN MUTINY.

A DARING EXPLOIT.

In the long and terrible story of the Indian Mutiny, there are episodes of individual heroism and daring, which will be remembered for many a year to come.

It is only in circumstances such as those of the late revolt that the strength of the British character, its indomitable courage, cool daring, and fixed determination are brought out.

That there was energy and pluck in every honest English heart nobody could doubt; but how much could be accomplished by them in time of adversity nobody could tell till the trial came and the proof was given.

A small band of Englishmen, with their wives and children exposed to the most imminent peril by an overwhelming force, contrived to hold their own, to withstand their unscrupulous enemies, and maintain British supremacy in India. India is ours as much, nay, more than ever it was. The English in India have done their duty with unexampled bravery. They have lived for us—fought for us—died for us. The integrity of the British flag—stained, alas! with the blood of its defenders—has been preserved. That flag waves over the battered walls and shattered houses of Lucknow, flutters over the streets and markets of Cawnpore, and is hoisted from the roof of that Delhi Palace which has seen the last of the Mogul dynasty. Peace and order are being rapidly restored. The horrors of the revolt are passing away like some hideous dream. But the dream leaves a dreadful remembrance behind it; and though the scene is bright again, and the prospect encouraging, the memory of what has been, cannot, and ought not, to be effaced from the mind.

Among the instances of daring which marked the recent struggle, there are few of a more interesting character than that which is represented in the accompanying engraving. It is just one of those stories that would win the attention of listeners round a Christmas fire, a story that fairly illustrates the pluck of our red-coats.

It was at one of the engagements before Cawnpore that the incident occurred. There had been much hard fighting. A mere handful of our brave fellows had faced an overwhelming number of the Sepoys. The Sepoys, of course, had behaved in their usual way: hiding behind banks, and hedges, and stones, anywhere for shelter, and doing all the murderous work they could without much risk to themselves; and, of course, when driven from their defences, and brought face to face with the wall of iron that came steadily onward, bristling with bayonets, they fled. But there still remained opportunities for fiendish cruelty; and by-and-by the mutinous troops would come back again to torture the wounded or plunder the dead.

During the engagement a man of the 64th had his leg shattered by a round shot. There he lay in agony on the ground, quite unable to move, and fully conscious of his own danger. But danger was a thing of which he had no fear, and he could still shout if he saw the rascals flying, even though his hurrah died away in a groan. Presently, however, he observed a company of troopers emerge from the thick of the fight and come galloping towards him. They were Sepoys, and the wounded man resolved to sell his life dearly. If he must die, he would not die alone. He stretched out his hand and seized his rifle, and as one of the most ill-looking of the villains poised his lance, shot him right through the head, and sent him rolling on the sand. At the report of the rifle and the fall of their companion, the troopers drew rein; and while they hesitated another shot struck a second of their number, and served him as the first. The wounded hero saw his advantage, he loaded again, and shot a third. On this the troopers wheeled and fled even faster than they had come, leaving a wounded man master of the field.

The incident is equally characteristic of the cool courage of our men and the timidity and irresolution of the Sepoys.

It is satisfactory to know that the poor fellow who had so gallantly defended himself recovered, and, though he has lost a limb, has won a reputation of which any soldier might be proud.

FELIX STOWE.

CHAPTER XXIV.

LOVE AND PHILOSOPHY.

"DEPEND upon it, dear Maude, that, as the world grows wiser, our distinctions between trades and professions, and all the rest of it, will pass away. There isn't a more ill-used, misapplied word in the language, than that word respectability."

It was a second cousin of the Lady Maude Blance, a middle-aged rector of a small parish, and an accepted suitor for his cousin's hand, who made this remark, sitting in the same room as that in which, now so long ago, Ethel and the Honourable Hugh had discussed the duties of a landlord.

Ernest Montgomery would, very likely, have been thought a strange lover by some of your drawing-room exquisites, who understand by courtship, bracelets and small talk; and perhaps a very cold lover, by others who make love only to a pretty face, and would be quite happy with a wife modelled after the manner of the ladies in the hairdresser's show-window, very red and white, and very silly.

Ernest had a mind of his own, and was concerned to have the assistance of another mind in his future companion. He was the younger son in one of the best and oldest families in Norfolk, and like Maude's brother-in-law, was an "honourable." Maude was thankful they were alike in nothing else. He worked very hard in his parish; and on this day he was preparing the parson's wife that was to be, for the principles on which she would find him administering the moral and spiritual affairs of his pastoral charge. She was full of commiseration for the disadvantages of poverty. She had been wondering how it was, and expressing her wonder, that a good and wise Providence made such gulfs between social classes. And in reply to Ernest's remark about respectability, she quite admitted its truth, but said:

"Meanwhile, the pressure of the contrast between rich and poor bears very heavily on the latter, and must do, Ernest."

"It is for us, then, is it not—for us, I say, dear Maude" (and she loved him, and thanked him with her eyes, for that dear plural)—"to make it sit lighter on them?"

"How?" she asked.

"By showing the poor that if they know their own burdens, there are burdens in all higher ranks, which they would soon know if they tried them. By explaining to them how foolish it is for a tradesman to think a profession necessarily more honourable than trade, or for a labourer to think a trade more honourable than labour. The fact is, Maude, that we are making a world of misery every day by encouraging the idea that manual toil is beneath a man. You over-stock your upper classes. Your professions are too large by half. And then comes the spirit of speculation to supply what the healthy use of proper skill ought to yield, and hence misery and ruin to hundreds."

"Ah, yes," Maude replied, "I have often thought that the legislature is not half strict enough in the discouragement of speculation."

"Legislature!" said Ernest. "There, again, you are going wrong. The bane of all classes is the dependence upon the checks and the aids of legislation. Society ought to balance itself by strict observance of wise laws of its own. Begin to raise or to protect men against themselves by acts of parliament, and, as somebody says, you are like a man who proposes to send up a bird by foreign force into the air, when it ought to be left to rise and fly through its own living power."

"Still, dear Ernest, our laws have much to do with the progress of society."

"Less than you imagine. Just look. The United States are a republic, and prosper; Mexico is a republic, and languishes. Spain has a mixed monarchy, and is miserable; Great Britain has a mixed monarchy, and is the happiest country in the world."

"But in bad times —"

"In bad times the poor should be taught, first, how much may be done to prepare for bad times during better ones; and then we should guard them against the foolish notion that they are the only sufferers in bad times. Short of absolute want, there is a much greater equality of suffering in bad times than the poor recollect. The merchant feels the lost status, and the tradesman feels the lost credit, quite as severely as the operative feels the living on the little hoard in the savings' bank, or the 'going on his club.'"

"Then you would regard 'strikes' in the manufacturing districts as the work altogether of designing and interested agitators?"

"Not entirely. They often come of the folly of the men themselves, who don't understand that wages may be too high, even for the men's own interest. A working man's labour is the commodity which he has to sell. When he brings it into the market, he is very foolish to put upon it an artificial price, for the mischief he does is sure to fall upon himself. For, if the master either cannot or will not pay this artificial price, the strike doesn't increase the demand for labour (which is what benefits the operative most), but lessens it, by lessening capital; while the master's business is standing still."

"But surely," said Maude, "there's a good deal of indifference among masters, in bad times, and when provisions are high. The poor cannot live with high prices and low wages together."

"Don't you come and teach my Sharstone people that sort of doctrine, my little philosopher, or I shall have to preach against my wife."

And Ernest, loving her for her warm, generous heart, laid his finger nearer to her cheek than was at all necessary for simple admonition.

"The poor forget that when prices are high, they are as high to their masters as to themselves; and for the masters to raise wages merely because prices are high, would be a practice that would soon end in ruining both masters and men. Dear Maude, the ills of society result very much from the ignorance of one class about another: but they result still more from the thoughtlessness of one class about another. I, with my two thousand pounds a year from my living at Sharstone, live according to that sum. Then, of course, no pressure from war prices, for instance, can come upon me, which will not make itself as painfully felt by me, as by a man whose income is only a hundredth part as large as mine, unless, indeed, in very exceptional cases, which are, depend on it, when they occur, the consequence of improvidence during better times, rather than of cruelty or any other fault in the employer."

"I'm afraid, dear Ernest, you're but a Job's comforter, at Sharstone, both as landlord and clergyman."

"Will you wait and see?—would that you were there now, my Maude!"

And Ernest took his fee (we know how) for the lecture he had been giving on political economy.

"Shall we finish with a story, Maude?"

"A story? Yes."

"The Indians tell us a story something like this:—A Hare sat in the jungle with his wife. And one day he said to her, 'There is our king, the Lion, come into the wood, and he will devour our children.'"

"No," said the little Hare, 'for I will go and confront him, and conquer the great Lion, the King of Beasts.' Then her husband laughed, and said, 'Intellect is power. We can die but once. Let us see what you can do.' Then the little Hare, taking her little son in her paws, jumped, and jumped, till she came to the Lion. Then she put down her son before his face, and put her two paws together in all humility, and said, 'Lo! King of kings, I have brought you a nuzzurana: oblige me by eating it. Also, I have some news to tell you.' Then the Lion looked at the Hare's child, and saw that it was soft and juicy, and was pleased in his soul, and laughed; and his laugh was as the roar of the thunder of Indro. Then he asked her news, and the little Hare replied, 'You are the Sovereign of the Forest, but another has come, who calls himself King of the Beasts, and demands tribute.' Then the roar of the Lion-shook the forest, and the little Hare nearly died with fear as he asked, 'Where is the scoundrel? Can you show him to me?'

Then the little Hare leaped along with the Lion, till she came to an old well. The well was nearly full, but had no wall round it, and she said, 'Look! he is hiding there in fear!' Then the Lion, craning his neck, looked in, and saw his own shadow in the water; and, with a fearful roar, leaped into the well. So the little Hare, with a glad heart, took up her son, and went to her husband, and said, 'Lo! Intellect is power: I have killed the Lion, the King of the Beasts!'

"My love, we cannot always keep the Lion away, in any rank of life; but we try, down at Sharstone, to train up little Hares, who know what well to put him into, and how to manage it."

It was about the time when the colonel lost a small fortune through the stable tricks of his sole acknowledged son, that the "dear bells" were at work again in the old church tower; and the Honourable and Rev. Ernest Montgomery was announced as married (at that time of day without the assistance of a second or third clergyman) to the Lady Maude, only surviving daughter of the late Earl Blance.

And the happy pair—(not less happy because arrived a little beyond the years generally thought the marriage time of life)—went away to try the united power of her tenderness and his discretion among the Norfolk villagers.

CHAPTER XXV.

MARKS AN ERA.

If there had been a peal of bells at Latson Towers, they would assuredly have been rung when Claude started for Eton; and all the household would have taken turns in the belfry.

Except two.

Those two were his father and old Ralph.

Save when a paroxysm was upon him, the colonel made an idol of his boy, so that Claude's life had passed in alternate abuses and embraces—as the life of many a child does, where the parent has no principle but only passion to govern with.

It went, therefore, to the sick man's heart, that, a little new squabble having occurred between them the night before, the lad actually started the next morning without a single "Good-bye."

Old Ralph came into his master's bedroom at his usual time, and found Latson already awake.

"Is that you, Ralph?"

"Yes, sir."

And Ralph spoke thickly, and with a slight catch of the breath.

"Tell Master Claude to come to me; he needn't wait till he's dressed. I want him directly."

There was a pause—a painful one to old Grange.

"Do ye hear, Ralph?"

"I'm sorry to say, sir," faltered the poor, faithful fellow, who had little reason enough for caring, though he did care sorely—

"I'm sorry to say, sir, that Master Claude has been gone an hour since, sir."

"Gone!" cried Latson, starting up: "how? gone! Why, how's this? who with?"

"He drove himself, sir, in the Whitechapel, and took Bunce with him. He's to meet a friend, he said, at Soreby, and they're going on from there together, somehow, sir."

And Latson fell back in one of his most dangerous fits of breathlessness.

To bring him round, which was a hard business, took Ralph's attention off from himself, or he would probably have been nearly as bad.

This was the worst cut the colonel had yet received, worse than the trick upon Mandrake, even had he known of that exploit, which he never did.

"And so, this is the manner," the wretched father moaned out to his old servant, "my only child leaves me, for months, for the first time. I deserve it, Ralph! yes, I deserve it!"

He deserved it more richly than he thought when he said it. For what business had he to speak of "only child?" He was repaid, as men so often are, in the right coin. He for years had been deserter of his own flesh and blood: by his own flesh and blood was he now deserted.

And there followed weeks of dangerous illness to the Honourable Hugh.

How Claude arrived at Eton, and what his first impressions were of place and people; how he went through the ordinary process (one of the greatest advantages that go towards balancing the evils of our public schools—the process) of finding his own level, and getting himself undeceived as to his being such a very great man; how he soon made out the difference between bullying a footman and speaking even a disrespectful word to a younger boy above him in college status; how he thrashed and often got thrashed; and how he soon became as thoroughly the pest of school, as he had been, from his birth, the pest of home—all this, if we told it fully, would be so very much like a hundred other examples, where spoiled boys have to be made over again, on turning out into life, that we decline the task of telling it.

And yet, do what they would, they never made this lad over again.

They made him afraid, some of them. They kept him in better order than he was in at first. But when from being a fag he got one, and all the younger fellows whom he could manage, had the worst of it, then his evil nature had full play.

He went by the name of "The Good Samaritan," in mockery of his extreme cruelty. For although boys, and boys at a great public school, may not often be perfect models of humanity, there was nothing that this particular boy would have been ashamed of, in the line of ingenious torture; whether with or without provocation, was an immaterial question.

Cowper, in one of his letters, says, that from the moment a boy enters one of our great schools, "he becomes a stranger in his father's house. The course of parental kindness is interrupted; the smiles of his mother, those tender admonitions, and the solicitous care of both his parents, are no longer before his eyes. Year after year he feels himself more detached from them, till at last 'he is so effectually weaned from the connection as to find himself happier anywhere than in their company.'"

Now, if that be a fair account of the tendency of some kinds of education on the well-disposed and the well-disciplined boy, what may be expected in the case of a youth who inherited such a disposition, and was condemned to such a guardianship as was Claude Latson?

One day there reached him, along with a letter from his father (to whom he never wrote but when he wanted money), another letter, directed in a strange, wandering-looking hand, evidently a female's, but quite a puzzle to him.

"Aha!" cried a senior groomsman, looking over his shoulder, as he was staring at the direction—

"Come here, Bristoe, here's a lark! John Howard's got a letter from a real woman! Suppose we look at it first, to see if it's proper for him to read it."

And so they all gathered round Latson, who hastened, in a burning rage, to pocket the epistle.

"Nonsense! you let him be," shouted Bristoe.

"It's from the young lady he saved from drowning—you remember, the week before last—giving him eternal thanks, and her hand to boot."

And they all roared and cried, "Bravo, Bristoe!"

"Three cheers for the Good Samaritan!"

For Latson had seen a little girl fall into the river some days back when he was driving along all by himself, and the man who plunged in and dragged the child out just in time, had told everybody how "The gentleman slashed up his horse and drove away, calling out to the child, 'Can't swim, little'un; can't swim—wish I could!'"

And he had not yet heard the last of this—for Latson was one of the best swimmers in the college.

Of course, they were only in joke about reading his letter; but they held him fast a long time while they chaffed him on the extraordinary circumstance, which really had never occurred to him before, of his receiving a letter in a female hand.

"Will bet ye two to one," said a fellow, "it'll come to nothing. I'll be a case of breach of promise. Poor thing! I pity her—don't you? That Spitfire's breaking her heart, I dare be sworn. I say, we ought, in the interests of humanity, to interfere. Give us the mere address, only the address, Samuny"—an abbreviation they sometimes used for "the Good Samaritan"—"we must write and give you a testimonial—verbum sat."

"No, no," says another; "you're all wrong together; you don't know anything about it: it's from his—"

But at this moment Claude sprang up, and turning round like lightning on the last speaker—who was much his junior, and a head shorter than himself—planted first one fist and then the other full upon his face with such force that the youth fell back among the little crowd of collegians,—but only for a moment, and then sprang up to return the compliment.

They formed a ring on the spot, both doffed coats and waistcoats, and a fearful combat followed.

But scarcely a combat, in the proper sense of the word.

The shorter boy, Fotheringay, a high-spirited, noble fellow, but who never could resist the temptation of a fling at Latson's meanness and cruelty,—Fotheringay fought according to the received rules of such encounters. Not so Claude. He fastened on his antagonist with the fury of a pole-cat, and taking his hair into his clutches, tore it out by handfuls, and then fell upon him with his teeth, and made them meet in the boy's cheek, till the blood spirted out over the spectators.

This was quite unnoticed for, and the work only of a moment. For instantly, they came to the rescue, and snatching Claude from his victim, whom he had perfectly mangled, prevented his moving hand or foot.

It was a fearful sight to see that mere lad, struggling in the grasp of full twenty strong fellows, and gnashing his teeth, his mouth all blood, with fiendish fury. His face was white as his collar, and his words were horrible to hear. Experienced Etonians put up their hands to their heads, and shut them out.

The party then, as if with one consent, almost stripped the young ruffian, and holding him amongst them, administered with a cane and a good lusty arm, a castigation of which, to his latest day, he bore the marks.

His footing at Eton had been bad enough before. From that hour it was one of ignominy and degradation, which any other mind than Claude's would have sunk under, and fled from.

But, respect and infamy were alike to the son, as they had been to the father.

CHAPTER XXVI.

A STRONG FAMILY LIKENESS.

THE letter which had occasioned young Latson this crowning triumph over any lingering sympathy or regard among his schoolfellows, read as follows:—

"Dear and respected young Master,—
"You will wonder at seeing this, as coming from me; and I little thought, when I went away from 'The Towers,' that it would ever come to this. If I hadn't nursed you, dear Master Claude, when you was a little baby, and if I hadn't closed your dear mamma's eyes, the sainted Lady Ethel, believe me, I never would have troubled you. But I thought that you would remember me, even if you couldn't do anything. I've sent a dutiful word to my old master, the colonel, two months ago, but have heard nothing from him, though I know he is at home. Dear Master Claude, I am now a beggar, without a friend, and without a sixpence in the world! After I left 'The Towers,' having saved a little money, as Mr. Grange could tell you, I went to live with a half sister in London; and we went on very comfortable till I was persuaded to put my little earnings into some horrid foreign mining concern. My sister's lawyer said it would be three times as much in two years. Every penny went! I never saw a farthing, and I never shall! My sister died, and her little pension, from her husband's service as a soldier, died with her. I then went out to work. I did work very, very hard, till I became set fast with rheumatism in the left hand, and nearly set fast in the right foot. Master Claude, your dear mamma's lady's-maid, and your old nurse, has been in the workhouse! Yes, for some weeks in the workhouse! But they wouldn't keep me because I hadn't got a settlement. They wanted to remove me to what they call my own parish, and I suppose they will and must, for I can do nothing now that I'm out of the house, and don't know a friend in the world to ask a sixpence of. I am now in a little dirty lodging, where I know you would be shocked to see me, if you could tell who it was. And oh! how I cry as I think of your dear mamma's kindness to me once when I was ill, and of how she used to say, in her last illness, 'You shall never want, Glyde. I'll ask your master to take care of you, Glyde, when I am gone!'

Dear Master Claude, I don't ask you for anything—far from it; but do you think you could do me the great favour of writing one line to the colonel, and telling him where I am, ask him if there's any prospect of getting back any of my earnings. He's a magistrate, and is sure to know. I shall not be long here now, I know. But I can't bear to be in debt. And then, if they take me away, I shall be buried such a long, long way from my poor father and mother, who lie in a churchyard in London. And, if you'll excuse me saying so, dear master, it's like your being carried off, when you are old and not long for this world, which God put off for many and many a year, far away from that precious, precious vault.

"And now, pray forgive this great liberty I've taken. If you can't write to the colonel, never mind; but don't think worse of your poor old nurse for asking. I remain,

Your dutiful and affectionate nurse,

ANN GLYDE.

"P.S.—They have just come in for the rent of my poor lodging; eighteen pence it's mounted to, and I've only five pence and a ha'penny in the wide world. God help me! God help me!"

We say this was the letter. But Claude didn't read it all at once; not he indeed. Directly he saw who it was from, and what was the strain of it, he stuffed it back into his pocket.

And when, many days after, he lighted on it again, and did read it through, with a very hard word he crumpled it up and put it in the fire.

"Here's a good story for your friend Latson, Fotheringay," said Bristoe, one morning, during that severe winter.

"Out with it," said the other.

And Bristoe read from a morning journal the following paragraph:—

"DISTRESSING CASE.—An inquest was held yesterday, at 'The Chough and Crow,' Seven Dials, on the body of a female, who had been found by a policeman in a most exhausted and destitute condition, the night before, lying within one of the narrow, arched passages in that neighbourhood. The poor creature, who was literally reduced to mere skin and bone, was alive when found, but had died an hour or two after. Her wretched linen, which was of the frailest and most miserable description, bore the initials 'A. G.' After the evidence of the policeman and the divisional surgeon, no other testimony being forthcoming, the jury returned the verdict, 'Found dead, from exposure and starvation.'"

CHAPTER XXVII.

DISSOLVES A SCENE.

"SPECIMENS of my hand-writing before receiving lessons of Mr. Lewis."

Here followed a performance very much like that of a spider just emerged from an ink-bottle, and drying himself on the paper.

"Specimens of my hand-writing after receiving lessons of Mr. Lewis."

Here followed a very extraordinary line of penmanship in large text, another in small text, and another in running hand; all excellent in their way.

This advertisement, if it did not move him to enlist under the particular master in question, set Hugh Church on the taking writing lessons in an evening, after working hours.

If half a dozen lessons were not enough, he took more, and he soon wrote so admirable a hand that Ruth's employers wondered where she had picked up such an accomplished amanuensis, when her accounts went in.

One of Hugh's greatest enjoyments was a bookstall that stood somewhere between number nineteen and "The Swan." He invariably left home early enough to get a good look at the books displayed in that establishment; or else ran his errands with extra quickness that he might spare a few moments at the wayfarer's library.

He had done this a long time; and his appearance, so neat, so honest-looking, and so earnest, disarmed all suspicion on the part of the proprietor, so that he made no complaint, as, looking through the spaces between the rows of volumes, he often detected Hugh deep in the study of the inside, as well as of the tickets outside, the books.

He wisely argued with himself, that, since out of such stuff as this, readers were sure to be made, he might find it, in the long run, as politic as it was kind, to let the boy read away.

On one occasion he stood there side by side with a middle-aged man, whom he had observed before, and who, he saw, had observed him.

The stranger was dressed, not negligently, but obviously to the very outside of his means. His linen was always clean, but his black was growing very brown, and the cuffs of his sleeves, as he turned over the books, were rather shiny and threadbare.

He always paid the most attention to the law-books, and always looked carefully to the title-page, to see the edition of a work, before he asked its price. It was well that the ink on his fingers was dry, or the commercial value of many a work on Real Property, or Common Law Practice, might have been reduced when he laid it down.

On this particular day Hugh and he both appeared more than usually to observe each other.

Hugh was busy with a book on the "Lives of Remarkable Persons."

The stranger was about to ask the price of a work on Conveyancing.

"Our's are the worst books for poor peckets to buy," said the stranger.

"Are they, indeed?" said Hugh.

"You buy a book to-day, and it's waste paper to-morrow."

"If you please, how is that?" Hugh asked.

"Because they're always altering the law."

"Oh, I see," Hugh said.

"Now, there's that thing you're looking at, the 'Lives of Remarkable Persons,' isn't it? Yes, well, the 'Lives of Remarkable Persons' this week will be the lives of the same remarkable persons next week, I suppose."

"I suppose they will," said Hugh.

"Most likely," rejoined the man; "but the Law of Real Property, or the Law of Copyhold, is one thing now, and, if parliament was sitting, might be another thing when I've the pleasure of seeing you again this evening—for I suppose I shall."

Hugh Church laughed, and said he hoped so.

"The consequence is," said the law-man, "that I may have to buy a dozen books, where you need only one. In fact, it may be said, that lawyers are the best friends of the trunk-maker and the buttermilk. They get libraries out of us, I can tell ye."

Hugh looked up, and smiled, then said—

"But I suppose the alterations are generally improvements?"

"Humph! that depends on who makes them. There are some law-makers whose alterations, I think, are anything but improvements. But, yes or no, they make it a sad business for married men with six children to be lawyers."

"Then," said Hugh, "I may take it for granted you're a lawyer. I thought so, very often," he said, timidly.

"No, not exactly a lawyer, but I have to help somebody who is. I'm a lawyer, my boy, with my brains, but not a lawyer here."

And the man slapped his pocket, and Hugh understood him.

These two often met after that, at the bookstall.

On another occasion, Hugh ventured to say—

"You don't know of anybody, sir, do you, who wants a lad to run errands, and help the servants?"

"Who is he?" said the lawyer's clerk.

"It's me," Hugh replied.

"If you had said 'It's I,' instead of saying 'It's me,' you would have helped me a little."

Hugh didn't understand him.

"I do know where a lad is wanted, but not to run errands."

"Can you write?"

"Yes, sir, pretty well, I think."

"Let's see you; I'm going in to buy this book. I haven't bought one for three weeks, and I must have one now and then, to keep our friend here in good humour. You shall make the bill out. But always say, 'It's I,' never 'It's me,' wants a situation, will you?"

"Thank you, sir, I'll remember; I haven't learnt much, at present."

And when the man saw how the poor boy was able to write out the bill, he made an appointment, which took Hugh next day to a little office in the city, and which led eventually to a notice being given at "The Swan" that Hugh Church would leave, if Mrs. Slike pleased, that day month.

"Well," said that worthy lady, who was now quite recovered, and who had hung no more pewter pots at Hugh's forehead, "I can't blame you, Hugh Church, for you've had a poor life of it here with us, and you've seen many things lads shouldn't see; and I don't know that we can help a good deal that goes on. But I don't like your going, Hugh Church, one bit, for all that."

And if you won't think, good reader, that we are imposing on you, we will venture to say, that Mrs. Slike brought up, just then, the corner of her apron, and first touched her left eye, and then blew her nose, or seemed to do it. She always blew her nose when she wiped her eye, not because the nose wept, but because the display of any emotion on her part, appeared to require a public apology, and the blowing furnished it.

In the course of an afternoon just before his time at the public-house expired, Mr. Slike came into the cellar where Hugh was busy with some of his rougher operations, and, laying his hand on Hugh's shoulder, said to him—

"What are you going to do to-night, Hugh?"

"If you please, sir, I'm going to the arithmetic class."

"Could you give it up for one night?"

"Yes, sir, if you've anything for me to do, or if misses has."

"Well, we did rather want you to do a little job for us here, Hugh, if you could."

"Shall I stay, sir, or come back in the evening?"

"Suppose you go home first and let 'em know, and come back about nine or half-past."

"Not before, sir?"

"No, I don't think we shall want you much before that."

And when Hugh came back at the time fixed, he found the girl in the kitchen, looking very important and mysterious, and wondered what it was they could want with him at that time of night.

Presently, he saw the said girl spread a clean white cloth, much whiter than usual, on the kitchen table, and place on it knives and forks for three or four people.

Soon after, there happened to drop in, the woman whom Hugh had seen during Mrs. Slike's illness, and she immediately proceeded to take off her bonnet and shawl, and lay them up in a corner of the dresser.

Then in came the pot-boy in his Sunday dress; and when she had put upon the table a dish of broiled steak, garnished with onions, a plate of potatoes, and a good piece of cheese, the girl slipped up stairs, and put on a clean cap and a clean apron, and came down again.

"Now, I think we're ready," she said.

"But what is it master wants me to do?" Hugh asked.

"He wants you to sit ye down, just there," said the nurse.

The boy stared, but did as he was told.

And there came in after the pot-boy another, an occasional man.

And down they all sat and made a most excellent supper, in capital spirits; but, one of them, at all events, considerably bewildered.

When supper was over the girl disappeared, and returned, following Mr. and Mrs. Slike.

Slike advanced to the table and said—

"We've had some people in this house we have been particular glad to get rid of; others we haven't cared whether they've stayed or gone; but we've one here to-night who's going away, and we're all—Mrs. Slike and me specially—sorry for it."

Here the lady of the house turned rather away from the company, and used the apron.

"It isn't much we can afford, Hugh Church; but if you'll be good enough to take this little thing here from us—I mean wife and self—it'll do to look at when you're in different places, and remember that you never gave anybody in the "The Swan" a moment's trouble, or never did anything but your duty while you was under our 'umble roof."

And he put a silver pencil-case into Hugh's hand, Hugh standing up to receive it—

But very soon sitting down again, and settled his forehead on his arm on the table.

And then they all shook hands with him, which was very hard for poor Hugh, who sat down as soon as he could, trying to say, through a very decided sobbing—

"I don't know what it's all for, I'm sure, but I'm very much—"

They knew he meant to say "obliged," but they couldn't hear it any more than he could say it, for there was a rush to coat-cuffs and aprons.

There was a similar scene over again when the story was told that night at number nineteen.

The slab in Soreby churchyard looked, no doubt, as hard and as still as ever on that same evening.

But that supper had roused in the poor foundling new resolves and loftier purposes, and so made him stronger for coming struggles, and a firmer friend than ever to his humble duty.

Is it wrong to think that, overlooking the poor farewell supper, and the tears of her boy—as they did him honour—there was one who came to see whether the angel still cared for the lad she had left under the bush, and who went away satisfied?

(To be continued.)

WITHERED FLOWERS.

TREASURED relics! leaves and flowers—
Tokens of life's happy hours;
Myrtle blossoms, rosebuds fair,
Twined with wreaths for sunny hair;
Sweet bouquets, of every grade,
Gathered from Love's rural shade;
Though ye now are faded, dead,
With your sweetest perfume fled,
Breathe ye still of hearts that lie
Where the sere leaf nestles by;
Haunt ye memory's hallowed dream
With a consecrated theme!

Holy treasures of the past,
Scenes too beautiful to last,
Softly thrilling tones of song,
Borne by summer's breath along,
Soul-lit eyes of melting hue,
That from heaven their lustre drew,
Fair white hands, and locks of gold,
That an angel's beauty told,
Moonlit walks, and aspen bowers,
These ye tell of, withered flowers!

But there comes a whisper low,
Gentle as the streamlet's flow,
From each dry and dewless leaf,
Hushing every sigh of grief,
Breathing of that garden fair,
Where affection's flowers, rare,
Spring into perennial bloom,
Far beyond the blighting tomb:
Voices from the "better land,"
Loved of many a household band,
Linger round these rustling leaves,
In the song the south wind weaves!
Though ye tell of bright hopes riven,
Point ye to a glorious heaven.

Chemical Experiments.

VERY PECULIAR SPIDERS WHICH EXPLODE WHEN TOUCHED.

I BELIEVE few living things have less compassion shown them by mankind than spiders, creatures which unlearned people term ugly insects, but which learned people tell us are no insects at all. Ninety-nine persons out of a hundred, I think, on perceiving a spider on the ground before them would step on the spider, or get somebody else to step upon it; on which presumption the success of the following experiment depends. There are certain explosive compounds known to chemists, which explode on the merest touch, and which therefore for the most part are dangerous. The one I am about to mention is, perhaps, the most explosive of any known, and is, I believe, at the same time the most innocent. I never knew or heard of any accident resulting from the use of it; certainly the reader of this need not fear any accident if he does exactly as I shall describe to him. Firstly, You must cut some pieces of cork into the shape of spiders, hollowing them out underneath so as to hold each an explosive charge of materials that I shall presently describe. Dipping each spider, when properly carved, into the inkstand, a very passable spider-colour will result; and now you have only to stick into the cork body the necessary complement of artificial legs, in the shape of black bristles, cut, if you like, from some friendly brush, or some filaments of whalebone, and the resulting animal will pass muster very well for an artificial spider, considering that the creature is not one which people are in the habit of examining very minutely. It now remains to charge the spider, and I shall give the necessary directions for preparing the material wherewith to charge him. It is called the iodide of nitrogen. It cannot be purchased: you must make it. It cannot be handled when once made and dried. Even the act of falling upon a surface of water explodes it. The iodide of nitrogen is without exception the most explosive body that I know of. It almost goes off if you look at it, that is to say when dry. When moist, as it is when first prepared, you may handle it as much as you please.

To make the iodide of nitrogen.—For every dozen spiders, when prepared as described, take about nine grains of iodine. You can procure iodine at the chemists'; it is one of the simple or uncompounded bodies known to chemists. In other words, no one hitherto has been able to prove that it is made up of two or more elements. Iodine is a black, shining, metallic-looking body, almost crystalline in appearance, and much in general aspect resembling black lead. It has a strong smell, and, when heated, evolves violet-coloured vapours, from the colour of which the distinctive name iodine is derived. Take care not to permit any of these vapours to get into the eyes or nose, or even the mouth, for they are very irritating.

Although we shall presently employ iodine for generating an extremely explosive compound, nevertheless iodine in itself is not at all explosive. It rapidly destroys animal and vegetable substances when brought into contact with them, also certain metallic substances; for example, iron. When purchased, it will have to be preserved in a glass-stoppered bottle—a corked bottle will not answer. Even though the iodine should not touch the cork, the bottle would be destroyed on account of the vapour which arises.

Well, for every dozen spiders, I say, take nine grains of iodine, or thereabout; as much as can be heaped upon a fourpenny piece will be about the thing. Do not touch the iodine, even for one moment, with a piece of iron: a piece of split quill, or, better, a splinter of glass pane, are perhaps about the best things you will have at command.

The quantity of iodine being taken, put it into a cup or a wine glass, and pour upon it about a table-spoonful of the strongest hartshorn, or more, if the hartshorn be weak. Stir the whole together with your quill or glass spatula; then let it stand for, say, half an hour. By this treatment, the iodine will lose its brilliant aspect. It will more resemble brown earth—in point of fact, it will no longer be iodine, but that element combined with another element called nitrogen, obtained from the hartshorn (ammonia), which is a compound of iodine and nitrogen. The black earthy body we must now treat with fitting respect, for it is the explosive body to the preparation of which our labours have been directed. Removing a little from the fluid in which it is contained, you would not think it explosive in any degree. It may be touched with a piece of hot iron, and that treatment will merely cause it to rise into vapour, without explosion; more strange yet, if this curious body be artificially dried, and the dried result beaten, it can seldom be got to explode. But, if the earthy looking material be allowed to dry of its own accord, and then touched—though the touch be only that of falling upon the surface of water—it never fails to explode.

To charge the spiders is a very easy matter. By means of the split quill, or glass spatula, the cavity previously dug out in the body of each spider is to be filled with the still wet and pasty iodide of nitrogen, which being done, the explosive creature is to be placed in the position where it is intended to create the final surprise. If desired, you can, by means of a little gum-water, stick such a spider by the legs upright against a wall. In about half an hour, or still less if the weather be hot and dry, the liquid portion of the explosive material will have evaporated away, and the spider will be ready to explode when touched in the very slightest degree.

Though spiders have been mentioned in the foregoing description, yet I need scarcely say that crickets, cockchafers, and any small creatures you please, may be cut out of cork, and made explosive by the iodide of nitrogen. A spider, however, is quite large enough, as the reader will say when he has tried the experiment.

Need I say that such iodide of nitrogen as may have been prepared and not used must be thrown away, and the glass or cup in which the manufacture was conducted, must be washed out with water until every fragment of the substance has been removed.

Iodide of nitrogen is not dangerous, except when made in large proportions. Certainly the whole product of nine grains of iodine might be exploded by contact with the fingers, and the result be no more serious than the skin stained red, and the fingers a little stunned by a sharp blow; nevertheless, this sort of accident had better be avoided. Take care, however, that no vapour, which arises at the time of explosion, gets into the eyes, which it cannot do if you keep it at arm's length, as you always should do in manipulating explosive bodies, however innocent of their kind. A word of final advice. The compound just treated of is the iodide of nitrogen. There is also the chloride of nitrogen, an oily-looking body—difficult to manipulate, and awfully dangerous. Let no consideration on earth ever tempt you to make the chloride of nitrogen, even if you can lay your hands on the process. The reader, now picking up a stray fact of science in the midst of scientific amusement, may have his attention drawn to the striking fact that nearly every explosive compound known to chemists contains nitrogen. Such is the remarkable generalisation; what it may count for when interpreted we know not, but the fact is so.

VIEW OF CAWNPORE

CAWNPORE.

WHAT a wonderful revulsion of feeling the publication of a few words will bring about, not only in the minds of individuals, but of a whole nation. What a thrill of delight quivered through every English heart, when the iron messenger, into whose service the power of the lightning has been pressed, announced that the gallant relievers of Lucknow had in their turn been relieved, that the brave Commander-in-Chief, cutting his way through the fire, had put an end to the sufferings of the heroic garrison, and sent away the children and the women, the sick and the wounded, to Cawnpore. A fearful interest will henceforth attach to those cities, whose very names were unknown to the great majority of Englishmen only a few months ago, and harrowing recollections will be associated in many a home with the name of the little city on the Ganges—Cawnpore.

The city of Cawnpore—spelt also Caunpoor—is the capital of a district of the same name in the upper provinces of Bengal, and in the immediate vicinity of the late kingdom of Oude. Those who wish to find it in their maps will see it marked in long. 80° 13' East, and lat. 26° 30' North. It has for some time been important as a military station, and may, in fact, be defined as an essentially English town; a few handsome mosques alone vindicating its architectural character as an Eastern city. The theatre is in the Roman Doric style; the assembly rooms, military hospital, and gaol are English, and so likewise are the Custom-house and protestant church. Trade and manufactures have long flourished at Cawnpore; the saddles and bridles produced there hold a prominent position in the Indian market. Large and commodious shops abound in the city, and many of the warehouses are bright with jewellery, and baubles of gold and silver. One feature of Cawnpore still must not be passed without mention, for it is eminently characteristic of the military town in India. A commodious race-course enables the officers to indulge in that exciting amusement for which the English have obtained such a reputation—a fame our neighbours across the Channel have vainly tried to emulate. The officers' bungalows, straggling for miles along the river-side, are picturesque in appearance, and are generally surrounded by trim gardens; and the prospect from the Ganges is one of beauty and fertility.

But how different are the recollections associated with Cawnpore and Futtehpore, from the thoughts their natural scenery is in itself calculated to inspire. It was not in vain that the good Bishop Heber wrote of the climes—

“Where ev’ry prospect pleases,
And only man is vile!”

The darkness of heathenism broods over the sunlit plains. The mighty Ganges itself, the glorious stream that spreads fertility through so many miles of country, is used as an instrument of superstition by the benighted natives. The dying sufferer is deposited on the banks, and corpses are frequently seen floating down with its tide. The demon of superstition, with its natural companion, cruelty, still stalks almost unchecked through the fertile plains that border the Ganges. One thought continually rises in the traveller's mind as he glides along on the bosom of that mighty river—it is: What a magnificent stream is this; and through what a noble country would it roll if the inhabitants were only Christians!

CHILD-ACTORS.

THE very thought of such makes me sigh; and the cleverer they are at their parts, the more it distresses me. To see little boys, who should be deep in the mysteries of humming-tops and marbles, strutting their little limbs upon the stage in grown-up attire; pulling up their precocious shirt-collars, and talking about “us men;” uttering threadbare, vulgar, broad witticisms upon “the women;”—what a horrible perversion of childhood—what a hot-house forcing of nature! And the little girls, aping the disgusting, bedizened, heartless woman of fashion; of whose existence it were time enough they should know, when they make their début in the character of matron. Then the trading off these little girls by coarse speculators; the market value of bright eyes—rosy cheeks—polished shoulders, and slender ankles; oh, who that has been a parent can witness an exhibition of child-actors, and not find his or her thoughts straying from the performance, and piercing those children's probable future?—thinking of the irreparable physical wrong done them by late hours; excitement, intense brain stimulation, when their heads should be quietly resting on the dreamless pillow of childhood. Oh, it is a pitiful sight.

Perhaps you reply to me—but they are poor, and they make money by it. Is money to be weighed in the balance with a premature decay of the bodily and mental powers? Can you render those little girls an equivalent for the delicate bloom of childish innocence which your coarse touch has brushed away? Can you repay them for thus rudely stripping off the infolding leaf, which incloses so much beauty?

Infant prodigies of all kinds, I regard with pitying horror; from the bird, whose eyes are put out to make its song more marvellous, to the big-headed, narrow-chested boy, whose ambitious parents are spurring him on to the undertaker. I see in their perspective only an idiotic middle age, or an early grave. Everything in the natural world rebukes this un wisdom—everything but childhood bides its time to expand in blessed healthful unconsciousness; then we see the perfect fruit—the perfect blossom. How much more necessary is this to the susceptible organisation of childhood; why plant it in the noisy highway, to be handled, and jostled, and gazed at, and trampled under foot? Why not spread the broad leaf of sheltering love over the little bud in some quiet corner, till by its own sweetness it shall unconsciously announce to an admiring world its perfected existence?

The children's Sol-fa festival at the Crystal Palace exhibited an immense amount of musical talent on the part of the youthful performers, and we listened to their voices with pleasure. Singing is just one of those things in which children delight, and is entirely free from any injurious influence. But they must sing naturally and heartily as those children sang, not as little opera singers on a stage.

I remember well, some years since, seeing a little violinist step before the midnight foot-lights, with her stiff silken robe and jewelled arms, to amuse an audience who, had they hearts, would have wept to see the pallid, prematurely-old face, the shrunken limbs, and listless air of this wreck of juvenile precocity. Her sprightliest air was like a funeral march to my pained ear. I could scarcely see her for the tears that came between. Oh, I would have taken the cumbrous wreath from that little forehead—the stiff dress from those angular limbs, and drawing over them the loose, white night-robe in which childhood looks so lovely, bade her say her little prayer—then kissed her weary lids to slumber.

An actor's life is weary enough—dangerous enough—when nature has pronounced such men and women. I know that there are noble examples of those who have, self-sustained, passed through the fire unscathed; but, for His sake who blessed little children, toss them not down in their sweet helplessness before the immolating Juggernaut!

The Matron.

NO. III.

OUR recent remarks on the cutting out of children's clothes, were more especially addressed to the female portion of our readers. And we felt it necessary to appeal to the forbearance of husbands and fathers in behalf of articles which were only indirectly interesting and important to them.

Our present subject is one in which the lords of the creation, of all ranks, take a lively personal interest. It is, therefore, one to which all women should devote their attention. In some cases, the talent of planning will suffice; in others, that of actually dressing good, tempting, wholesome, and economical dinners will be required.

It is generally allowed that the "leading question" of the day among the middle classes is, "What shall we have for dinner?" while the working man's first query is, "What have you got me for dinner?"

Among the very wealthy (the aristocrats of the purse or the peerage) the question is rather, "What shall we not have?"—since every delicacy, in and out of season, is at the command of the great, apparently supplied "regardless of expense." But those behind the scenes know that a wise economy is much more rigidly enforced by the millionaire than by "the million." Articles that are thrown away as useless in the little kitchen of a cottage in the country, or four-roomed house in a town, are saved and made available in large, noble, and wealthy households.

I, being, as you all know, an elderly matron, and not ashamed of my years or my gray hairs, can remember a remark made to me by the head cook of Napoleon I.; namely, that during the whole time he had the honour of presiding over the imperial kitchens, he never allowed even a fish bone or a chicken's foot to be thrown away. From fish bones, well cleaned and thoroughly boiled, this good head cook and cook with a good head made excellent gelatine, while the feet of all kinds of game and poultry yielded a delicate and most nutritious jelly. Alas! in how few humble homes is such economy practised.

My own experience compels me to acknowledge that the very poor are generally the least economical; and I have often remarked, that the greater the want, the greater the waste, in spite of that motto, which ought to be engraved on every kitchen dresser, whether in castle or cottage, WASTE NOT, WANT NOT.

A French maximist remarked, that the direct way to the heart was through the stomach (of course, via the palate and the eye), for nothing is tempting, however really nourishing and wholesome, that does not look nice, and taste good. The French maximist hit the mark; even English husbands (and we challenge the world to beat them) love a wife all the better, if a nice little dinner, neatly and punctually served, shows that, while they have been busy abroad, she has not been idle at home.

Cold mutton damps the most ardent affection; and if women would keep their husbands, sons, and brothers at home, and not drive them to destruction and public-houses, they must make that home, however humble, pleasant and comfortable. The cloth may be coarse, but it must be clean; the plates may be common delft or willow pattern, but they must be bright with cleanliness; the fare may be very simple, very frugal, but it must be nicely cooked and neatly dished—suited to those individual tastes which the sweet officiousness of woman's love is so prompt to discover. Above all, even if "a dinner of herbs," it must be that "dinner of herbs" where "love is."

And where love is, there will be his evidences in the sweet smile, the joyful welcome, the neat and becoming attire (neat and becoming, however plain and cheap).

There will be peace, comfort, sympathy, and a nice little hot dinner (no dearer, friends, than a cold and slovenly one) for the tired, chilled, and hungry man.

I remember a poor fellow, a labourer in London, who had lost his wife, said to me, after that long egotistical descent on his own virtues, so common with the very poor, "Well, I was a stunning good husband to her; but she deserved it, which I never come home for ten year, but I found the hearth swept, the kettle boiling, and summut hot and relishing, as she know'd I liked; and so I always respected her living, likewise dead." In her own station and degree, let every woman take pattern by that brick-layer's wife.

We will give a few directions presently for good, plain, cheap dishes; but first of all some general remarks, the result of observation and experience, will not be useless.

Pay ready money as much as possible. Ready money customers are always first served, and best served.

Light weight and heavy interest generally accompany long credit.

Full weight and pleasing discount greet the ready money customer.

Go to market as early as you can.

What is best is generally taken first. If you are late, you must put up with the refuse.

Think more of what your husband will like, than of what you like yourself. Your chief pleasure should arise from his appreciation and enjoyment of his meals, and his praise of your skill and judgment.

However simple what you buy, try to get it fresh and good of its kind.

A herring perfectly fresh and in season, is better than turbot that has the slightest taint.

Never keep tea or coffee in paper, nor let soap or dips lie side by side with butter.

Be punctual to a minute; by being punctual you will make your husband so. And vegetables (which form so great a portion of the cookery of the million) are spoiled if not eaten as soon as done, potatoes especially. Clean salt and a cruet-stand well filled help to make a dinner tempting.

I have already advised those who wish to get their money's worth to go to market early. It is a good plan to have in provisions the day before they are wanted, excepting in very hot weather. For, of this be convinced, that much forethought is necessary to insure punctuality, and not even the merit of the dinner will make amends to your husband for having been kept waiting for it.

And now I should like to ask you in what cooking consists? In its most limited sense, cooking is merely boiling. The word comes from the German kochen, and, in fact, on the proper method of applying food to the action of fire all success in cookery depends. This remark applies to the rich man's venison and the poor man's bit of bacon. Those who know nothing of cooking fancy that the fiercer the fire, the better will the meat be dressed. Now, I can tell you that just the contrary is the case. To get as much good as possible out of meat, it should be roasted, fried, or boiled very gently and very gradually.

Soyer (making a lady speak for him) has an amusing little anecdote on this subject. It relates to the boiling of an ox-cheek. He says: "On one occasion I asked an old lady how she cooked it. 'Sure enough,' said she, 'by fire.' 'But, my dear woman,' I inquired, 'how long do you cook it?' 'Ah, sir,' she replied, 'sometimes as long as an hour, and boiling like anything all the time, till the water will not stand it any longer.' 'And pray,' I asked, 'what do you do with the water?' 'Faith, there is no water left; but only muck at the bottom of the pot, which I throw away,' was her reply."

On finding the old dame so ignorant, Soyer asked her if he should come and teach her how to cook her ox-cheek. Probably supposing she would not have her teaching for nothing, she answered, that she'd no money to throw away, nor enough even to buy another cheek. The indefatigable reformer in the noble (because useful) art of cooking offered to give her an ox-cheek as a present. He also gave her sixpence to buy some sand to clean her iron pot. By the way, you will have many directions from me about cleaning your pots, be they of iron or potter's clay. Not Soyer himself could cook well in dirty, neglected pots or pans. But to return to the old dame. When next Soyer saw her, he found she had purchased two-pennyworth of coals out of his present of the sixpence. She had better have spent the whole remaining fourpence in the fuel, as you will soon perceive. In the meantime Soyer produced the ox-cheek, and put it into the pot, with four quarts of cold water, and four tea-spoonfuls of salt, and some leaves of celery, which had been given the old lady by a neighbouring greengrocer. Her fire was made up, and the pot was placed on it, until boiling, and then removed to the side of it, and skimmed. There Soyer left it, and went round to pay his other visits. At the end of three hours he returned to our old friend, whom he found in possession of a large basin. He put some crusts of bread into it, and the meat he placed on a dish, and sat down with the old dame, serving the soup out into cups with a beer jug (having nothing better for the purpose). To the surprise of his pupil, the cheek was so tender that Soyer cut it easily with a very bad knife. After tasting it, and finding it very good, she said she would show her neighbours how to do it. When her instructor was about to depart, the old dame exclaimed, "Lor! you would not go without taking a drop of the 'crature.'" She then took a small bottle out of her pocket, and offered it to Soyer, who, from the love of investigation, was induced to taste the contents, which he soon found to be blue ruin, alias a mixture of vitriol and other poisons. Thus could he easily account for the old dame's ignorance and abject poverty. She was a gin-drinker.

But many that are perfectly sober are lamentably ignorant about the art of cooking, and making the most of their food. To them this anecdote of Soyer and the old dame may impart instruction, if they are willing to receive it. An ox-cheek may be purchased for a few pence, and cooked in the manner just described. It is even more nutritious than many of the expensive parts of the animal.

And now for mutton—not the haunch, the leg, or the shoulder—but the neck of mutton. I undertake to show how the mother of a family can, with very trifling additions, make three good dinners out of a neck of mutton, for which she ought not to give more than sixpence a pound when meat is at an average price. We recommend our housewife to have the neck of mutton—weighing probably six pounds—divided into three parts by the butcher. When her fire and cooking utensils are ready, we advise her to take the best end (viz., the thickest) first, and to put it to roast, at a very respectful distance from the fire, approaching it gradually until it is thoroughly done. Beneath the mutton let a pan—with a division in the middle—be placed. One compartment of this pan should contain a pudding, made in the following manner:—Mix half a pound of flour with half a pint of milk and water. When these are thoroughly blended, add an egg well beaten up. Baked under the meat and enriched by the dripping, this will, in about an hour's time, become an excellent Yorkshire pudding. This, with the roast mutton and potatoes, will make a capital dinner.

Now, the method of cooking potatoes is so important, that I cannot discuss it at the end of a chapter, but reserve it for our next number. I now proceed to the second dinner. Let this be furnished from the middle piece of the neck, and made into a pie. My readers must recollect that I advised a division in the pan under the roasting meat. We imagine the pudding eaten and approved, but the pan held something besides the pudding, by the time the meat had had its hour's roasting. The originally empty compartment will have received enough dripping to make, with a pound of flour, an excellent light crust for the pie. For making this pie, I must advise you to remember the seasoning, and also line the sides of the dish with crust. Water must be poured over the meat, and this put in small chops into the pie-dish. Sliced onions, pepper and salt, must be added, and by degrees the water changes into an excellent gravy.

The third dinner is composed of the scrag end. And to vary the dinner, as we¹ as to get plenty of nourishment out of it, let this be made into soup, in the following manner:—Put the meat into a large sized pot, with two quarts and a half of water; place it in the first instance at a distance from the fire, and add to the water a quarter of a pound of rice, salt, pepper, an onion sliced, and a table-spoonful of moist sugar, to give richness to the flavour of the soup. Let this simmer slowly for two hours, watching and stirring it carefully, and the result will be, some capital soup, and nice, tender, boiled mutton. Never omit having a dish of potatoes, as they contain great nourishment, in proportion to their weight.

BE GENTLE.—Be ever gentle with the children God has given you; watch over them constantly; reprove them earnestly, but not in anger. In the forcible language of the Scripture, "Be not bitter against them." "Yes, they are good boys," I once heard a kind father say; "I talk to them very much, but do not like to beat my children—the world will beat them." It was a beautiful thought, though not elegantly expressed. Yes, there is not one child in the circle round the table, healthful and happy as they look now, on whose head, if long enough spared, the storm will not beat. Adversity may wither them, sickness may fade, a cold world may frown on them, but amid all let memory carry them back to a home where the law of kindness reigned, where the mother's reproving eye was moistened with a tear, and the father frowned "more in sorrow than in anger."

Small Change.

It was a maxim of General Jackson's, "Take time to deliberate; but when the hour for action arrives, stop thinking, and go in."

"WHAT is the best attitude for self-defence?" asked a pupil of a well-known pugilist. "Keep a civil tongue in your head," was the reply.

A LADY complaining that her husband was dead to fashionable amusements, he replied, "But then, my dear, you make me alive to the expense."

True modesty is a discerning grace,
And only blushes in the proper place;
But counterfeit is blind, and skulks through fear,
Where 'tis a shame to be ashamed to appear.—Cowper.

To be tolerant is to be wise enough to have no difference with those we differ from. The mutual rancour of conflicting sects is often in the inverse ratio of their distance from each other: no one hating a Jew or a Pagan half so much as a fellow Christian who agrees with him in all but one unimportant point.

A FRIEND, phoeing phunnily phigurative, phurnishes the phollowing:—4ty 4tunate 4esters 4tuitously 4tifying 4 4lorn 4tresses 4cibly 4bade 4ty 4midable 4eigners 4ning 4aging 4ces.

A SLIGHT MISTAKE.—Two Irishmen were recently looking at people stretching a rope across the street from one house to the other, for the purpose of suspending a banner. Pat.—"Shure and what will they be after a doing at the tops of them houses there?" Mich.—"Faith an' it's a submarine telegraph there after putting up, I suppose."

AN ATTACHMENT.—A very amiable and modest widow lady lived in a certain county. Soon after her husband had paid the debt of nature, leaving her his legatee, a claim was brought against the estate by his brother, and a process was served upon her by the sheriff of the county, who happened to be a widower of middle age. She was much alarmed, and meeting with a female friend, she exclaimed, with agitation, "What do you think? the sheriff has been after me!" "Well," said the considerate lady, with perfect coolness, "he is a very fine man." "But he says he has an attachment for me," replied the widow. "Well, I have long suspected that he was attached to you, my dear." "But you don't understand—he says I must go to court." "O! that's quite another affair, my child; don't you go so far as that—it is his place to come and court you."

"Mr friend," said a philanthropic gentleman to a chap whose wandering, unsteady gait betrayed "ardent" familiarity with the "spirits," "I thought you were a Son of Temperance." "Mistake," hiccupped Toodles, steadying himself for the reply. "No (hic) relation—not a bit—not even (hic) acquainted."

NIGHT running is ruinous to the morals of boys. They acquire under the cover of night an unhealthy state of mind, bad, vulgar, and profane language, a lawless and riotous bearing. Indeed, it is in the street after nightfall that boys principally acquire the education of the bad, and capacity for becoming dissolute men.

WHAT IS A LETTER?—A poet answers the question thus:—

What is a letter? Let affection tell.
A tongue that speaks for those who absent dwell,
A silent language uttered to the eye,
Which envious distance would in vain deny;
A link to bind where circumstances part,
A nerve of feeling stretched from heart to heart,
Formed to convey, like an electric chain,
The mystic flash—the lightning of the brain—
And thrill at once, through its remotest link,
The throb of passion by a drop of ink.

"I SAY, Sambo, does you know what makes de corn grow so fast when you put de manure on it?" "No, I don't know 'cept it makes de ground strong for the corn." "No, I just tell you: when de corn begins to smell de manure, it don't like de fumery, so it hurries out of de ground, and gets up as high as possible, so it can't breathe bad air."

TRIFLES may be not only tolerated but admired when we respect the trifle. Little things are valued when coming from him who can do great things. A distinguished French author maintains that morality in trifles is always the enemy of morality in things of importance; but it is precisely in trivial affairs that a delicate sense of honour and rectitude is most certainly exhibited;—as we throw up a feather and not a stone to ascertain the direction of the wind.

SMALL wits are generally great talkers, uttering whatever comes uppermost; and everything being superficial, their shallowness makes them noisy, and their confidence offensive. The smaller the calibre of the mind, the greater the bore of a perpetually open mouth. Human heads are like hogsheads—the emptier they are, the louder report they give of themselves. The clack of their word-mill is heard even when there is no wind to set it going, and no grist to come from it. "I talk a good deal, but I talk well," said an impudent fellow. "Half of that is true," replied a gentleman.

LIFE is made up, not of great sacrifices or duties, but of little things, in which smiles and kindness, and small obligations given habitually, are what win and preserve the heart, and secure comfort.

THOROUGHGOING.—"Bill," said one radical to another, recently, "I's a National Reformer, I is." "Vy, is that our party?" "Vy, yes, hossy, it is that. If you puts in a vote for that party, you votes yourself a farm." "Vell, I don't go that without they'll go a little further. I wants a farm, and somebody to work it besides."

QUICK WRITING MAY BE SLOW READING.—A gentleman, more famous for quickness than for depth in literary matters, was boasting of the quickness with which he could write verses. "It takes some people," said he, "half an hour to make a couplet; but I write a forty-line poem in twenty minutes, and make nothing of it."

TRIED AND FOUND WANTING.—A fast Irishman, in a time of revival, joined the church, but was found sinning grievously, not long afterward. "Didn't you join the Methodists?" inquired a piously disposed person. "Faix an' I did—I joined for six months, and behaved so well they let me off with three."

MANY a truth is like a wolf which we hold by the ears—afraid to let it escape, yet scarcely able to retain it. And why should we let it go, if, without doing any good, it be likely to worry or annoy our neighbour? To promulgate truth with a malicious intention is worse than to violate it with a benevolent one.

I.—THE CHARADE.

When I lived in Leicestershire, some time ago—
(What has that to do with you? Wait, and you'll know)—
I never knew a school-boy in the country round,
Who did not know precisely where a nut might be found;
And if he chanced to find one, as he might full well,
Of course he couldn't eat it, as it lay in the shell.
So he popped it in his mouth, and I've no doubt, you see,
That the crackers were his teeth, when the nut ate he.

Answer to Arithmetical Question in No. 3, page 47.

No. gals. brought down by 1st spring per day =	$\frac{1000}{15}$	=	66 $\frac{2}{3}$
" " " 2nd " "	$\frac{1000}{20}$	=	50
" " " 3rd " "	$\frac{1000}{30}$	=	33 $\frac{1}{3}$

∴ Total No. gals. supplied per day = 150.
No. gals. consumed per day = $102 \times 1\frac{1}{2}$ = 153.
∴ Consumption exceeds supply by 3 gals. per day.
No. days in exhausting reservoir = $\frac{1000}{3} = 333\frac{1}{3}$ days.

Our Editorial Table.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—The back numbers of "Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper"—new series—are now on sale at one penny each; and these aforesaid back numbers of the new series, each containing sixteen pages demy quarto, will continue at this price until further notice.

* * * EVERY person should possess an almanack for the year. "Cassell's Illustrated Family Almanack," which is published at sixpence, is an annual encyclopedia of useful and instructive information. Fifty-three thousand copies of the almanack for 1858 have already been issued from the press. As the last edition for this year is now being delivered, immediate orders should be given.

A YOUNG STUDENT.—You cannot do better than procure "The Educational Course." It is a work exceedingly well adapted to assist you in your studies. The first volume, selling for 3s. 6d., and entitled "Science Popularly Explained," is really invaluable. The other five volumes of "The Course" comprise separate treatises on "The English Language," "Astronomy," "Outlines of Botany," "Mathematical Science," and "Political Economy." The whole six volumes, in cloth boards, sell for 15s. 6d. "The Course" is also issued in a weekly form of publication, in 14d. numbers, and monthly parts, 7d. or 8½d. each.

GAULTIER.—First ascertain that your addresses will not be disagreeable to the lady, and then, with her permission, apply to her father; but as you value honour, happiness, and reputation, avoid a clandestine engagement, or even courtship. If you desire to marry the girl, seek her openly; if not, let her alone.

AN ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—You do not say whether the ball is a public or private one. If the former, you enter the room without any other ceremony than you would use on entering a theatre, lecture, or concert room. If the latter, you seek the lady of the house, and pay your respects to her before mingling with the guests. Gentlemen usually lead their partners about the room for a few minutes after the dance in which they have been engaged is ended, and then resign them to their chaperons.

SUSAN G.—The question relative to rings has been answered so often that we are compelled to refer our correspondent to the back numbers of this Paper.

HARRY J. W. is referred to our answer to "Gaultier." We do not think we can give him better advice. We prefer the word "telegram," and use it.

ALONZO THE BRAVE.—We do not admire mustaches on ladies' lips, but that is no reason why you should not. "Many men, many minds," and we might rhapsodise over a face which to you might be ugliness itself. As to suggesting the "most tenderest" terms in which a gentleman can convey to his beloved the "delicate question" upon which his whole future bliss depends, we fear that if the circumstances, the loveliness of the damsel's features, the interests at stake, do not inspire him, all our tuition will fail to do so.

SCARLOT.—The lock of hair inclosed for our inspection is, we grieve to say it, decidedly red. No mother in the world, however doting, could call it auburn. A lead comb is frequently and successfully used to darken the hue of tresses which happen to be more brilliant than pleasing.

ROSALINE BLANCHE.—Most earnestly do we wish that we could aid your laudable endeavour to assist your parents by earning your own livelihood, but unfortunately there are so few situations compared with the number of applicants, that we are unable to do so. In all friendliness, however, we would advise you, before taking pupils, to devote some time to earnest study. Your spelling is far from correct.

TENANT.—The lord of a waste, over which there is a right of common, may make rabbits burrow thereon, and the commoner cannot kill the rabbits, though they become so numerous as to prejudice his right of common. His only remedy is to bring an action against the lord for surcharging; and this we should advise you to do, unless you can come to some satisfactory arrangement.

CAPTAIN SASH.—You have no right to engage a lady's affections unless you see some reasonable hope of being able to marry her. Nothing is more unmanly, selfish, and contemptible than perpetually hovering round and paying attentions to a girl, winning her regard, and isolating her from others, when there is no near and rational prospect of marriage with yourself.

LOVE-LUCK UNCERTAIN.—Do you particularly wish to see the end of it?

CUIRASS.—We think your friend must belong to the marines, who are a body of men serving as soldiers on board ships of war, or on shore in the event of coast battles. They are also sometimes called upon to assist in the operations connected with the working of the ships in which they may be sailing, but cannot be sent aloft by a naval officer. The marines have one advantage over the other service—Commissions cannot be obtained by purchase; the officers rise by seniority, but no higher than to the rank of Colonels Commandant. From this information you may probably be able to decide whether your friend is a member of this body, whom Jack so irreverently calls "neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring."

MARY.—We pity you sincerely; few things are more unpleasant than the vicinity of a "snorer." There is an excellent paper on the subject in the December number of a clever little periodical called "The Ladies' Treasury," published by Ward and Lock, which suggests a means of cure, to which we beg to refer "Mary."

MAYBUD.—Men born of English parents are English, no matter where they first see the light. We do not profess to judge character from handwriting.

F. B. D.—If the lady-whom we consider to have been very ill-used—will pardon, and once more receive your attentions, we advise you by all means to offer them.

ANNIE.—There are so many good games for the amusement of a rational circle of young people when weary (?) of dancing (forty years ago, in our young days, we should have thought that providing against such a contingency was about as useless a work of supererogation as could well be imagined), that we really know not which to select. Have you ever tried Canning's celebrated and intellectual game of "Twenty Questions?" or the merrier one of "Conglomeration?" or "Magic Music?" or —; but we might extend our inquiries almost ad infinitum. We advise you, therefore, to try the games we have mentioned, and those exhausted, make out the evening with any others you please.

LOVE BLIND.—It appears most unlikely and inadvisable that you should marry the young person respecting whom you write, and whom your attentions therefore are only leading astray. We think it would be the wisest and most honourable course to relinquish her society at once.

FATME.—We know of no cure for the cutaneous annoyance of which you complain.

JUSTICE.—We think a man may wear his beard as suits his fancy; but certainly indoor apprentices, serving in shops, ought to conform to their master's wishes in this respect. No apprentice is bound to work on Sunday, except in such work as is absolutely necessary; such, for instance, as the making up of physician's prescriptions in chemists' shops, or other similar matters.

ROLAND DE MONTREVEL.—The inflammable properties of gas have only quite recently been turned to account for the purpose of lighting the streets of cities. Hamburg, for instance, was lighted with oil until after the great fire in 1842; and even at a later period, in 1846, the gasometers having been erected too near the Elbe, were submerged, and, as the Hamburgers said, "The Senate had to light the oil lamps to enable the people to see the gas."

E. B. (Hoxton).—The District Registrar would of course supply the certificate.

DONALD.—Not at all too old; but you must make your own selection.

A COUNTRY GIRL.—From your description, we fancy the jar in which your butter was preserved could not have been quite clean. If the butter has turned, it is in the position of Humpty Dumpty, after his fall, and "Not all the king's horses or all the king's men" can set it to rights.

S. B. K.—We cannot answer your question, for we do not understand it. To define what you ask would be as difficult as defining nothing. Porson, however, did manage to define this. He says:—

"Mysterious Nothing! How shall I define

Thy shapeless, baseless, placeless emptiness?

Nor form, nor colour, sound, nor size are thine,

Nor words, nor figures can thy void express.

But though we cannot thee to aught compare,

To thee a thousand things may likened be;

And though thou art nobody and nowhere,

Yet half mankind devote themselves to thee.

How many books thy history contain!

How many heads thy mighty plans pursue!

What labouring hands thy portion only gain!

What busy men thy only doings do!

To thee the great, the proud, the giddy bend,

And, like my sonnet, all in Nothing end."

This definition may serve quite as well as an answer to your question.

RICHARD MARKHAM.—The curfew was not a bell, but an instrument somewhat resembling a very deep fireshovel in shape. The name comes from courre, cover, and feu, fire, the instrument being placed over the embers of a fire to extinguish it. The curfew bell was merely the bell tolled at a certain hour every evening to warn the villagers and citizens to put out their fires and lights. The regulation was instituted as a preventative against conspiracies, which proverbially shun the day, and are mostly concocted around the midnight fire.

C. R. P.—The word news is most decidedly a substantive, signifying "new intelligence." Its equivalent in French is nouvelles; in German, Neuigkeiten.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.—Vols. I. and II. of "Cassell's Illustrated History of England" are now ready, price six shillings each volume. The commencement of Vol. III. offers a favourable opportunity to new subscribers who may be desirous of taking the work in weekly numbers or monthly parts.

SYSTEMATIC.—who is evidently unaware of the exclusive nature of the "Royal Society"—asks how he may become a member "of that, or any other Society." Our correspondent's unceremonious method of speaking of the Royal Society reminds us of the Frenchman who, in 1851, visited London, and on his return to Paris told his friends how he had seen the three most illustrious personages in England, to wit, the Queen, the Duke of Wellington, and the Lord Mayor.

F. E. J.—The notice to quit is good.

A. M.—The father is not bound to support the son under the circumstances mentioned.

A CONSTANT READER.—We think not. The paper has been defunct for a long time.

A FIREMAN.—Mix vinegar and treacle in equal quantities, and let a teaspoonful be taken occasionally, when the cough is troublesome. See the first volume of the "Educational Course."

DUBIOUS.—It should be "The Worshipful the Mayor."

W. PRINCE.—Pretty enough; but we have no space for either. Declined with thanks.

A KNIGHT OF THE — (?)—The appointments are under the control of the Civil Service Commissioners.

DISAGREEABLE.—We have heard the following remedy for bad breath strongly recommended:—Take one drachm of sulphate of magnesia, two drachms of tincture of calumba, one ounce and a half of infusion of roses; make a draught, to be taken every morning, or every other morning, an hour before breakfast for at least a month.

J. W.—Any cement will do.

AN OLD CHIP AND SON OF VULCAN would find employment either in Canada or the United States. If quite prepared to meet hardships and difficulties, they might cheaply purchase some of the unclaimed land in the far west, and plant a colony, or found a state!

S. M. N.—The marks to which you refer, and which are called by the country folk "Satan's Footsteps," are well known, and have frequently excited superstitious terror. They have the appearance of footprints of fire; the grass looks as though it were burnt black, and presents a startling contrast with the vivid green around. These marks are in reality the ordinary footprints of those who have crossed the fields while the night frost was on the grass, which during the spring is very tender, and is as effectually destroyed by the pressure of a foot, in its frosty brittleness, as by fire, and with much the same appearance.

OLIVER CROMWELL should adopt some sedentary employment, such as watchmaking, engraving, &c.

A CONWAY.—The following is, we suppose, what you require. With a clean pen write on paper with a solution of muriate of cobalt so diluted with water that the writing when dry will be invisible. On gently warming the paper the writing will appear of a blue or greenish colour, which will disappear again when cool. A solution of muriate of copper forms a yellow and sympathetic ink, and acetate of cobalt a rose or purple. If a landscape be drawn representing a winter scene, the paper being overlaid, where the foliage should be, with the green sympathetic ink, on gently warming the drawing it will represent summer. Sky and water may be drawn with the blue, and standing corn with the yellow ink.

BLANCHE.—The application of a little cold cream, pomatum, spermaceti ointment, lard, or any similar article, will generally prevent chaps and chilblains on the lips and hands. Persons employed in oil works or about oil, and who have, consequently, their hands continually imbued therewith, never suffer from these things. A little oil or unguent of any kind well rubbed over the hands on going to rest (removing the superfluous portion with a cloth) will not only preserve them from cold, but render them beautifully soft and white.

ALMA MATER.—If our correspondent can go through the "matriculation" process at the London University, no questions will be asked as to whether he taught himself, or obtained his knowledge at a school. For further particulars he must apply to the secretary.

J. L. P.—We don't know what "J. L. P." means when he talks about writing to his governor. Does he wish to address her Majesty the Queen? If so, he must address his letter "To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty," and begin "May it please your Majesty."

DANIEL will, we fear, find it a difficult thing to obtain the separate parts of an harmonium, and a still more difficult one to put them together properly.

PERCY.—In studying Italian or any other language without the help of a master, be careful to make sure of your ground as you go on. Never grudge the trouble of using your dictionary, and never take things for granted. Search out diligently the infinitives of verbs, and don't pass over any irregularity, without knowing "the reason why" it exists.

AUNT JEMIMA.—Really, dear aunt, we are not on the stock exchange, and should only mislead you if we were to try and play stockbroker for your especial benefit. When Napoleon was riding through Paris at a time when affairs looked rather black, and his armies were getting decidedly the worst of it in the Peninsula, a market woman cried out to him that he ought to make peace. "My good woman," answered the Emperor, "you sell your cabbages, and leave me to make peace or war. Every one to his trade." And the people laughed and cheered him. "Every one to his trade," dear aunt. Write to a stockbroker about your shares.

X. Z. G.—The power of reading music rapidly at sight is a very valuable one to a musician. It is obtained by constant practice, and by avoiding the unpleasant plan called "playing by ear."

WITTENOW.—Height and age are not the only points by which the admissibility of a recruit into the army is decided. General soundness of constitution is also required.

STUPID.—Don't be discouraged; and if your companions continue to tease you, answer them as the tortoise answered the hare:—

"Puss, though I own thy quicker parts,
Things are not always done by starts;
You may deride my awkward pace,
But slow and steady wins the race."

A YOUTH OF SEVENTEEN had best accept the situation in the banking house.

LUTON sends us a poem with the ominous title of the "Out-cast One." We really cannot accept it, and would say no more were it not that our correspondent insists on an opinion. Our opinion is that the lines are not good.

ELLEN D., NOLENS, R. H. J. C., F. W., KIT, declined with thanks. LITTLE DAISY, very creditable.

A DREAMER will find the duties of a steward's mate in a passenger ship anything but a dream. He will have to be general fag to his superior, and when anything goes wrong it is usually placed to his account. There are a few positions on shipboard graphically described by sailors as "dogs' berths;" and that of the steward's mate is one of these.

TO OUR READERS.—As we are continually receiving communications from some of our friends in remote parts of the kingdom, requesting to know how they can be supplied with our Paper when they reside at a distance from any of the Trade, we beg to inform them and the public generally, that they can be supplied with single numbers by post for 2d. each number, or 2s. 2d. per quarter; 4s. 4d. per half year; or 8s. 8d. per twelve months; or if three parties in a neighbourhood combine, and have three copies sent weekly to one address, they can be supplied for 4d., or 4s. 4d. per quarter, 8s. 8d. per half year, or 17s. 4d. per year; or those who like to have a single copy of three numbers sent every three weeks, can have them sent at the rate of 4d. for every three numbers; or fivepenny monthly parts can be forwarded for 7d., and sixpenny parts for 8d. In all cases postage stamps or a post-office order must be sent in advance, and double numbers will be reckoned as two numbers. All letters in this department must be addressed to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard, to whom post-office orders should be made payable. Letters requiring an answer must inclose a postage stamp.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARTLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.

The friendships of the world are oft
Confederacies in vice, or leagues in pleasure.

ADDISON.

If crime has its chieftains it has also its pariahs. Immunity stamps the former, failure the latter. The world is unfortunately prone to admire rather than to condemn the cunning of the man who, having plundered on a gigantic scale, contrives to baffle justice. The smartness of the thing tickles its fancy; it is looked upon as a stroke of genius; the varnish of success hides for a time the delinquency, as gilding the surface of the brass on which it is plated: to be sure, every one knows that it is not really gold; but what then? it looks nearly as well, especially when fresh burnished.

Society reserves all its virtuous indignation for the petty larceny rogue—the bungler who had not sufficient wit to escape detection, who has held up his hand at the bar of offended justice, and been condemned, the fitting penalty for want of address. To such it shows no mercy. refuses even labour to the wretch who has once been convicted, sternly admonishes him to keep honest, then buttons up its pockets with an air of satisfaction, as if it had done its duty, when, in point of fact, it has done nothing of the kind.

Labour is the right even of the most depraved to deny it, is to compel them to remain so.

By none is this unfortunate class of persons so carefully avoided as by those who are not a whit more honest than themselves. They, however, really have an excuse, a prudent, if not a moral one—they cannot afford to attract attention to their own dealings with the world.

None prate so much about virtue as those who are conscious of having forfeited all claim to it.

This peculiar feeling will account for the state of isolation in which Mike lived—not a neighbour visited him, and yet there were many in the Belvedere-road whose ethics were quite as loose as his own, who secretly sympathised with him; but then they had never yet been found out, which lucky accident we suspect is the secret of many reputations for honesty.

Mike had but one friend, or pal, as he familiarly called him, in the world, a fellow well known in certain circles about town by the name of Fiddler Dick—a returned convict like himself. It was the arrival of this person the half drunken ruffian was so anxiously expecting, when we broke off to follow Jack Manders in his morning rounds to see what he could pick up.

These two ruffians, who were every way so worthy of each other, had been tried at the same assizes, sentenced to the same term of transportation, served it in the same penal settlement, and returned to

LILLIAN'S INTRODUCTION TO FIDDLER DICK.

England together, wiser, but most certainly not better men. Hence the feeling of—we will not profane the word by calling it friendship, but choose a more fitting term—the intimacy which still existed between them.

Our readers are already aware of the means by which Mike contrived to live. It is unnecessary, therefore, to say more on that point; but as Fiddler Dick had an industry peculiarly his own, we shall proceed to describe it for their information.

He had several beautiful and delicate looking children, whose ages varied from eight to ten; how he obtained them no one knew or thought it worth while to inquire; certainly they were not his, for flowers could not so belie their parent stem; but he had terrified or beaten them into calling him father, and that answered his purpose quite as well.

These innocent victims having been taught to dance upon stilts, were paraded about the streets and squares of London. Sometimes their taskmaster made an excursion with them into the country: in either place he made a double harvest, the first from the voluntary contributions of the spectators, a second and far more considerable one from the involuntary tribute which his partner, one of the most expert pickpockets of the day, levied whilst their attention was fixed upon the little dancers.

Mike's object in sending for this man was to dispose of Lilly. The five hundred pounds Lady Boothroyd had promised him haunted his dreams; he had made up his mind to have it, without crime if possible, but at all events to have it. The affair required tact as well as management, seeing that he had his brother as well as her ladyship to deal with; but with such a prize in view he felt himself diplomatist sufficient to deceive them both. As for the ultimate fate of the little victim, that was the last of his considerations; or rather, he never considered it at all.

To the carrying out of this rascally scheme there appeared but one difficulty, and that was the extraordinary liking which his nephew Jack had taken to the child. It puzzled as well as annoyed him. He never took a liking to children; in fact, rather hated them; and having mentally turned over the affair in his own mind, came to the conclusion that it would be quite as well if Jack were out of the way too. The boy was getting obstinate, had braved him several times lately, and showed what his uncle considered an unnatural objection to take a thrashing quietly; added to all this, he expected soon to be in a situation to do without him.

During these cogitations, the returned convict had emptied the ashes from his pipe three several times, by tapping it against the sole of his boot, and was in the act of filling it again, when a shadow darkened the window, whose diamond-shaped panes were too thickly incrustated with dirt to enable any one on the outside of the house to see through them.

"Go to your room!" he exclaimed, turning to Lillian, and at the same time placing his pipe upon the table. "See you don't stir or make a noise till I call you down. It will be wuss for ye if ye do, mind that."

Glad to escape, the child, who felt half-choked by the fumes of the tobacco, obeyed, and the speaker proceeded to unbar the door to admit his friend.

As Fiddler Dick was rather a remarkable looking person, it would be a want of proper attention to his merits not to describe him somewhat particularly to our readers; his opinions, principles, habits, and manners, we shall leave to describe themselves.

Although he appeared much older, the gentleman—all professionals are gentlemen now-a-days—was not more than thirty-five, and stood in his shoes—high-logs we ought to have said, for he invariably wore them—about five feet six; rather short for a hero, but then the deficiency was compensated for by uncommon width of shoulders, and arms denoting great muscular strength; his legs were short and thin—decidedly thin—and yet, singular to say, their possessor evidently took considerable pride in displaying them; winter and summer he always wore knee—we wish philologists, instead of quarrelling respecting the relative merits of telegraph and telegram, would favour the world with an additional word, to describe the article, but not having done so, we must employ the old one—breeches, made to fit very tightly at the knees, which, like two friends who had quarrelled, stood sulkily apart in the form of a parenthesis. In other words, Fiddler Dick was decidedly bow-legged.

The rest of his costume consisted of a leopard skin waistcoat, and a pilot pea jacket, with exceedingly large buttons, a yellow Belcher silk handkerchief twisted knowingly round his neck, and a hat it would have been extremely difficult to have taken the shine but of, seeing that its lustre was owing to the vast quantity of oil which had penetrated through the texture from his well-greased hair, long, of course, and black, with a gipsy-like propensity to curl.

If Fiddler Dick felt proud of anything, it was of his hair; when fresh "iled," as he elegantly expressed it, there was no mistake about it; in fact he was fond of his hair, and the feeling may in some degree be accounted for by its having so frequently fallen beneath the ruthless shears of the prison authorities, who had refused to spare even the two pet locks which hung jauntily down, one by the side of each ear.

One touch more and the portrait, we trust, will be complete: the face, we must not forget his face; nature must have been in an ill-humour when she gave it him, for the eyes, though dark and piercing, were exceedingly round and small, their expression cunning and animal to a degree—something between those of a cynical fox and an amorous wolf. The nose was a most ignoble nose—we feel almost angry at having to describe such a nose, which, after all, we can only do by negations; in the first place, it was too large for a snub, and not straight enough for a Grecian; too thick for a Roman, and not sufficiently hooked for a Hebrew; too expansive at the nostrils for a European, yet not quite flat enough for an African; in short, it was a nondescript nose, and all we can add, is a caution to our readers, if ever they meet with such a nose, to avoid the man who wears it.

The mouth, however, was by far the worst feature in his face. There was something devilish in the corners of it when he drew them down, a habit by which those who were well acquainted with him knew that Fiddler Dick was lying. At such times, too, he had a manner of drawing his words by dwelling upon each vowel. Some of his intimate pals asserted that he had his good points; all we can say is, that they must have been exceedingly ingenious to have found them out.

"Well, old un!" exclaimed the worthy, whose portrait we fear we have but faintly sketched; "how am ye?"

Mike silently gave him his hand, and pointed to a chair by the table.

"All right," said his visitor, seating himself.

His host filled the two glasses from the gin-bottle, and, raising his own to his lips, gave a nod and drank it off.

Fiddler Dick followed his example; then, without waiting to be asked, filled a pipe. The elder convict did the same; and raking a hot coal from the fire with the broken tongs, politely handed it to his visitor before using it himself, which delicate attention was acknowledged by a knowing wink.

For some time they smoked in silence.

"That ain't bad bacca," observed Mike.

"Not by no means."

"And the gin?"

"Well, one can scarcely tell on the first toothful," observed Dick.

The glasses were filled a second time, and drained; after which the visitor pronounced it "A number one."

As a matter of course, the gentleman did not attribute the special invite, and the very "ansome," preparations to receive him, entirely to Mike's friendship, his own personal merits, or to both combined. In his own expressive language, he smelt a dodgy on the board, and determined to keep wide awake to larn the ins and outs.

"Any luck lately?" he inquired, in a tone of indifference.

"Not much," answered his host; "that Jack is such a lazy whelp. How is business with you?"

"Bad," replied the ruffian; "always is this time o' year. It's too cold to be charitable: people doesn't like to unbutton their pockets, for fear the frost should bite their fingers, I suppose; and my expenses is heavy."

"But the partnership account?"

"Wuss than t'other," added Dick, and down went the corners of his mouth. "Dexter ain't half the chap he was, though I believe he does his best. You're a lucky cove,—you ain't got no wife and four brats to pervide every day for."

"Come, come!" said Mike, encouragingly, "things aint so bad: the gals earn their living?"

"Well, nearly," replied his friend, speaking very slowly, "but that ain't the point; they will die off so. Few on 'em last a second winter, the cold and the muslin dresses kills 'em; and yet Bet takes mortal care on 'em. Would you believe it?" he added, "she gives 'em a glass of gin round every mornin' afore I takes 'em out—a mother couldn't do more."

"Certainly not," exclaimed Mike, emphatically, evidently struck by so much goodness.

"Then we are obliged to bury them now," continued the former; "it worn't so in her fust man's time."

"Why, what did he do with 'em?" demanded his host.

"Sell 'em to the doctors," answered Dick, "to natamise 'em, I thinks they call it; but that was done up afore I took the consarn. They gets the poor who dies in the workus for nothin' now, and won't buy. Ain't it a shame?" he added, putting the question in the tone of a man who felt that he had been deeply injured, and had a right to the sympathy of his hearer. "Talk of free trade, all humbug! There ain't no free trade—the country is a-goin' to ruin!"

These last observations were delivered very emphatically, and accompanied by a smart rap of the speaker's knuckles on the table, to give weight to his opinions.

"It is rather hard," observed Mike.

"Rayther hard!" repeated his guest; "it's cussedly hard. I can't bear to think on it, it makes my blood bile—but here's to you!"

The ceremony of refilling and emptying the glasses was gone through again.

"I s'pose," observed the eldest of the two worthies, deliberately puffing the smoke from his lips, "the kids are all healthy now?"

"No, they ain't," replied his pal. "There's Fan—you recollect Fan? she as used to do the ighland fling."

Mike nodded, as much as to say that he did recollect her.

"She can't last more than another week, or a fortnight at the most," continued the speaker; "her cough is downright awful. I've been obliged to have a bed made up for her in the washus. My misses and I couldn't stand it no longer; there was no gettin' a wink of sleep for her."

"Rather a smart gal, I believe."

"Rayther," said Fiddler Dick. "I'd stand a five pound note for such another."

"How old is she?"

"About eight; but we never knows exactly."

"Dark hair and eyes, I think?"

"Black as mine," replied the ruffian, shaking his well-greased locks with an air of conceit. "Every one as saw her said she was the very spit of me."

"And you are quite sure she is dying?" said Mike.

"Sartin," exclaimed his pal, with a burst of ill humour.

Suddenly the manner of the speaker changed. He fancied that he detected a smile upon the features of his companion; the suspicion instantly struck him that he had been trotted out, in other words, pumped, by him for some especial purpose, and he naturally felt indignant at the idea of any one getting the best of him.

"What are you a-drivin' at?" he asked. "I should 'ope, after the years we 'as known each other, that it is all square between us."

The guardian of poor Lillian held out his hand to him.

"Well, I s'pose it is," muttered the mountebank, after taking it. "What is it?" he added: "what's yer game? Come out of yer shell, ye old crocodile, will yer?"

"My game is a very simple one," observed Mike.

"Of course it is."

"I've got a gal to dispose on."

"Indeed!"

"Just Fanny's age."

Fiddler Dick looked him very steadfastly in the face.

"With dark hair and eyes," continued his friend;

"and you shall have her cheap."

"And what do you call cheap?" demanded the ruffian.

"Well, five pounds: I call that cheap."

"Is that all?"

"And Fan. I must have her."

"Ye want Fan, does yer!" exclaimed his visitor, a light suddenly breaking in upon him. "I should call that a swop. What'll yer give me?"

The old convict looked very much confused. He had not managed the affair quite so well as he had calculated upon doing.

"Mike," said his friend, "you've hurt my feelin's."

"I didn't expect this on yer! Try to do an old pal out of five couter, in these 'ard times too! You know my weak side," he added, pointing to the bottle on the table; "and I, like a fool, to unbuzzom myself to you, as if you had been my own brother. I'm hurt at it, Mike,—hurt here!"

By way of illustrating the exact spot where the wound had been inflicted, the speaker thumped the left side of his leopard-skin waistcoat twice.

It was extraordinary how little effect this pantomimic appeal to their past friendship produced upon his host, who simply reminded him that business was business;—an aphorism, by-the-by, which few men understood better than the party to whom it was addressed; and the speaker concluded by reminding him that he was not compelled to accept the bargain he had proposed.

Fiddler Dick acknowledged the truth of this last remark; nay, even went so far as to admit that he had been "rather unreasonable," which he accounted for by adding that "when his feelin's wor consarned, he was a trifle too susceptible—an amiable weakness, no doubt—but still it wor one, and he trusted his valued friend and pal would think nothin' more about it."

His "valued friend and pal" assured him he would not; and after accepting the amende honorable, sat some time smoking the calumet of peace in silence.

Never, perhaps, were any two persons more equally matched in cunning and rascality—a fact no one knew better than themselves: hence the respect they professed to entertain for each other.

"It's a drawn game," thought Mike.
"I shall draw the old badger from his hole yet," was the mental calculation of his companion.

When two players of equal nerve and skill are engaged in a game either of science or chance, the one who has most at stake is nearly certain to be the first to lose his self-possession. It was so in the present instance: not that the old convict's uneasiness displayed itself in words: far from it; it was his manner of smoking—the short, irregular whiffs—that betrayed him; those of Fiddler Dick, on the contrary, were calm and measured, bespeaking a mind at rest. It was really beautiful to observe the regular succession of circles the smoke formed as he gently puffed it from his lips; how gracefully they rose in the air, enlarging as they rose, and finally dispersed into thin vapour, which hung like a halo over his head.

Mike could endure it no longer, but was the first to break the silence.

"Well!" he exclaimed, shaking his head, "you are downy"—an accusation which his visitor listened to with all becoming modesty.

"I shouldn't be surprised, now," added the old man, "if you didn't try to persuade me to make an even swap with the two gals."

The only reply to this insinuation was one of Dick's peculiar winks.

"I dare say ye do, now; but I could not stand that, no—no, I must have somethin' in."

"I don't care about swappin'," answered his friend, drily.

"Yer don't?"

"No."

"Why I thought as how you wanted the gal?"

"What do you want with my Fan?" demanded Fiddler Dick, turning suddenly round on him. "I'll tell you: as soon as she is dead to pass her off for the other one, and so get fifty or a hunderd couter at the very least. I ain't agoin' to lend myself to any such game."

"Not if ye wor paid?" inquired Mike, insinuatingly.

"I said lend," observed the former, slowly: "business is business."

"And how much would yer be expecting, now?"

"Half."

"That's net fair, Dick," exclaimed his host; "I only got fifty for the gal myself, and must have all the trouble and keep on 'em both. Say twenty, and I'll talk to ye."

"Not a screw less."

"Say no more about it, then; there's no harm done. You are an old pal, and I'd sooner put a good thing in your way than a stranger's, and would a done it if you had only been a little more reasonable. Keep your gal, and pay the buryin' on her. I'll keep mine."

So saying the owner of the cottage filled his pipe again. He felt hurt at what he considered an attempt to impose upon his good nature, and mentally vowed that rather than stand another penny, he'd do what he had so frequently vowed never to do again—run one of his great risks, as he called them.

"Don't screech afore yer hurt," cried the Fiddler, who, during Mike's speech, had reflected whether it might not be advisable to get the child whom somebody was willing to pay fifty pounds to have put out of the way—he believed the sum to be larger—into his hands.

"I ain't a-screechin'," muttered the old man, doggedly.

"Can't I see the gal?"

"Not afore it's a bargain."

"Well, then, it is a bargain," replied his dear friend, holding out his hand to him, "and you know when I say the word, it's done and done."

Glasses were emptied by way of sealing the arrangement; and poor Lillian, who had all the while been shivering in the cold up stairs, was called down, that her new master might inspect her.

"She is pretty, and no mistake," exclaimed Dick.

"What 'air, just like mine!"

"Isn't it?" said Mike.

"And she stands well on her pins, too!"

"Doesn't she?"

"Come here, my dear."

The child, too much terrified to refuse obedience, advanced to the man, who felt her arms and shoulders, turned her round, in short, examined her as critically as a knowing housewife would have done a turkey-poult she was bargaining for. The heart of poor Lillian beat wildly as she felt the grasp of his rude hand, and her eyes filled with tears. Oh, how she prayed that Jack would return!

"You won't kill me?" she faltered.

Both the men broke into a loud laugh.

"Indeed I won't attempt to run away."

"What should I kill you for?" replied the ruffian, releasing her. "I'm werry fond of children, that is, when they behaves themselves. I've got three or four at home. You must come and play with them."

"Girls, sir?"

"Yes, all gals; and Bet 'll be uncommon fond on ye."

Lilly secretly wondered who Bet was, but did not dare to ask the question.

"Shall I take her now?" whispered Fiddler Dick.

"Not till Fan is here."

"To-morrow night, then?"

"Say the night arter," replied Mike. "I must get Jack out of the way first; the boy is so fond of her, he might make a row if he knew on it."

"And the twenty couter?"

"You must wait for that till I am settled with," said the old convict, "which won't be till after Fan is buried—you're fly?"

"All right," answered the man, who could find no objection to so reasonable a proposal; "I told ye afore she can't last more than a week—and I can pretty well tell, I've watched so many on 'em. First it comes with a short cough, up in the throat, then it gets deeper and deeper, and hollerer and hollerer, and they grows thin, turns blue under the eyes, and speaks just as Bet does when she has had a drop too much."

"I suppose I shall have no difficulty in managing her," observed Mike, "for I must call the doctor in."

"Bah!" exclaimed Fiddler Dick, "I'll leave you my whip; you'll have no occasion to use it, only just let her see it; she knows the sight on it."

The ruffian might have added, "and the feel of it," but it was unnecessary; his hearer perfectly understood him.

This whispered conversation alarmed poor Lillian exceedingly; several times she looked wistfully towards the door.

Everything being settled, her future master took his leave, accompanied by Mike, who insisted on seeing him as far as the corner of the road. He did not forget, however, before leaving the cottage, to turn the key of the door upon his victim.

Poor Lillian! the terror of loneliness fell on her, and she felt sick at heart, giddy with the stifling fumes of gin and tobacco with which the air was laden. Had there been a loophole, a crevice, through which she could have escaped, despite the threats of her gaoler, in her desperation she would have attempted it; but the wall at the back of the cottage was too high, and the narrow casement barred. She had but one hope—the return of her young protector; and rushing to the window, she remained there with her pale face glued to the panes, watching, praying for him to make his appearance.

In this position Mike found her; and his brutal temper, which had been previously ruffled by the advantage Fiddler Dick had gained over him, rose at the sight: he had found something he could safely vent it on.

"I thought I told you not to go near there!" he exclaimed, as he dragged her from the window.

"Oh, forgive me," shrieked the child; "I was only looking for—"

"I'll teach ye to look," interrupted the brute.

Despite her cries, he fastened her delicate wrists, by means of a cord, to the back of the heavy arm-chair in which he had lately been seated; and looked, fiercely round the room, till his eyes rested on the remains of a clothes line, which he caught up and began to knot in a most scientific manner. In his impatience he forgot even to bar the door.

When the instrument of torture was complete, Mike swung it over his head, several times, as if to make sure of his aim, and was about to let it fall upon the back of the child, when Jack made his appearance. Without a moment's hesitation, the boy darted between his uncle and his victim, and received the blow himself.

"You mustn't beat Lilly!" he exclaimed.

"Stand out of the way, fool!" roared the half-drunken savage.

"What has she done?"

"Stand out of the way, I say!"

"Save me!" shrieked Lillian: "he want's to kill me."

"He shan't lay a hand on you," answered the boy, resolutely. "Come, uncle," he added, "you know I don't often speak out, but when I do, I mean it. You must thrash me afore you touch her."

Had Mike been perfectly sober, the probability is, he would not have attempted it. The repeated glasses of gin he had swallowed, not only rendered him half-mad, but gave him a strength he did not ordinarily possess. To be sure, it was only a momentary strength, but it rendered him a fearful antagonist while it lasted. Twice he knocked the gallant boy to the earth, and when he rushed on him the third time, dizzy and half stunned with his blows, dashed him into a corner of the room, where he lay speechless for several moments.

"I'll teach you, you young rascal, to dispute with me!" shouted Mike, foaming with rage as he stood over him. "Have you had enough of it?"

"Don't beat Lilly," murmured Jack, "and I'll tell you where uncle Andrew lives."

The ruffian paused. The words half sobered him, for he had not the slightest idea that his nephew had ever heard the name of his brother.

"What uncle Andrew?" he said.

"Andrew, Silix: he as settled about the lady's bringing Lilly."

"And you ain't a-lyin' to me?"

"You know I ain't," replied the boy.

"Get up, then," he murmured, at the same time throwing the cord on the table.

Jack rose to his feet.

"Now, out with it."

"Not till I have untied Lilly."

"Untie her, then."

Jack, who had not yet recovered from the severe blows and fall he had received, staggered, rather than walked, towards the chair, over the back of which the head of Lillian had fallen. The terrified child had fainted.

"You have killed her!" exclaimed the lad. "How cold she is! Lilly! speak to me! You know me! Dead! dead!" he repeated, clenching his fist, and shaking it at his uncle; "and you shall hang for it, as you ought to have done long since."

"Hang! For what?"

"I know!" shouted the boy, whom anger made incautious. "Do you think I never heard what you and Fiddler Dick used to talk about, after you had sent me to bed?"

Mike turned deadly pale. He was now quite sober. Without a word, he untied the wrists of his victim; then went into the back room for a basin of water, with which he sprinkled her face and neck. Gradually the little sufferer revived. Jack took her upon his knee, kissed her, spoke to her in the most soothing words he could think of, and assured her that no one should harm her whilst he stood by.

"But you haven't told me about Andrew yet," observed his uncle.

"Oh, you'll find him at Sir Norman Boothroyd's, in Regent's-park," replied the boy. "He's as bad as yourself; and you may tell him that I said so."

The old convict waited to hear no more, but took up his hat and silently quitted the cottage.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Seems he a dove? His feathers are but borrowed;
For he's disposed as the evil raven.
Is he a lamb? His skin is surely lent him;
For he's inclined as are the ravenous wolves,
Who cannot steal a shape that means deceit.

SHAKESPEARE.

THAT same night Jack made his bed close to the door of Lilly's room, arranging it in such a way that it would be impossible for any one to enter without disturbing him. With all his shrewdness, the imprudence of the threatening words he had so incautiously let drop, and the effect they were likely to produce upon Mike, never once occurred to him. He had not the slightest suspicion of any danger to himself—a good thrashing, perhaps, a quarrel or two, but nothing more.

For hours the poor boy lay awake resolving in his mind various schemes for the protection of Lillian. Had he been older, or could he have procured work, he would have taken her from the cottage and provided for her himself. He had no friend to consult, no one to advise, or give him a character. It is astonishing how the desire of obtaining one haunted him.

"Pity Lilly ain't a boy," he repeated to himself. "We could run away together—somebody might give us work; but then she ain't fit for work, her hands are so white and pretty."

Sometimes he thought of taking a lodging for her in a distant part of the town, passing her off as his sister, and supporting her by his old trade of pocket-picking; but an invincible repugnance, the dawning of a better feeling in his young heart, caused him to dismiss the scheme from his mind; something, he felt sure, would turn up that was better—he could not tell exactly what, but with the natural hopefulness of youth, he could not believe that life's lottery was composed entirely of blanks.

These reflections kept him awake till a late, or rather an early hour, at which his respectable relative returned. Jack hastened down as usual the instant he heard his signal at the door to let him in, and thanked goodness that he was sober, little imagining that he was all the more dangerous on that very account.

"Have you been out?" inquired Mike, in a tone of voice unusually kind.

"No."

"That's right. I don't like the place to be left alone while that gal is in it. She might run away."

"You are enough to frighten her away," observed the boy.

"It was along of the drink, Jack," replied the ruffian. "I ain't naturally spiteful, as you know, but the drink maddens me, and you made me wuss."

"I!"

"You: wasn't it aggravation to see that you was fonder of Lilly than your poor old uncle who brought you up?"

Jack remained silent: he did not exactly know what to make of Mike's sudden sensibility.

"But I ain't a-goin' to reproach you since you told me the truth," added the convict.

"You have seen your brother, then?" exclaimed the boy.

"Why, no, I can't say that I have seen him, but I have discovered quite enough to know that it was all true. He is off to Chatham."

"St. Faith's, you mean," observed his nephew.

"No, Chatham. I am quite right: his master has got a fine house there, but we will ferret him out in the morning."

"I don't want to ferret him out," said the lad. "I've seen quite enough of him."

"But I do," continued Mike. "He is a bad 'un. I'm sorry to say so of my own born twin brother, but he is natterally a bad 'un. Do you know why he keeps out of the way, and wants to hide from us?"

"Because you have been a thief," answered Jack. "He told me so."

"Nothink of the kind. It's because he has robbed us. There's money in the family; you've heard me say so afore, ain't yer?"

"Oh, but I never believed it, for you never talked about it unless you wor drunk."

"A proof that it was true. Men don't lie when they are in licker, Jack."

"Don't they, uncle?"

"No! the real feelin' comes out, then; but we'll talk more about it in the mornin'. The old fox has taken to his airth, but we'll smoke him out as sure as my name's Mike. Good night."

"Good night."

"Give us yer hand. I bears ye no malice."

The lad gave it him. He was not naturally of a resentful nature, and had been too long accustomed to the outbreaks of temper, and fits of drunken passion on the part of his relative, to pay much attention to any words they might have had. He even forgave—or at least forgot—the blows he had received.

"He is not such a bad fellow, after all," he thought; "for he did take care of me when I was a kid. I might have starved but for him."

Little did he suspect the reasons the ruffian had for doing so; that his father had consigned to his worthy brother-in-law the proceeds of a most important robbery when the latter visited him in Newgate, on the sole condition of his protecting his son, and, strange to add, of bringing him up honestly.

We have seen how he fulfilled the trust.

In the morning, as usual, Jack was the first down to light the fire, and sweep up the place. Lilly followed: her face was exceedingly pale, and her eyes red with weeping. On seeing her protector, she ran and threw her arms round him.

"Are you hurt?" she asked.

"Not a bit," answered the lad. "Bless you, I could stand twice as much thrashing as that; but it won't happen again. Mike was drunk."

The child shuddered at the name.

"I tell you it won't, Lilly," whispered the boy; "and what's more, I won't leave you—you needn't be afraid whilst I stay by you."

"O, no!" exclaimed the helpless creature, joyfully; "but he may want to send you out again, and then—"

"And if he does, I won't go," interrupted her defender, boldly. "Lilly," he added, "will you say over the prayer as you did yesterday morning to me, and I'll try and repeat it after you? I don't quite understand it all yet, but I do some of it, and I feel as if it did me good."

Again the divine and simple words were repeated by them on their knees; and He, whose sacred lips first pronounced them, who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," doubtless heard and sanctified them. During the morning Mike informed his nephew of a plan he had laid to obtain an interview with his brother, and bringing him to some arrangement respecting what he called his rights; for which purpose he proposed that they should both proceed as far as Chatham, and take up a position at the public-house directly opposite the mansion of Sir Norman Boothroyd.

The boy listened to him without the slightest suspicion, and had only one objection to urge:—what was to become of Lilly?

"Leave her at home," was the answer; "she'll be safe enough till we come back."

Jack did not much like the idea of her remaining in the cottage by herself; "Yet, better alone," he thought, "than with his uncle; besides, it would only be for a few hours;" so he consented.

Although it was not his day for getting shaved, the old convict underwent that operation, and took unusual pains with his dress; evidently he wished to appear as respectable as possible. Jack, too, was desirous to put on his best.

"We shall come back together, Lilly," whispered the lad, as he bade his protégée good-by.

The child looked at him mournfully.

"I tell you we shall," he repeated; "you can believe me, can't you?"

A very faint "yes" spoke, not her doubt of Jack's word, but her own misgivings.

Mike told her she might do anything she liked to amuse herself, provided she kept away from the window, which Lillian promised to do. Her gaoler, on quitting the house with his nephew, locked the door carefully after him.

At London-bridge Jack and his uncle took the steamer for Chatham. It was the first time the former had ever been on the river. Despite the cold, he remained on deck all the way, and enjoyed the trip exceedingly. Amongst the passengers were several sailors, and a boy about his own age, belonging to a ship bound for China, which was expected to sail with the next tide. At first these rough sons of Neptune felt inclined to amuse themselves with the young landsman's simplicity; but they soon discovered that, although he had never been to sea, he was not such a greenhorn as they took him for, but possessed a wit as sharp and ready as their own.

Before the voyage was half over, they began quite to like him.

"Are you many on board a ship?" inquired Jack.

"About sixteen hands, the two mates, and the skipper," was the reply.

The boy whispered in the ear of the inquirer that skipper was the name for the captain.

"And I suppose you're very merry?"

"Merry! Lord love your young heart," exclaimed an old weather-beaten tar, "it's the happiest life going—all play and no work; it's grub and grog with us all day long. Then at night, when the stars are shining ten times brighter than they do on land, and the ship keeps her course steadily, the lads of the watch sit together, spin yarns, and sing such songs, that I've known the dolphins and mermaids follow in our wake for miles to listen to 'em."

"Dear me!" exclaimed Jack, with unfeigned simplicity, "I thought sailors had something else to do than to spin yarn, or cotton either."

This observation was received with shouts of laughter.

"I see you are making fun of me," he added. "I believe about the mermaids, because I've seen picters on 'em; but spinning yarn won't do."

Little did he imagine how very soon he would understand what spinning a yarn meant.

During the voyage he got quite friendly with his new companions, especially the boy, with whom, before parting, he exchanged pocket knives in token of goodwill.

The steamer reached the pier at last, and Mike made his appearance on deck. Not seeing his nephew, he called out his name rather angrily.

"Here," replied the lad.

The old sailor who had been amusing himself at his expense, eyed the ex-convict sharply, and then gave a low whistle.

"Is that your skipper?" he said.

"That's my uncle," answered Jack.

"Don't like his figure-head. Should be sorry to sail under his orders. Take my advice, youngster, unship yourself as soon as you can."

"What do you mean by unshipping myself?"

"Cut and run," replied the lad he had changed knives with, laughingly. "I wish you were going with us," he added. "And yet I ought not to wish it, for after all it is a hard life, especially when you have a bad captain."

"And have you a bad captain?" inquired Jack.

"Hush," said the boy.

Mike and his nephew landed, and the former taking the lead, directed his steps to a public-house facing the river at the extreme end of the town. It appeared rather a low neighbourhood, even when measured by his companion's standard of respectability, which was far from being a very unreasonable one.

"Are you going to 'The Blue Peter'?" he inquired.

The old man nodded in the affirmative.

"Why, surely you don't expect to find uncle Andrew there?"

"It's a capital place to look out for him from," replied the convict. "You see that road opposite: that is the one he will come by."

"Are you sure, uncle?"

"Certain; it leads to his master's place."

All this appeared so very plausible that the boy believed and followed his relative into "The Blue Peter" without the slightest hesitation. Mike called for a glass of his favourite beverage, gin-and-water, and directed his nephew to watch at the window whilst he sat drinking it. Jack's eyes became riveted on the road opposite, like those of a stanch terrier watching the hole by which the rat is expected to emerge.

He had been at his post about ten minutes when his attention was disturbed by several persons entering the room. He turned round, and to his astonishment beheld both his uncles, and three or four sailors. A secret misgiving crept over him.

"Well, Jack," said Mr. Silex, showing his peculiar, shark-like teeth, "you want a character. I have come all the way to Chatham to give you one. Very kind, isn't it?"

"I know your kindness," answered the boy, bitterly, at the same time trying to pass from the room.

"Hollo! where are you scudding to?" demanded one of the sailors, a stout, powerful man, about forty, dressed in a pilot coat, and a gold band round his seal-skin cap.

"What is that to you?" replied Jack, endeavouring to pass him.

"What is it to me, you young grampus?" repeated the man, at the same time laying a grasp like a smith's vice upon his shoulder. "I'll soon teach you what it is to me."

"Is that the way you answer your captain?" said Mike, with a broad grin of triumph on his countenance.

"He ain't no captain of mine," exclaimed Jack, indignantly.

"You are wrong, my dear boy," mildly observed the steward, "very wrong, and let me add; ungrateful as well, after the expense we have been at to apprentice you to him; you have more than once," he added, "asked me for a character. Before going on board your vessel, you shall hear the one I will give you."

The features of the poor lad, who still remained in the vice-like grasp of his captor, turned deadly pale. He perfectly understood every point in the mocking speech of his relative, and knew the sort of character he had to expect.

"In the first place," said Mr. Silex, "he is a thief. It is to prevent his disgracing his family and friends that we send him to sea."

"A pickpocket," added Mike, trying to look very much shocked at the idea of any one belonging to him falling into such a vulgar vice.

"An impudent, prying, meddling, troublesome rascal," continued the former speaker, bitterly, "who has cost me more than I like to think of."

"Who requires a strong hand," chimed in his brother.

"He has found one," replied the captain, shaking his prisoner roughly. "Only let me catch him picking pockets or anything else on board the Caradoc, that's all."

"He will require great severity," charitably observed the respectable Mr. Andrew, "to break him in. I should say very great severity."

"A little thrashing will be quite lost on him," said Mike.

"You hear what your good uncles say of you?"

Jack gazed upon them both for an instant, with a look of intense hatred, and dashed aside a tear before he found heart to speak.

"I do," he said. "If I am a thief, that man," pointing to Mike, "taught me to become one—lived upon what I brought him home. He has been transported himself, and will live to be hanged if ever I get back, or his precious brother doesn't murder him."

Perhaps," he added, "they will murder each other, for they can't trust each other. They know too much."

The two brothers, as if to give the lie to their nephew's assertion, smiled affectionately and shook hands.

Jack, despite the unpleasant position in which he found himself, could not refrain from breaking into a hearty laugh.

"Uncle Andrew," he said, "Mike's a 'cute hand at poison. Ask Fiddler Dick if he isn't. He can tell you all about it."

The convict trembled, and half repented of the step he had taken.

"Mike," continued the boy, "look out if ever uncle Andrew gets them long, bony fingers of his near your throat. I've had 'em close to mine."

Captain Gall—that was the name of the commander of the Caradoc—considered that he had never heard such a hardened young reprobate in all his life, and handing Jack over to two of his men, directed them to take him on board, and keep him under hatches till the ship was out of the river.

As the boy was being led or rather dragged out of "The Blue Peter," Mike drew the knotted cord, with which he had menaced Lillian, from his pocket, and shook it triumphantly in the air. Half-maddened at the sight, his nephew struggled violently till felled senseless by a blow from the brute who was henceforth to be the master of his destiny. In this state he was conveyed unresistingly on board, and placed under hatches.

When he came to, he found that he was surrounded by the acquaintances he had made on board the steamer, and the words of the boy flashed upon his memory, and he repeated to himself "Not when you have a bad captain!"

"Cheer up, my lad!" exclaimed the sailor who had amused himself and his companions with Jack's inexperience. "Why is he brought on board?"

"New apprentice," replied one of the men.

The old mariner turned his quid, and muttered, "A bad skipper! I told him so. Advised him to cut and run; but he wouldn't take the warnin'. Never was deceived yet. Can always tell what the ship is from the figure-head."

"His uncle says he is a thief," observed one of the sailors who had brought him on board the vessel.

"Don't believe it!" cried several of the men.

"The old rascal whom we saw with him on board the river craft looked decidedly more like a thief than he does."

"Nor I," said the boy who had exchanged knives with Jack; "and if he is, I dare say it was ill-usage that made him one."

Further comments were cut short by the return of Captain Gall on board, when every man flew to his post, for they knew the tyrant they had to deal with. In a few hours the tide began to rise, and the vessel moved slowly down the river.

Before concluding our chapter, it is quite necessary that we should explain to our readers not only the presence of the two brothers at Chatham, but how they came to be acting in concert against their nephew.

A sense of mutual danger had united them. Jack's discovery of Andrew Silcox's whereabouts and the name of Lady Boothroyd threatened to derange the deep-laid plans he had cleverly concocted—not for her ladyship's advantage, but his own. He had even brought himself to part with some portion of that which he prized most on earth—his money—to effect the removal of his nephew.

Mike's hostility to the boy arose from a yet stronger motive. Our readers have not forgotten the threat so imprudently uttered by Jack.

"Well," said the steward, with a sigh, as soon as the captain had taken his leave, and he and his brother remained alone, "it will be some time before I recover that loss—nearly a hundred pounds!"

"You can afford it."

"Can I?" muttered the old man, sharply.

"Yes! Her ladyship must pay it all. It's too late, Andrew, now," added the convict, "to put the linkers on me. I know all."

"Do you?" said Mr. Silcox. "By-the-by," he added, wishing to direct the conversation into another channel, "what did Jack mean by poison and Fiddler Dick?"

"How should I know?" muttered Mike, impatiently. "Perhaps you can tell what he meant cautioning me against your long, bony fingers?"

"Not the slightest idea," replied the steward. Most likely it was merely a scheme to set us by the ears."

"That's it," exclaimed Mike; "but we ain't such fools."

"I should hope not," observed the former, with an amiable smile, which displayed his very peculiar teeth. "Are we not brothers?"

"Of course we are," replied the convict,—"twins. Your interest is my interest, and my interest is yours. This is a 'appy meetin'. My 'art quite overflows with joy. We shall have no disputes, no unpleasantnesses now; but, harm-in-harm, walk through life together."

Mr. Silcox mentally winced at the idea of this; but was far too politic to show his distaste. The two worthies once more shook hands, and then returned to town together.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SELF HELPERS.

THE observant reader of history cannot fail to be struck with the fact that in all ages of the world, and in almost all the countries of the globe, men have emerged from obscurity, penury, and ignorance, and by their own unassisted exertions have attained for themselves positions of distinction, wealth, and enlightenment. Such men are emphatically self-helpers. Such are the men whose lives are briefly related in our "Poverty and Genius." While others have been patiently occupying their original positions as if some ban or spell prevented them from occupying any others, these men have pushed onward, and by their energy and enterprise arrived at the goal of their ambition. While others have been deploring their condition and sighing over their limited advantages, these men have set to work and bravely achieved for themselves those privileges which birth denied them. While others have been idly waiting—Micawber like—for something to turn up, these men have laboured hard to turn it up, and up it has turned to reward their honourable exertions.

In looking back on the lives of great men, we are taught that man by his unaided exertions may perform more wonderful achievements than were ever wrought by the imagined hero of an oriental fabulist. They have called light out of darkness; they have made fortunes out of nothing; they have attained positions such as birth could not bestow, and the proudest noble might envy.

And they have done this in all sorts of positions, in every branch of occupation, and in spite of every description of disadvantage.

They came forth from the workshop, the carpenter's shed, the smithy, the factory; they came from the field, the mine, and the sheep-cote; they laid aside the hammer, the saw, the chisel, the harrow, the plough, the spade, the crook, the needle, the awl; they left the forecable, and the barrack, and the servants' hall; no matter what position they occupied at first, they came out of it, left it far behind, rose to a new life, moved in a new world, were elevated to an altitude which they never anticipated, and were blessed with an immortality for which they had never dared to hope.

And the self-helpers have done this in all the pursuits of life. It is not in one profession, but in all, that we find these men. They have become painters and poets, philosophers and engineers, inventors and discoverers, travellers by land and sea, chemists and astronomers, metaphysicians and mathematicians, sculptors and architects, bishops and judges; they have risen to the highest pinnacle of fame in every department of art, literature, science, and have advanced all and each of what are termed the liberal professions.

And these self-helpers have attained all this under all kinds of disadvantages. They have not won the battle without encountering powerful foes; they have not attained the end of their journey without exertion and fatigue. Lean, lantern-faced poverty has been their gentleman usher; pallid, bleak-eyed, trembling sickness their gentleman of the bedchamber; and deceitful, treacherous misfortune their quarry in waiting. Stammerers have become accomplished orators; blind men have become poets, linguists, and mathematicians; deaf men have become successful musicians—there is scarcely an antagonistic affliction which can be mentioned, but the heroic self-helpers have triumphed over it.

Without dwelling any longer on the fact that self-helpers are to be found in the world—men who have risen by their own exertions—men who have subdued every obstacle and triumphed over every difficulty—men who have swept the word "impossible" from their dictionary—without dwelling to any further extent on this fact, it becomes us to inquire what are the chief characteristics of these men.

And first of all we notice that self-helpers are clear-headed men. They are not of that class who can see nothing in a natural way, whose mental vision is distorted, and who can never be induced to admit anything to be what it is. There are hundreds and thousands of people who have the advantages of education, and who yet can never see anything in a clear light. They are invariably wrong in their deductions, let their premises be ever so correct: their one and one are never two, but sometimes three, and sometimes two and a fraction.

However little they know, or however much they know, they are thorough masters of all they possess. Their information is carefully stored away; a place for everything, and everything in its place; not a conglomeration of letters, such as printers call "pi," but everything arranged—every letter in its own appropriate place. These clear-headed self-helpers are not to be deceived by appearances. They never take a shadow for a substance. All the logic of Aristotle would not make them believe that white was black, or black was white. They look at facts, they believe in facts; in fact, they say with Gradgrind, what we want is facts. And it is not because—like that representative man—they taboo the creations of the imagination and the blissful dream of poetry, but because they know that the boldest flights of the imagination take their rise from the solid ground of fact.

Take any instance you please from the whole congregation of self-helpers, and you find nothing of that silly sentimentality, that vague, useless, dreaminess which distinguishes so many who are boastful of their genius.

Another characteristic of the self-helpers is strong-heartedness—they are clear-headed, strong-hearted men. There is all the difference of courage and cowardice between the helpful and the helpless. Feeble folk are those who can never help themselves, who never dare to doubt, who scarcely ever dare to think, and are kept in awe by great names and high-sounding words. These are the second-hand people of the world. They are the cement of sectarianism in church and state. They take up with a cause as a boy takes up with a coach, namely, by jumping up behind, and knowing not, caring not, whither the coach is going. These are the people who always acted one way, and who always found it the best; who abominate everything that is new, as if novelty was a deadly sin. These are the men who walk the world in a threadbare suit of outworn fallacies; who are as shallow as the justice of that name, and as obstinate and imperative as Anthony Absolute.

The difference between this class—a very large class, a very respectable class, a class holding high social position—the difference between these and the self-helper is, that while they hold tenaciously received opinions, the others are bold enough to doubt, bold enough to differ, bold enough to examine, bold enough to cast away what they find on examination to be worthless. They no more dread the ill-omened flight of philosophy and fancy athwart the good old way, than they would turn back in dismay at the sight of three magpies.

Another thing about these self-helpers is that they are hard workers. "Laborare est orare," said the old monks, "Work is worship." In such a sense, the self-helpers are devotedly religious. Says the proverb—"He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand; but the hand of the diligent maketh rich." That industry, apart from its results, is a privilege which is greatly promotive of happiness, nobody can doubt who looks fairly at the question. "It is with us," says Barrow, "as with other things in nature, which by motion are preserved in their native purity and perfection and sweetness, but are by rest corrupted, debased, and defiled." Colton says, "Idleness has made more gamblers than avarice, more drunkards than thirst, more suicides than despair." Old Dumbiedikes was wise in charging his son to be "aye sticking in a tree when he had naething else to do!"

It is by industry, diligent industry, that self-helpers succeed. Look at the history of good apprentices and faithful clerks, and see how such diligence in business is rewarded. At the outset poor, but honest and industrious, they have contentedly performed the hardest drudgery, have come to be esteemed among their associates, valued by their employers, trusted as chief confidant, even made junior partner in the concern, and finally a potent and honoured master. Such cases are common. One instance may suffice. The People's Park at Halifax, the munificent gift of Frank Crossley, Esq., has cost the liberal donor £30,000. Who is Frank Crossley? His father was a clerk in a carpet manufactory, and his mother a domestic servant.

The same thing is true of those who have succeeded in any department of literature, science, or art. Look at the case of Stephenson. He was the son of a poor labourer, a fireman to the pumping-engine of the Wylam Colliery, and known as "Old Bob" by his neighbours. His first step in life was to look after the cows of Widow Ainslie, for which he received a shilling a week, and from that point he went ahead right up the hill of difficulty, taking short, firm steps, and having his eyes well upon the ground that happened to lie next before his feet. From cow-keeping to leading horses at plough, from this to be driver of the gin-horse, from this to the office of assistant fireman, from the office of assistant to the responsible post of fireman-in-chief, till he got twelve shillings per week, and declared himself a made man for life. You must not suppose for a moment that people wake up and find themselves famous—that a great deal of reputation is unaccompanied by a great deal of labour. Nothing of the sort: the contrary is the case. Stephen-son worked hard all through his life. He steadily pursued his course, making shoes, mending clocks,—anything, everything to push his way, till he reached that distinguished position as an engineer which he ultimately attained, laying the foundation of that great railway system which has been so rapidly and so successfully developed.

These cases might be indefinitely multiplied. The self-helpers have always had to work hard, and have invariably had the will so to work. They are no mob of gentlemen who live at ease, and whose only concern is to keep up their dignity. Like the first emigrants to America, they have said, "No idle drone shall live amongst us." Not only striking while the iron is hot, they make the iron hot by striking. They have that indomitable soul of activity which prompted Edmund Burke to exclaim to his constituents, in his famous speech at Bristol, "Applaud us when we run, console us when we fall, cheer us when we recover; but let us pass on, for God's sake, let us pass on." Lead is heavy, gold is heavier, platinum, among metals, is the heaviest of all; but, take the kingdom of creation at large, and that which has the most specific gravity to make earth groan and heaven weep, is a lazy man. The industry of many persons is performed with the lower half of their head. The brain is idle but the teeth are busy. If they look after wisdom at all, they seek it in the same way that the Chinese philosopher tells us the oysters get their pearls—namely, by gaping. They forget the proverb—"The devil tempts all other men, but the idle man tempts the devil."

As the east is from the west; as the heavens are above the earth; as frost is from fire; winter from summer; day from night; and white from black; so is the difference in the one respect of idleness and industry distinctly marked between the helpful and the helpless. The former fear neither a weary brain, an aching head, nor a tired body: they fear nothing like sloth, those sturdy self-helpers. They, with their clear heads, and strong hearts, are invariably hard workers. Their growth in happiness lies in a flight from inertia to energy. They are spiritual heroes, armed with sanctified valour, venturing forward into the gulf for the disenfranchisement of mankind. They are fortified with superhuman strength, and through the "impassable pave a road."

CAROLINE.

ONE YEAR IN HEAVEN.

A YEAR hath past, O friend beloved,
Of mingled smiles and weeping,
Since thou from clinging arms removed,
Wert given to Death's keeping;
Since first the shroud its fleecy fold
Clasped o'er thy peaceful bosom,
And from thy fingers' nerveless hold
Dropped pale-rose, bud, and blossom.

A year since thou of angel name—
Its sweet and mystic spelling
We know not—durst go forth to claim
Place in the Father's dwelling:
Since round thy starry pinion glowed
The dazzling waves of azure,
And from thy lips, enraptured, flowed
The "new song's" deathless measure.

Yet, scarcely can we deem thee gone!
Within thy chamber lonely
The very echo hath a tone,
(That wakes thy memory only,
We turn to catch the sparkling eyes,
The lifted hands appealing;
We listen for thy low replies,
In soft, meek whispers stealing.

So much of heaven! meek sufferer, here,
'Twas thine in vain to cherish
Hope's cankered buds, and year by year
Watch their young brightness perish.
Long, long the winter's blight and snow,
The summer's song and blooming,
Scarce in thy darkened room could show
Thy life-lamp slow consuming.

A year of rest—here days of pain
In feverish languor ending,
'Twas thine to bear, and wait in vain
Sleep's balm at eve descending,
'Twas thine to feel, through weary nights,
From fitful dreams awaking,
That only on the Heavenly Heights
For thee a morn was breaking.

Joy! when thy wasted frame, at last,
Thrilled to the Bridegroom's warning!
We knew the halo o'er thee cast,
When burst that glorious morning.
We knew it by thine eye, the while,
There radiant gleams were lying;
We knew it by the saintly smile,
That wreathed thy lips in dying.
O stainless spirit! when thy feet
First passed the sapphire portal,
Ere thou thine own couldst scarcely greet
In beauty grown immortal;
What to thy quickened ear must seem
The angel's song and story?
Now on thine eye long-shadowed gleam
The White Throned dazzling glory.

For all the joys denied thee here,
When joy denied was sorest,
For every silent, anguished tear,
Dropped on the cross thou borest;
For that dread suffering, sweeter now,
The rest that fills thy bosom;
The thorns that pierced thy patient brow
Bear each a golden blossom.

We know that from that Radiant Land
Sometimes thy free'd glance turneth;
That o'er the home-roof's lingering band
Thy loving spirit yearneth.
Father! to thee one fervent prayer
From heart and lips up-swolled,
Room for us in that Land prepare,
Room where our lost one dwelleth.

MY WIFE SAVED IT FOR ME.

ONE hot July afternoon, when the air scorched the lungs as it was breathed in, and no business was stirring to keep the brain from going to sleep, I lay and dozed quietly and shadily in my room, which overlooked the street. Presently there came voices. Two men appeared to be in confab on my door-step. The windows were wide open, but the shutters were closed, and their voices came up to me with great clearness, so that I had no choice but to hear. The tenor of their conversation was curious. One, it seemed, had found life cheery and pleasant, and Fortune's wheel had revolved with a touch of his finger, turning all to gold. The other was at the foot of the hill, and gray-headed, as I afterwards discovered. Both were men past the middle age. Both were, to all appearance, hearty and of long-lived stock. Each had gone his way through life, and a chance meeting had led them both to sit down on my door-step and cool themselves in the shade, and they fell into an earnest talk. Evidently schoolmates once, of later years they had seen little of each other. It was a favourable opportunity, this of my door-step, to compare notes. "Tell me, John," said the more poorly clad of the two, "how you have come to get along so well and make money till you have got rich?" John's voice fell into a tender tone, as he answered, "I'll tell you: it was my wife who did it!" "Your wife, John—how?" "Why simply in this way," replied John. "One day, when I had been in business for four or five years, I wanted money badly, and didn't know where to raise twenty pounds that I needed to pay a note falling due next day. I told my wife that night. She made no reply, but rose and went to a closet handy, and came back to me, holding out a stocking, well-filled. Handing it me, she said, 'There, John, is five-and-twenty pounds, which I have saved up in sixpences and shillings; take them and do what you please with them.' I hadn't a word to say; but that taught me a lesson. I resolved to be careful of the small outgoings after that, Peter, and I was; and now, after ten years, I am worth enough to keep me and mine above want. I found that the way to make money was to be careful of the small things—a sixpence here and a shilling there. And, above all, that an economical and a loving wife may make a man instead of breaking him. My wife put a new notion into my head, and I have never forgotten it. She has made me what I never should have made of myself."

I heard Peter heave a sigh, as he acknowledged that his wife did not consult his interest, but always spent up to her income. And then I could not help thinking that if women would only realise the power they have of making a man's home happy, by adapting themselves to circumstances, how many more genial, steady husbands and fathers there would be, and how much good it would do every man to say, as John said—"My wife saved it for me. She has made me what I am—comfortable and happy and contented."

THE ANGEL OF ANNUNCIATION.

Some angel close shall stand
In old Correggio's fashion,
Bearing a lily in his hand
For death's annunciation.

MRS. BROWNING.

MRS. LANE laid down her sewing, and leaned her head wearily on her knee in bitter reverie. For a wonder, the room was quiet; the older children were rioting in the kitchen under the superintendence of the good-natured cook. The nursery-maid had gone out with the baby. Mrs. Lane had to make the most of her time. Such intervals of quiet were comparatively rare; generally the four children were clinging to her, or calling on her, or making her the umpire of their play or their disputes, until she was well-nigh distracted. Her means were limited; her strength and health overtaken with more than a mother's part in the household government. Captain Lane, in the command of a merchant vessel, was seldom at home, and when he did come, was either over-strict or over-indulgent to the children, as was natural to a man accustomed to implicit obedience, and a father seldom with his family circle. She had learned to look with dread rather than pleasure on these sudden arrivals and hurried departures for the reason already given, and one still more sadly new to her—the ever-recurring and unaccountable misunderstandings between her husband and herself, growing out of their transitory nature.

In his absence she assumed the reins of government, thrust into her unwilling and unpractised hands, and administered her husband's affairs as carefully as it was possible to do. She was rigidly frugal and economical in her expenses for herself and the children, and always acted to the best of a naturally clear judgment. Yet when he came, after the first burst of delight at being at home again had passed over, when accounts came to be settled, and arrangements discussed, he was very apt to overlook large savings for the little loss she had not guarded against. And since the judgment of no two people, unless fused in the crucible of daily discussion and comparison, can be exactly alike, he was sure to point out to her, in no measured terms, the way in which he would have arranged the matter if he had been there, forgetting that he could not after so long a time be made fully sensible of all the situations of the case which had decided her at the moment. The keen sense of injustice, which she could not wholly check at such times, was made doubly sharp by the knowledge that he never could understand her minor trials, or know how often a wife with less character or discernment than that which she knew she had exercised, with all her errors, might have led him into difficulty. Nay, how her own present industry was all the time lightening the load which otherwise, even by the feather's weight of which she relieved him, would have been too heavy for him to bear; the sewing she accomplished, the planning and turning, and looking after her domestics incessantly, lest waste should mar what industry had wrought. It was a great deal for her to effect with health weakened by maternal care and pain; and yet she could not put her sickness forth as an excuse, for what man's love is proof against an habitually ailing and complaining wife! She was schooling herself even to bear pain silently, without the comfort of his presence—and was this her reward!

She did not love her husband the less; she had not grown hard, or bitter, or resentful; but, as the body in a changeful climate becomes weakened and nerveless, so her spirit had been chilled, her heart had no courage to put forth fresh claims upon his interest and consideration. Not that he altogether withheld, or gave her praise grudgingly, she did not accuse him in that hour's reverie of that shortcoming, and he was often impulsively affectionate with nothing to call it forth; but conversation was often forgotten when desired, and when it would have helped her greatly, while the slightest fault or omission was seized and commented upon by him, unnecessarily at the moment, and from the habit, so to speak, of a mind always on the alert to detect delinquencies among his crew and petty officers; but, coming in written commands, wounded and chafed and discouraged the one of all others he had sworn to cherish.

She was not accusing him of this in her thoughts at that moment, for she never suffered the feeling to stay in her mind, even when conscious of it; and besides, her domestic difficulties were just then uppermost. She was simply disheartened. Her early life had been one of care and sorrow; her husband's love had been her first clear sunshine. Looking back morbidly over the long lapse of days and weeks, and months and years, it seemed to her morbid recollection that she would not willingly live over even the shortest of these periods, or the happiest, so clouded had each day been by some memory, or some fear; and from the future she turned with miserable forebodings of the same trials, only deepening in intensity as her strength grew less and less.

"How can people cling to life so!" she said to herself. "If the choice was offered to me, I would go willingly. My husband loves me, and would suffer heavily at first; but I am no more to him than another would some day be. I have prayed for my children from the moment they were given to me; God will answer these prayers to them, whether I am present or absent. Life has been so full of heavy cares, that death would be a welcome release."

She forced herself to resume her needle; but the cold watery twilight of a November day was rapidly fading, and the children came trooping in boisterous and turbulent; the baby fretted to be taken from the nurse's arms; the cook came for necessary articles from the storeroom, and it was long after eight before the little ones were quietly asleep, and the house made ready for their awakening. She felt too weary even for reading; her head ached with a dull throb as she bent over her book, and a dry, husky cough, the effect of yesterday's unavoidable exposure, disturbed her with its incessant irritation.

She did not sleep without prayer, it was too habitually her daily bread; but her requests were aimless and wandering, even for her husband and her children, and she sank into an uneasy and unrefreshing sleep.

For the first time since her husband's last leaving, the family physician was called in the next morning. Mrs. Lane had tried to rise, but to her dismay she sank back so faint and ill that, after the second attempt, she suffered the children to be taken out and the room to be darkened. She was in a burning fever, and every breath was drawn with acute pain. Her worst fears were realised when the physician arrived, and pronounced the symptoms to be those of inflammation of the lungs, and told her plainly that, unless immediate relief could be obtained, her sickness was not only violent but dangerous.

Two weeks of extreme suffering reduced her greatly. In all that time she had scarcely cared for the result; an impression of the mood in which it had found her seemed stamped upon her incoherent thoughts, her short and wandering dreams. But at length the fever was abated, the crisis of immediate danger past, and for the first time she had summoned strength and courage to leave her bed.

The kind neighbour who had assisted her to rise, wrapped her carefully in a blanket, and deposited her in the depths of one of their old-fashioned easy-chairs, now rarely to be met with; insisting that she should lie still, stirring neither hand nor foot till her return. The nursery door stood slightly ajar, and there she knew her children were sleeping, well, and with need of nothing. Within the sick-room all was order and quiet. A wood fire had burned low upon the hearth, and now and then shot upward with a cheerful flickering light. The bed, so smooth and white, tempted her to the rest that she had sought in vain through those days and nights of sickness. Her husband's picture stood above the mantel-piece, and she could just trace the outlines of the dear and well-remembered face.

What a rush of tender and sorrowful emotion swept over her spirit as memory filled up those outlines, and brought him, as it were, to her side, bending down to smooth her aching forehead, chafing her thin, unsteady hands, as he had done many and many a time in her hours of suffering; and he would come so full of hope and love to a desolate home.

She pictured it all as she sat there. She felt that the disease was more subtle than even her physician was aware of; its slow approach had long been noted by herself in silent apprehension. She said consumption, aloud, slowly trying to understand the full meaning of the sentence she was passing upon herself, and a hollow reverberation echoed it: yes, she should fade slowly but surely, as she had watched her own mother die. It would be all over before her husband's vessel arrived from its unusually lengthened cruise. How desolate his home would be—a stranger by the fireside—their children clamouring for her! Ah! he would miss her then; he would begin to understand what she had been to him and them. Ah, well! let it be so; better to be appreciated in death than to live on in this weary heart-sickness.

Misty tears of weakness gathered in her eyes as she pictured that return. No wifely smile and kiss of greeting; no cheerful sunshine in rooms ordered so as to look their own welcome to the wanderer from over the sea; the children in a shy, neglected group, reminding him only of his loss; and they, poor things, what could life henceforth be to them? No mother's love to turn to in their bitter, childish griefs; no mother's counsel for their youth; no mother's heart to rest upon in the heavier trials of maturer life.

Yet she had chosen to go from them, to leave her place vacant. With a sudden flash of recollection, in this racking cough, this strange feebleness, she saw her answered prayer: Death's angel stood beside her in that lonely room.

Faster and faster fell the bitter, gnawing, blinding tears. "Oh, my God! my Father, forgive me! I did not think to bring this grief, this loss, on them!"

But was it too late? Might not this repentance avert the stroke, for a time at least, until these dear ones would be better able to bear it? This weak, this miserably selfish prayer, could it not be blotted out? Another struggling forth, with even a keener anguish, came in these simple, long-forgotten words—

"Oh, spare me, that I may recover strength ere I go hence to be no more!"

Strength, not of body, but of soul. She was even content to welcome the life of a suffering, hopeless invalid; a harder trial than any she had yet known. Life at any price she craved, for the first time since it had been given her, not for its pleasures, not for its ease, nor even for simple comfort. Life to avert sorrow and trial and hardship, which she had sunk under, that she might avert it from them who had been given to her keeping.

And so they laid her on the snow-white bed, faint and exhausted by emotion; her closed eyelids still heavy with tears, her thin hands still clasped, and her pale lips trembling, as it were, with the prayer, and thus she sank to the first deep and quiet slumber she had known for many weeks.

When she once more left her sick-room, and friends congratulated her and called her restoration to her family "almost a miracle," how dear life had suddenly become, how doubly dear her husband and her children! She counted every throb, as it were, of returning strength; she gathered up and turned to its best account every moment of time—she who had been so near eternity! The Angel of Annunciation had done his work, and other "misrouting spirits," who were given charge concerning her, moved the stumbling-blocks from her no longer wandering feet, until she could tread the upward path in patience, upheld by a new and steadfast hope. Her household, her very children, seemed to breathe this strange atmosphere of peace; and when she thought of her husband, it was not with a desire that she might be more fully loved and cherished, but that from henceforth she might be doubly strong to make his life happiness for him.

Spring had come again; April's sunny, changeable sky looked in upon her instead of the dull November gloom, as she sat by the window, not bending down upon her hands, but with an upraised and joyful face, counting "the rosary of her mercies" instead of her trials. Even her husband's still indefinite absence was cheered by the thought of the greater self-conquest she could achieve, as she read a letter, that day unexpectedly received, and bringing a reward more precious than gold or silver, in the tender interest called out by the first news of her illness; but especially in one little paragraph, written weeks before it had reached him.

"I have been thinking so much of you lately, dear; not that you and the children are ever out of my thoughts, but I think I have never realised so fully as in the past few weeks how delicate you really are, and how much care my absence must give you. Not one woman in a thousand would do as you have done in everything, and if ever I have seemed to blame you or find fault in any way, I beg you, my dear wife, to forgive it; and trust me that it shall never be so in the future again. I can hope some day to be able to give up the sea, as you have so long wished me to do, this voyage has been so unusually fortunate, and then you shall never have a care or a trouble that I can take from you.

"What made me think of writing this is, that I happened to overhear two of the men talking to each other, last night, about some misunderstanding.

"It don't do to judge too quick," said one.

"No, nor to be too hard upon anybody," answered his mate.

"It struck home like an arrow, my dear wife, for I had just sent that letter about the children; but I know you will forgive me, as I said before, and can trust me to act differently for the future."

EPIGRAM

"MARRIAGE, not mirage, Jane, here in your letter;
With your education, you surely know better."
Quickly spake my young wife, while I sat in confusion,
"Tis quite correct, Thomas, they're each an illusion."

RIGHT REV. DR. ROBERT BICKERSTETH, BISHOP OF RIPON.

ALTHOUGH there is nothing incompatible in general popularity and the efficient discharge of episcopal duties, it does not often happen that a public favourite finds a place on the bench of bishops. Of course the charge of a parish differs considerably from the superintendence of a whole diocese, and the qualities required for one may not be of equal value in the other. The minister whose eloquent and fervid appeals have drawn multitudes together, and impressed the careless and indifferent with the importance of divine things, may be, and very often is, a man of quite another stamp from the one chosen for a bishopric. And the same thing is true with regard to the hard-working clergy. The vicar of a populous parish may devote himself, heart and soul, to the welfare of those committed to his spiritual care: he may go beyond ordinary pastoral duties—establish new preaching stations and make extraordinary appeals; he may extend his influence and exertion farther than the duties of his office are supposed to require, and look after the health and homes of his poorer parishioners. Still such a man, eminently useful as he is, may not, after all, be the kind of man of which government makes bishops.

Indeed, there is very little doubt that the time-worn practice is still kept up—of selecting bishops for some other reason than fitness for the office: routine, red tape, family interest, political opinions, have all had something to do in furnishing the episcopal bench. We need not argue the question, whether it is right or wrong; it is enough to know that it does exist, and that many a man, with all the qualifications for a good bishop in him, has died a curate, "passing rich on forty pounds a year."

But it is not always so. The episcopal bench is not exclusive. There is a prospect of a clever and energetic clergyman obtaining a seat there in the House of Peers: and two or three cases of the kind have recently occurred.

There is Dr. Bickersteth, for instance, the present Bishop of Ripon. Few men have enjoyed so much popularity or accomplished so much good. He has been a hardworking man all his life, and with no extraordinary ability to begin with, and no particularly influential friends to smooth his path, has made his way from a Leicestershire curacy to the bishopric of Ripon. And all through his active ministerial life he has been eminently popular and exceedingly useful. His sermons have been characterised by common sense, hearty earnestness, and strong religious feeling. His piety has not exhausted itself in polemical discussion, nor wasted itself in bitter controversy, nor crippled itself by restriction to duties strictly ministerial. On the contrary, it has given him comprehensive and charitable views, and has set him busily at work to improve the condition of those who have not the means to improve their own.

St. Giles is a name indicative of all that is vicious and miserable. The Rookery for centuries was notorious in the annals of crime. Running a splendid street through the middle of it, pulling down the nests, and making the ragged rooks take to flight, did not, and could not, at all alter the social evil of which a St. Giles's rookery was the result. It might conceal, but could not cure the malady.

The deplorable condition of the poor round about his church excited the sympathy of Bickersteth. The criminal and the vicious, the drunkard, the blasphemous, the idler, and the thief, were so because they were in want of religion. So Piety has said, and said truly, for many and many a day. But Dr. Bickersteth knew well enough that these pariahs wanted something done for them before they could appreciate the blessings of religion. To visit those who had no fire and no food, and were sinking into the grave for want, and talk to them of the gospel, was not all that was required. The story of what happened eighteen hundred years ago in Palestine, was not likely to commend itself abstractedly to their attention; they wanted the practical part of the gospel, that should minister to their temporal wants, relieve their present necessities, deliver them from the kingdom of dirt and disorder, rescue them from typhus traps, and make them feel that they were human.

And it is much to the credit of Dr. Bickersteth that he threw all his energy into the scale of social improvement, and that while "the poor had the gospel preached to them," their condition as human beings was elevated, their sufferings relieved, and a better prospect than they had ever known stretched out before them.

As rector of St. Giles's, Dr. Bickersteth became one of the best known preachers and efficient workers in

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT REV. R. BICKERSTETH, LORD BISHOP OF RIPON. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

London. His thoroughly evangelical principles commended him to dissenters as well as a large section of the church; and if, as was sure to be the case, there were some who could not subscribe to his creed, there was not one but could appreciate his devoted efforts to raise the fallen as well as to recover the lost.

It is with much pleasure that we offer our humble meed of approbation to Dr. Bickersteth. We regard him as the friend of the working classes and the suffering poor; and, whether as curate or bishop, we feel sure that he will never tire of such friendship.

The accompanying portrait of Dr. Bickersteth is accurately copied from a beautiful photograph by Mayall; and the following brief sketch of his past life is in every respect authentic.

Dr. Bickersteth was born in 1816 at Acton, Suffolk. He is the fourth son of the Rev. John Bickersteth, rector of Sapcote, Leicestershire. He was originally intended for the medical profession, and studied at St. Thomas's Hospital. He subsequently felt a conviction that the church was his calling, and graduated at Cambridge in 1841. In the same year he accepted the curacy of Sapcote; afterwards officiated at Clapham; in 1845 was appointed to the incumbency of St. John's; and in 1851 was presented by Lord Truro with the living of St. Giles; in 1854 he was appointed to the canonry of Salisbury; and in 1856 to the bishopric of Ripon.

He married, in 1846, the third daughter of the late Joseph Garde, Esq., of Cork; and in the same year took the degree of M.A. It was a matter of some surprise that the Golden Lectureship, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Melville, was not given to Dr. Bickersteth; but the fact seems to be that the see of Ripon was intended for him, and that on this account he declined other engagements.

THE TOMB OF ACBAR KHAN AT AGRA.

OUR recent triumph at Agra, in the brilliant victory achieved by Greathed, imparts an occasional interest to that ancient city. But irrespective of this, Agra itself is interesting in many respects; and there are in its neighbourhood, as well as within its walls, memorials of the past glory of India, and indications of a better civilisation than is now known to its people.

About six miles from Agra is the tomb of Acbar Khan. The building is exceedingly splendid, and does credit to the taste and skill of the Indian architects. The building was erected by his son the Emperor Jehangire. There, in the recent mutiny, the rebels made a stand, and defended the "Holy Place" with a good deal of determination. But they were not the sort of men that Acbar Khan would have approved, as anybody at all acquainted with his history must know.

Acbar Khan, by all accounts, was one of the most successful and powerful monarchs that ever reigned in Hindostan. He ascended the throne in 1555, and his administration was distinguished by wisdom and equity. While his generals were busily occupied in adding to his dominions, he and his prime ministers were equally busy framing laws and introducing new regulations for the subjugated provinces. A methodical survey of the Mogul dominions was drawn up, comprising an account of the revenues, manufactures, and agricultural productions of the various districts. This work is still extant, under the title of "Ayeen Acberry," and affords valuable material for the historian.

First ascertaining the real condition of his country, Acbar Khan adapted his new regulations to the means at his disposal, and carried on his administration with the utmost vigour.

The country was re-divided into eleven soobahs, or states; these were subdivided into circars, and these last into pergunnahs, which distinctions exist at the present day.

Literature found a patron in Acbar Khan, and education flourished under his rule. He established schools and directed the compilation of books. Arts and industry were also fostered by him; and no country appears ever to have been in a more prosperous state than the Mogul Empire in his reign. The same sort of thing is noticeable in the history of most other nations. The power or splendour of a country culminates in an individual. What Solomon was to Palestine and Elizabeth to England, was Acbar Khan to India.

TOMB OF ACBAR KHAN, NEAR AGRA.

There was abundance everywhere in his dominions. No heavy burdens were imposed on his subjects. The revenues, however, amounted to an enormous sum, and it appeared that the public coffers were always better filled the less the people were taxed: a plan which other governments might try with advantage—to the people at all events.

Acbar Khan was no great warrior, but he effected that for his country which could never have been accomplished by the most brilliant victories. That he knew how to wield the sword, and that territorial acquisitions were made in his reign, there can be no doubt; but it was the improvement, and not the extension of his dominions, to which Acbar chiefly devoted himself, and for which his memory is revered.

The ancient city of Agra having become much dilapidated, Acbar determined to rebuild it, and to constitute that city the metropolis of India. With this object in view, he summoned the most skilful artizans and mechanics, and with their assistance the towers, temples, and palaces at Agra rose from their ruins with increased splendour. But of all the palaces of Agra, none equalled in magnificence that of Acbar Khan himself. Of course there was much rivalry among the rajahs, who should have the most splendid dwelling, but none could attempt competition with the great Acbar himself. A palace! by all accounts it was a palace formed of palaces,—

"A palace as for fairy prince,
A vast pavilion, such as man
Saw never, since mankind began
To build and glaze."

There was gold everywhere—except where precious stones flashed in the meridian splendour of the Indian sun. If Aladdin had been there with his wonderful lamp, the erection could not have been more magnificent in every detail. Everything that could in any way contribute to luxurious indulgence was treasured up within its walls, and without were the fairest gardens that the eye of man ever beheld, whilst fountains cast their perfumed waters into the air to fall again in a shower of spray, and to impart a delicious coolness to the place.

The policy of this Acbar Khan was in a high degree liberal to foreigners. He invited intelligent men of all nations to settle in his capital; and he gave them every encouragement to do so, permitting them the free use of their religion and customs, and granting them various privileges and immunities, such as were unknown in countries more proud of their civilisation. At the very time that this Mohammedan was exercising charity and benevolence, was endowing colleges for the instruction of Christian missionaries, and giving freedom to all religious teachers, Europe was convulsed by the demon of persecution, and the blood of Christians was shed by Christians in the name of Christianity!

The Portuguese had at that period extended their commercial enterprise into the Indian Ocean. Acbar opened an intercourse with them, and invited the Portuguese government to send missionaries into his empire, that the Hindoos might learn something of Christianity. So far from displaying the bigotry which has characterised most of the Mohammedans, Acbar appears to have understood the principles of religious toleration in the fullest sense of that term. In his letter to the King of Portugal he censured in the strongest language the slavish propensity of mankind to adopt without inquiry the religious opinions of their fathers. At the same time he desired to be favoured with translations of the religious books of the Christians.

In one of his proclamations addressed to the officers of his empire, he uttered the following sentiment:—

"The most acceptable adoration in this world which a man can pay to his Maker is to discharge his duty faithfully towards his fellow-creatures, discarding passion and partiality, and without distinction of friend or foe, relative or stranger." This enlightened sentiment, which might have been learned from the New Testament, conveys the most favourable idea of Acbar Khan, better than all the buildings he erected, and all the triumphs he won;—even better than the monument which filial piety erected to his memory.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

COMING AND GOING.

GET into a London omnibus on a wet day. There is just "room for one" on the right-hand side.

Not a single passenger on that side is going to leave the vehicle till he gets to the end of the journey; and yet, ten to one, you will be passed along through that crush of knees right up to the top. There you will sit down, half of you on a lady's lap, the other half on the sharp handle of an old gentleman's umbrella.

If one thought occurs to you at that moment with greater force than any other, it is that you are not wanted there.

Directly the door was opened, and the cad assured you, "Plenty o' room, sir," giving a click or a hiss, or a slap of the leather on the roof, to tell the driver he might shake you down into your proper place as soon as he pleased, you discovered at once that you were not wanted there.

The stiff gentleman against the door, with the pointed whiskers coming down towards his waistcoat pockets, and a very loud breastpin, and a shirt with a small red pattern on it, audibly grunted as he squeezed his feet under him to let you pass, but purposely left his umbrella for you to trip over.

You could hear the young lady with the pretty lisp, and the silk dress covering three or four persons on all sides of her, whisper distinctly to the old man, her father, "Dear me! where is he to go? I'm sure there's no room!"

And then, when you were fairly seated, and had done bowing apologies to the lady whose reticule you had crushed, to the infinite peril of smelling-bottle and card-case, you look round on eleven faces, all either frowning or studiously contemptuous.

To be sure, one or two of them gave you a hand in the course of your struggle, which was like corks to a sinking swimmer; but then you knew, all the while, it was only to keep you from coming bodily down upon them, and was more for their sakes, a good deal, than yours.

And so every face as plainly as possible seemed to say, as you panted and settled down, "Why, in the name of goodness, didn't the man walk, or take a cab?"

And the remarkable thing, good reader, is this—that on that same wet day, if somebody gets out, and so makes room for another corner, the conductor has no sooner called out "Hard!" and clicked and hissed as before, to let in a twelfth passenger, than you will be sure to feel just as they all felt towards you; and, unless it is after dinner, and you are in no hurry to get on, and are in a good humour, the likelihood is, you'll frown, and privately "Pshaw!" as much as any of them did when you were welcomed; and, though you're very cold, and want to be snug, you'll punish the unfortunate arrival by passing him along to your place in the corner, and then feel gloriously avenged on society for your own reception, and be happy till "Hard!" or "Hist!" comes again!

The "new boy" at school has a similarly pleasant time of it. It is looked upon by every Smith and Brown as an impertinence, or a sign of weakness, to be new.

Smith maximus takes no notice whatever; and, if he runs up against him, begs the new boy's pardon, as if he were a stranger in Ludgate-hill. Brown minimus makes him uncomfortable by noticing his trowsers, or the smoothness of his hair, as he never would have dared to do, had the new boy come last week instead of this.

Now, it was a very painful, or, at least, unpleasant, consciousness of this state of mind towards him that Hugh Church encountered, when he found himself established as junior and lowest copying clerk in the office of Messieurs the lawyers in that dark city lane.

Ruth had made him look very neat for the first morning.

He was tall for his age; but the clean turn-down collar, tied with new black ribbon, became that pale, thoughtful face very well indeed; and when he took his seat at the desk, under the immediate patronage of his bookstall acquaintance, Hugh secretly resolved that it should not be his fault if his friend ever became ashamed of him.

But the confidential clerk had an office to himself, and so young Church was left to the inspection and the curiosity of three or four knowing ones, who immediately began, in their own way, to make him pay the footing of a new-comer.

"Ask him if he'd like gloves for those delicate knuckles, Jos," said one of the clerks, in a loud whisper across the skin he was engrossing.

"Young 'un," cried the party addressed as Jos, "tell us how many sisters Richard Roe, Esquire, has, and whether John Doe has any chance with the eldest? 'Full many a gem of purest ray serene.'"

And they all laughed into their coat-sleeves among the bundles of bluish paper, tied with the red tape.

"I say," said another, "what's the settlement of a conveyance?"

"Making over property quite safe to somebody else," said Hugh, in a moment.

"Not a bit of it, softy," said the wit; "it's an omnibus smashing a cab."

And stale as it was, they all laughed again at the joke, and none laughed louder than Hugh himself.

Jos was a young man, two or three years Hugh's senior, and his name in full was Joseph Frederick Flowers. His parents were proud of him, and, therefore, he soon left them very little indeed to be proud of. They had resolved upon his going to the bar as soon as he had learned a little of the other branch of the profession; but there was already a different kind of bar at which Mr. Flowers very diligently and splendidly practised, and where he often astonished the less accomplished frequenters by snatches from well-known classics, English or foreign, with which Mr. Flowers enlivened his conversation, and annoyed the sensible part of the public.

It was not long before Hugh discovered that this young limb of the law sought to make a companion of him out of office hours; for with Flowers, as indeed with all the rest, the day for chaffing was soon over,—young Church had taken it so well, not softly and feebly, but without offence, and sometimes even replying, with very good effect.

"Kirk," said Flowers, one afternoon, Scotticising his young friend's name, as he generally did, "what do ye say to looking in upon the muses to-night? I'll do the amiable for the pleasure of your society—'Lives there a man with soul so dead?'"

"Why, thank ye," said Hugh, "I think not to-night, for they're not very well at my quarters, and I promised to be in early. You must put me down among the dead ones, to-night, Flowers, I'm afraid."

"Your quarters!" said the other. "By-the-by, you've never told me yet who you've got in your quarters. Married, Kirk, eh?"

"Not exactly. I've an aunt, and a good old grandmother, who (I mean the old lady) is getting very feeble, and I want to be with the good old soul as long as I can. She won't be here long, I know."

"Stick to her, Kirk. You're a good fellow! I'm blown if you won't be a regular church, parson and all, to me, if we live a little longer. I always say my prayers when I think of you at undressing-time. When I forget you, I forget my supplications."

And Flowers laughed, and slapped Hugh on the back.

"Still," said Jos, "the eminent lady will hardly 'shuffle off this mortal coil' while we go for an hour's spree. Eh! will she? Not 'die and make no sign,' Kirk, sure?"

"No, I hope not, but I think I must be at home to-night, thank ye. Some other time we'll have an hour somewhere."

And so it passed off, for that occasion.

Mr. Flowers remarking, as he went away to make a "motion of course" at the bar of the Pig and Whistle, that delays were dangerous. Hugh heard him mouthing to himself, as he swaggered down the street, "Where is To-morrow? In another world!"

That night, there was a very earnest conversation at number nineteen, about the gins and snares of London life.

Ruth had lost a brother, many years ago, and she always believed that London life killed him.

So she very often talked in a nice, motherly way to the lad, and watched him very narrowly, growing always very anxious if he came home more than half an hour beyond his usual time.

There was not much danger of his being entrapped, for he grudged even the seven or eight hours he gave to sleep—so close kept he to those rough brown leather books, with which his friend at the office kept him well supplied.

His studies, however, had one rather lengthened check: a check for which Mr. Flowers was in no way responsible.

It was not long after the above conversation.

Hugh and Ruth, one afternoon, walked very slowly:—especially slow and feeble Ruth's pace was—in fact, Hugh felt the weight on his thin arm almost too much for him.

They walked out of the house, and walked away to a corner of the old city churchyard, the same old church.

And when they came back again to number nineteen, they both almost started to see the little low arm-chair in the chimney corner empty, as if they hadn't expected it.

And then the daughter sat down close to Hugh, and putting her arms round his neck, and covering her face in his breast, while he clasped her in his gentle, loving way, as a son would a mother, Ruth said—

"I've no one, now, but you to love me, dear. We must be more than ever to each other now, Hugh."

The lad's sobs were nearly as loud as Ruth's.

And he was not ashamed of it.

Still his books found a difference in him for a time, and Mrs. Wofield's death, perhaps, made it a month longer than it would have been otherwise, before the senior partner in the firm was so astonished at his progress (for, unlike many masters, he had a pride in his clerks, and regularly questioned them in law), that he articulated Hugh forthwith, and paid the cost of the stamps himself.

CHAPTER XXIX.

NUMBER NINETEEN TO LET.

HUGH had been installed for some months as an articulated clerk, when, one day, Mr. Sporlock, the chief partner, who had long known by kind inquiry the circumstances of the little family at number nineteen, called young Church into his office.

"Church, I want a few words with you. I'm not sure that you'll approve of what I'm going to say, but if you don't, no harm will be done, and you'll give me credit for meaning well, at all events."

Hugh bowed, and said how much obliged he was.

And well he might be, for, all this time, as he had been earning no money in a regular way, Mr. Sporlock had been a real friend to Ruth, and had made her position in many ways more comfortable than she had ever hoped to see it.

"The fact is," said the good-natured lawyer, "there's a friend of mine, a client, who mentioned to me yesterday that he was on the look-out for some one to take the management of his house, see after the servants, you know, and all that sort of thing,—a kind of housekeeper, in fact. He is a widower—a clergyman who has lost his wife, and a very kind, good man altogether. Now it did occur to me, Church, that if Miss Wofield has not become over much attached to the needle, this would be the very thing for her; what do you say, Church? At all events, she might try it, eh? Do you think your aunt would like it?"

Long before this Mr. Sporlock had heard all about the family, and knew a great deal more about Hugh's origin than he knew himself.

The young man looked down on the ground, and his lips moved nervously, as if he were trying to control himself, which he hardly succeeded in doing.

"Don't hesitate a moment, my dear fellow," said the lawyer, "if you don't like the idea. I only thought—"

"Pray, pray, sir, don't think I hesitate. I only can't tell you how much my aunt and I—"

"Ah, well! if that's it, just talk it over with Miss Wofield to-night, and let me know to-morrow, or in a day or two. Perhaps your aunt wouldn't mind looking in at the office, and having a few words with me about it; and then I would give her my friend's address, and they could see whether or not they can come to an arrangement. I've got Mr. Bliss—his name is the Rev. Marmaduke Bliss—to promise he'll do nothing till he hears from me."

"What would become of me?" asked Hugh, encouraged by his master's freedom.

"I've thought of that," said the lawyer, "and mentioned you to Bliss. There would be no difficulty whatever in your having a room in the house; it's a large place; and if you play your cards well, my boy, this Mr. Bliss may even be of some use to you as well. From what I've told him about you, he's quite prepared to do a little towards directing your reading, and the rest of it."

And so it all came about.

You may be sure there was a good deal of talking and consulting before matters were thoroughly arranged, but—they were arranged.

And the last evening at number nineteen was a memorable time.

Ruth was born there; her father had died there, and her mother too. So the poor girl looked round on the little rooms with very much affectionate sorrow, before they retired to rest on that last night.

Hugh brought the bible, as he always did in the evening (the old lady had charged them never to forget that, as long as they lived), and they sat down for evening worship.

"Hugh."

"Yes."

"Read, will you, the 121st Psalm? It was a favourite of dear mother's."

And so the young man read on, through those precious words that have been the joy of millions through life's changes:—

"The Lord is thy keeper: the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand."

"The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night."

"The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil: he shall preserve thy soul."

"The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore."

And then Hugh knelt down, and Ruth knelt beside him.

There are finer prayers, and longer ones, in your splendid churches, and in great men's houses. But Heaven seldom hears a heartier or more sincere request, than when the poor founding finished the family devotion in these words:—

"Grant that wherever we go we may never forget the mercies we have had in this little room. May we never be ashamed of those whom we have known and loved while we lived here. May they never be ashamed of us. 'The Lord preserve our going out and our coming in, from this time forth, and even for evermore.' For Jesus Christ's sake, amen."

If angels are "ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation," doubt not that, on that night, there were some spirits, made very like unto the angels, that fitted to and fro, faithful sentinels, dividing their watch between those two sleeping chambers in that humble Christian home!

CHAPTER XXX.

CLEANS AN ESCUTCHEON.

RUTH (who had seemed, since the new change came upon her, to take a new lease of life; for she had gained something to love with a new love, which has often-times appeared as a remedy for threatening disease), now called—the better to suit her new duties—Mrs. Wofield, saw very little of Mr. Bliss, for he had a living in the country; and the large house at Hackney, over which she had entire control, for eight months at least in the year, took up but little of her time.

Hugh was a kind of protection to the establishment, which consisted only of a few old substantial retainers, whom the clergyman (rare blessing!) had inherited with his property from his father and mother. Young Church had a room entirely to himself, half bedroom, half study, at the top of the house, where Mr. Bliss frequently came when he was in town, and gave him useful hints about that portion of his reading (a very small portion, by the way) which did not come under the superintendence of Mr. Sporlock.

They had gone on thus in great comfort for little more than a year, when one morning Ruth was summoned to the library, during a visit of her employer, who begged her to be seated, as he had a word or two to say to her.

"Our young lawyer makes fine progress, Mrs. Wofield."

"I hope so, sir," Ruth answered. "He works very hard."

"Very, Mrs. Wofield. But it is not about him I wish just now to speak to you, though I cannot help congratulating you on his prospects. My friend Sporlock says he shall make a man of him, as sure as can be, if Hugh's health will but hold out; we must take care of that, great care, Mrs. Wofield."

"But now, the fact is, I am expecting, in about ten days, to leave London—to leave England, in fact, perhaps for two or three years, perhaps for longer."

Ruth showed some mark of surprise, perhaps a touch also of anxiety.

"Your position, however, will not, I hope, be altered in any way; for I cannot part with these old servants; and besides that, it's not unlikely that a distant relation of mine will reach England in my absence—a lady and her family from India; and if they do, they have had my invitation to make their home here; and you will then be a little merrier, Mrs. Wofield."

"There is, however, one favour I want to ask you to do me."

"I hope you will command me, sir, in anything and everything," Ruth answered.

"Thank you. Here is a paper, a sealed paper, which I desire to leave in your hands in case any casualty should happen to me, and I never should land in the old country again—for you know how uncertain everything here is, Mrs. Wofield."

Ruth sighed, and prepared for the commission, whatever it might turn out to be.

"I have hesitated within myself a long time as to whether I would not leave this paper with Sporlock, but on some accounts I prefer leaving it with you. If you hear of my death, you will take this packet at once to Mr. Sporlock; and if you yourself should be ill, you will promise me, I hope, to let some one see that he has it, for it is of great importance. I don't, however, want Sporlock to have anything to do with it at present, for reasons of my own. There are, nevertheless, Mrs. Wofield, other reasons why I will tell you at once what this packet means, in order that you may understand its great, or at least possibly great importance, and take the more care about it."

"I'm sure you may depend upon me, sir."

"I know it, I know it—I am quite sure of it. Nearly twenty years ago, Mrs. Wofield—(now mind, this is perfectly confidential, and is to be as sacred as anything you ever heard and kept in your life. I don't know why I trust you, but I do. I see in your countenance that you will bury what I am going to say as long as I ask you to bury it.)"

"Indeed I will, sir: only bringing it out (do I understand?) in case of—"

"In case of my death, when this packet will be the warrant and the proof of what I am going to tell you."

"Twenty years ago, or very nearly, I was a wild young man, living in London, with more money than wisdom, and more companions than was good for me. I took it into my head that I should like to travel. My father took it into his head (and nothing would drive out) that I should go into the church."

Ruth inclined her head, and listened respectfully.

"We were both obstinate. I, for foreign adventure, being weary with gay life in England;—my father obstinate for making me a clergyman. He said he had two livings in his gift, and ever since I was born he had destined me for holy orders. Well, we hit at last on a very clever compromise. We would both have our own way. I would be a missionary—not, I'm afraid, Mrs. Wofield, for any love of the missionary work, but to see life, and come home and tell the wonders of the world. My father agreed. He thought a year or two among Caffres or Hindoos would quite content me, and that I should soon be home again to fill the livings, or one of them, his ambition had purchased for me. Well, I determined that before going out—for I resolved to go out entirely on my own foundation; I dare say no society would have had me—I determined to walk the hospitals, as it is called,—that is, to qualify myself as a doctor; which I thought would bring me most speedily and intimately into contact with the native population, wherever I might settle. I did so, and got a very tolerable acquaintance with medical science; and, in fact, passed very good examinations. I wonder at it, for I was at times very, very wild, and broke out now and then in a very riotous style. I told you I had companions; I had one especially—a bad, foolish fellow, whose name I cannot now tell you: it is in this packet, when it is wanted. This friend came to me one night, and made me his partner in a most disgraceful trick. He had the worst designs upon a poor girl, a governess, or lady's maid, or something of that sort, somewhere in London. I am ashamed to say, Mrs. Wofield, that I agreed to join my friend. But, as you will see presently, I was not quite so bad as I appeared, and must have appeared since to the poor girl."

At this point, Ruth, in spite of herself, began to turn very pale, and even moved her chair, involuntarily, an inch backward from the table.

"Miss—Miss—what was her name? (however, no matter: indeed, you had better not know)—positively insisted upon marriage. Will you believe it? My friend concocted, after a good deal of inquiry and trouble—forged, in point of fact, a note from the rector of a London parish to the sexton, or clerk; and I, a medical student, was to act the parson. This was actually done, Mrs. Wofield, and in a few weeks my wretched victim (for she was mine, as well as his) knew the worst, and was turned adrift on the world, as an unmarried girl!"

"Mrs. Wofield, that poor girl, I know, had an infant. For his sake alone this packet has been prepared, should he be yet alive."

"You understand, that I read the service in the church, that morning, a medical student disguised as a clergyman. I had never said a word to my friend about my other character, for, truth to tell, I should have been ashamed (yes, even I should have been ashamed) to be known as looking forward to holy orders, while I lived the life this friend knew me to be living."

"Well, Mrs. Wofield, I may be said to have caught that scheming villain in his own net, at the very moment when he thought I was doing him a service."

"I had obtained a title, and was ordained to priest's orders, the very week before that ceremony with my friend and his victim."

Ruth clasped her hands together, and cried out (she couldn't help it), "God, I thank thee!"

"There was no sacrilege, Mrs. Wofield. There was no cruelty. Those two persons were married, before God and man. And this packet contains my solemn affidavit to the effect of what I have told you, in order that the child, should he be yet living, may ascertain and prove to all the world, that there is no blot on his birth."

"But," gasped Ruth, little thinking what she was about, "the horrid man married afterwards! He must then have committed—"

"Married!" cried Mr. Bliss; "married afterwards! How do you know this? It is true; but how do you know anything of this sad history? I was not prepared for this!"

Ruth Wofield immediately rose, and rushed towards her employer, and with unaffected earnestness, dropped upon her knee before him, and covering her face with both her hands, sobbed out—

"Oh, sir, you have made me so, so happy. My poor boy's mother had cleared herself before she died. Ah! to be sure—yes, she died first. Yes, she died before this Latson was married. So he just escaped the fangs of the law, though he couldn't avoid the fangs of his own conscience."

"But I was going to say, she was innocent, for she believed herself married, and told her father so on her deathbed. But it would have been a terrible blow to poor Hugh—"

"What!" shouted the other. "What! am I right?"

I half thought—no, it can hardly be said I thought; but to tell you the honest truth—putting together a few words Sporlock told me, and a certain sort of likeness the lad bears to Latson (for now you know the name there's no use in blanks and dashes)—I had really a kind of vague notion that there might be a connection between us of that sort. And this dreamy idea made me resolve on having this talk with you, as well as leaving with you this packet."

"And so, really, are you quite certain, Mrs. Wofield. Is Hugh Latson's son? But Church—Hugh Church—where did he get that name from?"

And then out came the whole story—so much of it, at least, as Ruth felt at liberty to tell.

And there was, be sure, a fearful retribution exacted that day from the Rev. Marmaduke Bliss, as he learned from his housekeeper's lips, that though he had saved the honour of Hugh's birth, he had been an accomplice, deliberate and direct, in his mother's death.

CHAPTER XXXI.

A REVELATION.

SUNDAY morning, the day after the discovery in the library.

Sunday morning, when the tired city is at rest,—at rest, whether it worships or scorns to worship, whether it thanks the God of the Sabbath, or blasphemes him.

Say what you will, clever lecturers and pamphleteers, you might as well begin to talk and scribble against the uses of going to sleep as against the blessings of a day of rest. You are the "unjust" on which this gentle rain of blessing drops against your will. You are the "evil" ones, on whom you cannot prevent the Sabbath sun from shining.

It is something, is it not, to walk for one day in seven, from Whitechapel to Charing-cross, without that roar and clash, clang and hustling, that turn strong men's brains, and wear them out before their time, through all the rest of the year?

It is something, is it not, for poor Scott the carter to wake up and think that he may let the old wheels rest in the yard, and each worn and weary horse lie still in his stall for twenty-four hours longer; for yonder boy, fresh from the country, not yet used to the fag of apprentice life in London, to start up, as his new alarm tells him it is six o'clock; but, rubbing his eyes, discern that no shutters will tire his thin arms this morning, and he has one day to think of the little family in Devonshire, and what they will be doing, hour by hour, as the day goes on?

It is something, is it not, for honest Sam Grouting to come home on Saturday night, to Pentonville, after six days' work away in Surrey, on some new buildings there, and, waking up on Sunday morning, marvel where he is, and see the little things come flocking up to his knee, pushing for the first place, till the whole nine have been kissed and welcomed, according to their ages?

Do you think that honest Sam finds the Sunday a dull day, as he leaves the chapel or church door, in the bright sunshine (for it doesn't always rain on Sunday, it really doesn't, good lecturer and pamphleteer), and fetches a little compass on the way home to a Sunday dinner, that he may see how quiet and how happy all the world is looking, comparing it at least, as he does, with what it is on any other day?

Friends of anti-Sunday, what the day is to the people who know how to use it for its own full sake, we cannot pretend to explain to you; and you are only foolish, not telling falsehoods, when you say you see nothing in the Christian's Sunday.

But, hear another thing—if you succeeded in happy Old England, and made a Wednesday of every Sunday, opening all shops, turning on all the steam in all the factories, and crowding all the highways, and separating all parents and families, as you would, depend on it, you would have your thousands of mere men of business, and poor hardworkers in tow and country leaguely together, like the barons in King John's day, and ready to go up to Westminster, and demand their old Sunday, as another Magna Charta.

One more thing we tell you, dear gentlemen. If you yourselves thought you would succeed in getting rid of Sunday, you would not dare to try.

Certain failure makes you wondrous bold. Well, it was on this Sunday morning, that Ruth and Hugh walked in the afternoon away across the fields, on the banks of the Lee.

They talked of the past, and they were very thankful; of the present, and were very happy. And then they spoke of the time to come.

Ruth, with a woman's delicacy, steered the conversation, and so guided it out and in, round and round, until Hugh said—

"Aunt, would you tell me any single thing in the world, which I don't know, and which you do?"

On Friday last, Ruth would have said, "No, not quite."

As it is, she answered—

"Everything, dear Hugh. Why?"

"If mother were alive, and walking with us this afternoon, and Mr. Sporlock or Mr. Bliss were to meet us all together, would they be ashamed to speak to us, or should we be sorry that they knew who mother was?"

"What an odd question, dear Hugh!"

"Not odd, dear aunt; not so odd, believe me. For, with the world, fathers and mothers never die."

"What do you mean, Hugh?"

"I mean, that what you have never told me, may be learned some day by other people, and if it is against me, as I sometimes fear it is, I would rather have never been born, aunt."

The young man unconsciously dropped Ruth's arm, and put his hand to his forehead, relieved by having spoken, but with plenty of burden remaining behind.

And so, as tenderly and joyfully as you may be sure she would, on that day, when thousands were being taught of another and more divine adoption, Ruth explained to her adopted boy, that nobody except his father (though she missed that) needed to be ashamed of the little bundle that had grown up into Hugh Church.

HUGH MILLER; OR, HARDSHIP MADE EASY.

It has not unfrequently happened that lads possessing the highest attributes of genius have been obliged, for the sake of a livelihood, to engage in labour which, while affording sufficient means for a bare subsistence, has cramped their intellectual energies, and for a time hindered their mental development. Many a youth whose faculties gave early promise of future greatness has, through the crushing weight of outward circumstances, been excluded from the blessings of education, and doomed to serve a hard apprenticeship to the plough, the loom, or the anvil. It is very cheering, however, to note how in almost innumerable instances the lad of genius has, notwithstanding his many disadvantages, made for himself a clear path to fame through the seemingly hopeless jungle which imprisoned his early hopes and aspirations.

But it is observable that those who have raised themselves to eminence from positions of hardship and obscurity, have been those who patiently complied with the conditions which stern necessity imposed upon them, and who were determined, through faith in the purpose which possessed them, to extract honey from the rock and oil from the flinty rock. Believing in the dignity of labour, and manifesting that grand independence for which honest poverty gives such large scope, they went to manual toil like men, and drew from it what nourishment they could for their life's idea.

The story of HUGH MILLER's life, especially of his younger days, is eloquently illustrative of these remarks. With a weak physical frame and in very ill health, while yet young, he was sent out to work in a quarry, on a cold winter's morning before sunrise. His boyhood's life had wholly unfitted him for a labour which was hard enough even for strong grown men. Hitherto he had had comparatively a happy lot; he had been a delighted observer of the wild beauties of nature, a wanderer among rocks and woods, a reader of curious books when he could get them, a gleaner of old traditional stories, and yet necessity compelled him to exchange all the visions of his youth, all his day dreams and amusements, for the kind of life in which men toil every day that they may be enabled to eat, and eat every day that they may be enabled to toil.

It is exceedingly interesting to observe how cheerfully he buckled to his life of labour, and how he kept his eyes open for anything and everything that would keep alive his fonder hopes and purposes. He began immediately, with the eye of a young geologist, to see what was worthy of attention in the quarry where he worked; and here we must quote his own simple, but graphic words:—

"It lay on the southern shore of a noble inland bay, or frith rather, with a little clear stream on the one side, and a thick fir wood on the other. It had been opened in the old red sandstone of the district, and was overtopped by a huge bank of diluvial clay, which rose over it, in some places, to the height of nearly thirty feet, and which at this time was rent and shivered, wherever it presented an open front to the weather, by a recent frost. A heap of loose fragments, which had fallen from above, blocked up the face of the quarry; and my first employment was to clear them away. The friction of the shovel soon blistered my hands, but the pain was by no means very severe; and I wrought hard and willingly, that I might see how the huge strata below, which presented so firm and unbroken a frontage, were to be torn up and removed. Picks, and wedges, and levers were applied by my brother workmen; and simple and rude as I had been accustomed to regard such implements, I found I had much to learn in the way of using them. They all proved inefficient, however; and the workmen had to bore into one of the inferior strata, and employ gunpowder. The process was new to me; and I deemed it a highly amusing one. It had the merit, too, of being attended with danger, and had thus an interest independent of its novelty. We had a few capital shots. The fragments flew in every direction; and an immense mass of the diluvium came toppling down, bearing with it two dead birds, that, in a recent storm, had crept into one of the deeper fissures, to die in the shelter. I felt a new interest in examining them. The one was a pretty cock goldfinch, with its hood of vermilion, and its wings, inlaid with the gold to which it owes its name, as unsold and smooth as if it had been preserved for a museum; the other, a somewhat rarer bird, of the woodpecker tribe, was variegated with light blue and grayish yellow. I was engaged in admiring the poor little things—more disposed to be sentimental, perhaps, than if I had been ten years older—and thinking of the contrast between the warmth and jollity of their green summer haunts and the cold and darkness of their last retreat, when I heard our employer bidding the workmen lay by their tools. I looked up, and saw the sun sinking behind the thick fir wood beside us, and the long, dark shadows of the trees stretching downwards towards the shore."

Thus cheerfully does he describe his first day's labour as a stonemason. He was a little tired, and his hands were a little sore; but he went to bed with a light heart, and, refreshed by sleep, he rose the next morning ready for his appointed task. He was determined to lighten labour by making it appear to himself that he was out on some geological excursion, and, while he plied the hammer, kept a sharp look-out for any wonders which the earth might yield. The period in the day usually devoted to rest by the quarrymen, Hugh Miller employed in rambles through the woods, or in gazing upon the exquisite scenery of the neighbourhood, being convinced—to use his own words—"that a very exquisite pleasure may be a very cheap one, and that the busiest employments may afford leisure enough to enjoy it."

So interested did he become in the geological discoveries which working in the quarry revealed to him, that if ever an occasional holiday fell to his lot, he employed it in following up his investigations in the different districts of the neighbourhood. And thus his first year's labour came to a close, without his having scarcely experienced the monotony of toil, and with his stock of happiness, as well as knowledge, considerably increased. He had acquired a knowledge of his trade, and thus had before him the means of a livelihood; he had banished all thoughts of gloom in connection with labour, and had come to see that work, if properly pursued, would yield an indefinite amount of pleasure. And when at length his splendid talents were recognised, and he exchanged manual for mental toil, he wrote these important words in one of his numerous books: "There are few professions, however humble, that do not present their peculiar advantages of observation, and there are none in which the exercise of the faculties does not lead to enjoyment." He was decidedly of opinion that every man should try to make the best of his own trade in finding out pleasurable inducements to study, and that in a measure the workman's whole life might be one of study. His advice to young working men desirous of benefiting themselves, and adding to the amount of their enjoyment, is a very simple one. Do not seek happiness in what is misnamed pleasure, seek it rather in what is termed study. Keep your conscience clear, your curiosity fresh, and embrace every opportunity of cultivating your minds. Learn to make a right use of your eyes; the commonest things are worth looking at—even stones and weeds and the most familiar animals. Read good books, not forgetting the best of all; there is more true philosophy in the Bible than in every work of every sceptic that ever wrote. This advice was but an epitome of the story of his own education. With no other advantage than a common education, by a careful use of his means, he had been able to give himself an excellent education, and to elevate himself to a position which any man in any sphere of life might well envy. The celebrated geologist Murchison said, that Hugh Miller's papers on geology were written in a style so beautiful as to throw plain geologists like himself (Murchison) into the shade. Dr. Buckland said, he would give his left hand to possess such powers of description as Hugh Miller. He received from the highest authorities in geological science the deepest respect as one who would be able, more than all before him, to make the study of geology attractive and interesting. This work he was gradually accomplishing with pleasure and honour to himself, as well as with the greatest benefit towards others, when a melancholy catastrophe snapped the thread of so useful a life.

THE SURE CASKET.

I had a garment rare—

A robe of cost;

I hoarded it with care

From sun, and dust, and air;

Lo! the moth marr'd it sore,

It charms the sight no more—

'Tis lost!—'tis lost!

I had a ring of price—

A wedge of gold—

But to their secret bed

The cancerous rust hath sped:

It hath made a fatal sweep—

It hath eaten broad and deep—

Look! look! Behold!

I had a precious gem—

A jewel lone;

Close in my bosom's core

That talisman I bore;

How shall the robber's eye

My life of life espy?—

'Tis gone!—'Tis gone!

Alas! poor, rifled heart,

Burden'd with care—

What friend shall take thy part?

Who draw the envenom'd dart

From thy despair?

List to yon music free!

Calleth it not to thee?

—Heaven hath a casket fair,

Where are no moth, nor rust,

Nor thief to mock thy trust;—

Heaven hath a casket sure,

Its treasures aye endure,

Lay thine up—there!

Chemical Experiments.

THE CHARMED WATER.

MANY years ago a certain professor of chemistry, now dead, amused the young people assembled together at a Christmas party, and at the same time taught them a valuable chemical fact, in the following manner:—

"Ladies and gentlemen," said he, addressing the assembled guests, "place on the table as many basins as you please, pour water into each, and blindfold me. Supposing either of you to dip a hand, for ever so short a time, into one or more of the basins, I engage to discover, by a means known to myself, the exact basins into which your hand has been dipped."

The experiment was tried, and the professor kept his word.

It is necessary that the water employed in conducting the experiment should be absolutely pure, that is to say, water carefully distilled; and that the basins employed should be absolutely clean—such absolute cleanliness as a chemist understands, and which the young student will hardly attain until after many trials. Finger-glasses, on account of their transparency, are better adapted than earthenware basins for containing the water employed in the foregoing experiment, seeing that, by holding them between the eye and a candle or lamp-flame, any adherent particle of impurity may be discovered. A finger-glass may best be cleansed absolutely—chemically—by washing it, drying it, and finally rubbing it, when warm, either with a dry silken rag or a piece of chamois leather. All these details are mentioned because the success of the trick about to be described altogether depends upon their observance.

The gist of the thing is as follows: Whenever water comes in contact with the skin, no matter how recently washed and purified the skin may be, sufficient impurity will be acquired by the water to affect various chemical tests. The success of the experiment does not in the least degree depend upon contact with an unwashed hand. A lady might go from her dressing-room ready gloved, into the place of ordeal, and dip her hand into the basin for a time ever so short, and a chemist would be able to discover that she had so dipped it, so extreme is the delicacy of chemical tests. At this stage of my description, it will be well to inform the reader that the chief impurities evolved from the human skin every instant, are what I will venture to designate, for the benefit of unchemical people, "common salt, and its belongings."

SPONGE GATHERING.

SPONGE GATHERING.*

THERE are many common things about which, with all our learning, we know very little. Sponge is among the number. We are acquainted with its uses, its colour, and its substance; but what is it? and where does it come from? are questions to which we cannot all give a satisfactory answer.

As to what it is, naturalists themselves are not agreed. Some regard it as a vegetable, others as an animal, others, again, as a union of both. This union is known by the name polypi.

Sponge is a porous marine substance, found adhering to rocks and shells under water, and on rocks about the shore at low water. It consists of a material covered with a soft gelatine, but in which no polypes have been observed. This renders the term zoophyte more appropriate than that of polypi, as it is really uncertain whether it has any connection with that animal.

Sponge assumes a great variety of shapes, resembling shrubs, globes, tubes, fans, and numerous other figures. It is common to all seas, but differences exist as to its quality. The Syrian sponges are the most highly esteemed for toilet use. They are of a finer grain, a greater flexibility, and have an increased capacity for absorption. Colour, delicacy of fibre, and elasticity of tissue are the three tests of a good sponge. The common class is known as Venice sponge. The best are the white, delicately-grained produce of the Levant.

Attempts have recently been made by the French government to naturalise on the Algerian coast the finest kind of sponge, but the efforts have been unsuccessful. Sponges belong as much to particular districts as the fauna or flora of the sea or land.

Sponge gathering, or sponge fishing, as it is sometimes called, is usually commenced in June and terminated in August or September. A considerable trade in this branch of industry is carried on off the coast of Cuba. The accompanying illustration represents the fishermen and gatherers engaged in that pursuit. A sort of scaffolding is erected

* See No. 164 (Old Series).

Now everybody knows what common salt is, so that term is intelligible; but as for what I venture to call the belongings of common salt, why I could only designate them by very hard names, which the chemist knows already, and the seeker of amusement does not want to know; so, if the reader pleases, we will omit those hard names, as to learn them would not advance by one iota the complete success of our experiment.

Suppose, now, by way of preparation for our conjuring ordeal, the reader proceeds as follows:—Let him dissolve a little nitrate of silver in some distilled water, say five grains, or a moderate pinch, to a wineglassful. To another wineglassful of water let him add about five grains of nitrate of silver. There are two sorts of nitrate of silver, one in sticks like slate pencils, though lighter in colour; the other in crystals: either will serve the purposes of our experiment. By means of a splinter of glass, or a glass rod, stir each of the solutions until the materials are quite dissolved. If the reader intends to commit himself to the performance of chemical experiments, he is recommended to bottle up the solutions thus prepared, each in a stoppered bottle. Both solution of common salt and solution of nitrate of silver will be frequently necessary as tests. Taking now other wineglasses, I recommend the reader to prove the extreme delicacy of the reaction between common salt and nitrate of silver; so that each becomes a means of discovering the other, or, in chemical language, a test for the other.

Dipping a bonnet straw, or, still better, a glass rod—which can be purchased cheaply enough—into the solution (either one), removing the minutest drop of fluid, mingling it with water yet pure, and standing in a wineglass; then adding a minute drop from the other solution, you will see how delicate is the reaction between nitrate of silver and common salt. By training your eye thus you will soon be able to perceive the difference between water distilled, absolutely pure, and water in which a hand has been dipped; and when you can rely upon your perceptive tact the grand ordeal may come off.

Though I am specially presenting the reader with chemical tricks for amusement, yet it would be a pity to let facts worth knowing escape, when they come in our very footpath. The white curdy compound generated when nitrate of silver and common salt, or its belongings, are mingled together, contains all the original silver; by adding common salt or its belongings to a solution of silver, the silver can be converted into this white compound, and the white compound being collected and treated in one of several methods, metallic silver may be got out of it. To demonstrate this, instead of bottling up the solution of nitrate of silver, you may add solution of common salt to it, until nothing more falls down. Next, shaking the glass for a few seconds in which the white powder has formed, it will aggregate into a lump and deposit. Collecting this lump, drying it, mixing it with about twice its weight of carbonate of soda—such as soda powders are made of—and fusing the whole in the bowl of a clay tobacco-pipe, which may be readily done in an open fire-place, urged by bellows, if the fire be in good condition, the tobacco-pipe will be found to contain a bead of pure silver.

If it so pleases you, the silver may be extracted as follows, instead of by the process just mentioned. Collect the clotty powder as before, place it in a glass of water, add a few drops of spirit of salt (hydrochloric or muriatic acid), then immersing a slip of zinc stir up the mixture. Gradually, under this treatment, the white powder will lose its whiteness. It will in point of fact yield up all its silver, which, however, an inexperienced eye may fail to recognise as silver because it occurs in the metallic form.

When the white powder has yielded up all its silver you may if you please add a few globules of mercury or quicksilver, which, combining with the powdered silver, will collect the whole in a brilliant pasty mass, called silver amalgam. This experiment proves how quicksilver can pick up little dots of metal which one's fingers cannot, and demonstrates the process of amalgamation by means of which silver and gold are collected by quicksilver out of their respective ores. Much of the quicksilver may be strained away by wrapping it in chamois leather and applying pressure; but the final traces can only be dissipated by heat, to which end you may once more have recourse to the tobacco-pipe.

for the accommodation of the divers, in some respect resembling the fishing stations of the Black Sea. These divers reside in an isolated house, built on piles, forming very singular objects in the scene presented by the Cuban coast.

BE NOT IDLE.

BE not idle; there is work enough for all,
Though they labour hard and long!
Nature ever sounds her universal call,
To arouse earth's slumbering throng;
For throughout her fields are springing weed and thorn,
Which must be uprooted soon,
That the good seed, waking to the light of morn,
May rejoice the harvest moon!
Broken hearts there are to bind, and wounds to heal;
Lonely orphans to console,
And make happy with heart sunshine, till they feel
Strengthened to attain life's goal;
Faint and weary ones there ever are, who need
Some kind word and helping hand;
Lambs are wandering from the fold, for some to lead
To the shepherd-tended band:
Then, oh, be not idle, but awake to life;
Make an impress in the world;
Fighting for the right in every scene of strife,
'Neath heaven's banner wide unfurled!
And for seed thus late and early sown,
Thou shalt see the springing grain,
Which for thee, when for the heavenly garner grown,
Shall a crown of glory gain!

The Matron.

NO. IV.

In the last number I gave directions for three good, cheap dinners, and I now intend furnishing receipts for three more. I shall also touch on other subjects relating to comfort and economy. I am aware that thousands and tens of thousands of those who read this paper may say with truth, "It's not necessary for us, who have our comfortable incomes, or profitable business, as the case may be, to live in the stingy manner this old matron recommends."

Very likely, my dear readers, it may not be necessary, but it is advisable that all should be saving—the poor, to help themselves; and the rich, to enable them to have the more to bestow on their needy brethren. Economy is a religious as well as a social duty. If we turn to our Bibles, we find this command, "Let nothing be wasted."

In the hints I propose giving, I do not bind myself to any particular system. My advice will be scattered here and there, like dewdrops on the flowers. Life is such a medley that things seemingly opposite are often intimately connected, and from a commonplace subject an important lesson may be learnt. If you find what is valuable, never mind where you pick it up—

"Seize upon truth where'er 'tis found—
Among your friends—among your foes—
On Christian or on heathen ground;
The plant's divine, where'er it grows;
Neglect the prickles, and assume the rose."

Before I proceed to the subject of the dinners, I must keep my promise of giving directions about potatoes. The French have a good proverb—Façon de faire fait tout; in English—"The way of doing does everything." Certainly, the way of doing does everything for the potato. How many a poor man is cheated out of half his dinner through his wife's ignorance of potato boiling! The good lady is glad enough to meet her poor hungry husband's well-founded complaints with long yarns about the potatoes being diseased, frost-bitten, &c. In most cases the disease is in herself, and this disease is ignorance. When the potato is soft outside, and as hard as a stone inside, it is because it has been galloped. Potatoes should be boiled slowly, according to the following rules:—Wash your potatoes carefully, but do not pare them. Have in your saucepan water, with a dessert-spoonful of salt (supposing your potatoes to equal three pounds in weight). Then drop in your potatoes, and be careful to see that the water covers them. Put them on a slow fire, or at the side of a quick one. Cover the saucepan closely. In half an hour the potatoes begin to break. You must then pour off the water, but do not consider that the potatoes are done. The next thing is to replace the saucepan on the hob, and with a folded cloth to cover the potatoes. In five minutes all the steam will be drained off, and the potatoes will be good and mealy. This way of steaming is successfully observed in Ireland, a country where potatoes are well understood. You may send potatoes to table in their skins; many prefer them thus.

If your potatoes are new, the only difference to be observed is, to put them in hot water, boil them about half the time recommended for the old ones, and, if they are very small, ten minutes will do them sufficiently. And now for potatoes in another shape, viz., baked. If you spoil these, you deprive yourself and your children of a real luxury, for there is nothing nicer than a well-baked potato, with a little salt and butter. Choose large potatoes, and put them into a slow oven, with their skins on, observing they do not touch each other. Bake them for two hours at the outside.

As dear children are so fond of mashed potatoes, I cannot leave the subject without directing you how to mash them properly. Having boiled them according to my rules, remove the skins, put them in a basin, and, instead of using a spoon, take two forks (in one hand), with the points of the prongs turned outwards. With this instrument break up the potatoes. Supposing your quantity to be about three pounds, add to them, when mashed, three ounces of butter, two gills of milk, and a teaspoonful of salt. When these ingredients are blended, place the whole in a saucepan on a moderate fire, for seven or eight minutes, stirring them carefully all the while.

I have devoted a good part of this chapter to potatoes, because they are a very important article of food, and because many fail in cooking them properly. I have only a few words to add, and these are addressed to ladies going to the vegetable market. Recollect that the smaller the eyes the better the potatoes. To ascertain whether they are sound or not, nip a piece from the thickest end with your finger-nail. If the inside is spotted, they are bad, or getting so. However, they may still be fit for boiling, if a little of the outside be cut away; but they should be sold cheaper than those that are free from spots. In the spring, peel the old potatoes before boiling them. But nothing you can do will make this vegetable as good as it is in the autumn and winter. Still, there are people who dislike dining without their potato, and who keep to the old ones till the new come in. How opinions, likings, and dislikings change! In the seventeenth century there was such a prejudice against this valuable esculent, that the king of France appeared in public with the potato-blossom in his button-hole, to reconcile his subjects to the potato, and to show his appreciation of it.

Now for a few dew-drops of advice to young wives. Though your vegetables and meat should be cooked as nicely and thoroughly as possible, your dinner will not be relished unless you preside at it with a smiling, goodnatured countenance. And don't weary your husband about all the troubles you have had, and all the wonderful things you have done. Avoid boasting and complaining. Let your conversation be cheerful and soothing, and by an affectionate interest in your husband's prospects and anxieties, show him that you think more of him than of yourself. Of this you may be sure, that the best manager and the best cook in the world will never be loved and valued, if she is cross and bitter into the bargain. Kindness is woman's attribute, and if she does not possess this, it matters little what else she possesses. A proverb that for its wisdom ranks next to Solomon's tells us, that "To be good and disagreeable is high treason to virtue." But we cannot help fancying that our readers are both kind and agreeable. Therefore we pass on to the dinners—cheap dinners, to suit the pockets of those who wish to save, in these hard times. These dinners will also suit the season. In cold weather fat meat is wholesome, for fat increases caloric, or heat, in the human stomach. We shall touch on this subject again, as many important truths depend on it.

The meat which is to form the staple or principal part of the three dinners is the brisket of beef. Of this part of the animal purchase—for a family of six persons—between five and six pounds. It is sold at sixpence or sixpence-halfpenny the pound. Divide it into two unequal parts—have four pounds in one piece, and one and a half in another. Put the larger piece into the pot with three quarts of water, five parsnips, and four carrots. Add a table-spoonful of brown sugar, one of salt, and half a teaspoonful of pepper. Boil it slowly for two hours and serve it up—without the broth—with the carrots and parsnips nicely placed around it. Let there also be a dish of well-boiled potatoes on the table, and good fresh mustard in the mustard-pot. He who does not say all this makes a good dinner deserves to fast. We suppose that when papa, mamma, and the four darlings have dined sufficiently, there will be about half the meat left on the dish. The liquor in which the beef was boiled, is the next consideration.

As the brisket is fat, the mistress of the house will probably find a complete cake of beef-dripping, or rather, fat, covering the broth, which, on the day before, had been carefully put away in a brick pan. We will not do any mistress of a house the injustice to suppose that the broth has remained all night in the iron pot; because the habit of allowing food to get cold in a vessel of any kind of metal is quite wicked, inasmuch as it changes the food into poison. Oh, no; the reading public is too conscientious for such reckless, lazy practices. The cold fat should be carefully removed, and put into a clean jar. The broth must be poured into a large saucepan. It is already well flavoured from the vegetables and seasoning. Put it on a gentle fire, and let it boil slowly; but, in the mean time mix up in a slop-basin three-parts full of water, half of a sixpenny packet of pea-meal. When thoroughly mixed, stir this meal into the boiling broth, and excellent pea-soup will be the result. Serve this up, and see that the children eat bread with it. After this, let the cold brisket be brought in, on a clean dish garnished with red pickled cabbage; and if some good baked potatoes are added to the fare, you will have furnished a dinner "fit to set before a king."

Now for the pound and a half of raw brisket. Cut it up into eight shapeable pieces. Have your frying-pan bright with cleanliness; place it on a moderate fire; drop in the beef, to which add six sliced onions, and a stick of celery chopped small. Powder the beef with about a wine-glass of flour, a dessert-spoonful of salt, and half a tea-spoonful of pepper. When done brown, turn the contents of the frying-pan into a saucepan, and add half a pint of water. Stew or simmer the whole over a slow fire for about half an hour, and you will have a very nice savoury dish. But for something nice to eat with it you should have remembered the cold fat put away in the clean jar. This should be rubbed into a pound and a half of flour, mixed with water, and made up into six dumplings, which, dropped into boiling water, and kept boiling, would be well done in an hour and a half. These dumplings eaten with the stewed beef will be remarkably good, and the third dinner will be as palatable as the first.

Indentions and Science.

ARTIFICIAL LEATHER.—A cloth or tissue of wool, cotton, or other fibrous material is prepared by leaving a smooth surface on the one side, and a soft surface like the flesh side of a piece of leather on the other side. The cotton or face of the cloth to be prepared, is first treated with a composition of rye or other flower, cooked or baked, and mixed with whitening and linseed oil, with or without the addition of colouring matter; this is spread over it with a knife, or with machinery prepared for the purpose. It can then be painted or coloured in the usual way, and be varnished or polished. The back of the fabric is now covered with boiled oil mixed and ground with ceruse or white lead, and thinned with oil of turpentine, or a solution of gum and resin glue, or gutta-percha may be used instead; the surface while wet is covered with powder or dust of cotton, wool, silk, or leather, dusted over it. It is then allowed to dry, when the loose particles may be shaken off. A substance is thus obtained, having very much the appearance of leather, which may be employed in a variety of ways.

ANCIENT GLASS MANUFACTURES.—Among the Egyptians, glass-blowing—long supposed to be a modern art—was carried on in great perfection. Glass was also cast, engraved, and cut, and precious stones imitated successfully in that substance. Among the most beautiful productions of this manufacture were their richly coloured bottles with waving lines, and their small inlaid mosaics. In these last the most delicate designs were made; and such was the fineness of the work that it must have required a strong magnifying power to put the parts together, as it does now to examine them, particularly the feathers of birds, the hair, and other intricate details. They were composed of the finest threads or rods of glass—attenuated by drawing them when heated to a great length—which having been selected according to their colour, were placed upright side by side, as in an ordinary mosaic, in sufficient number to form a portion of the intended picture.

NATURAL ANÆSTHESIA.—The following singular case of natural anesthesia is given by Dr. Livingstone. "Starting and looking half round, I saw the lion just in the act of springing upon me. I was upon a little height; he caught my shoulder as he sprang, and we came to the ground together. Growling horribly close to my ear, he shook me as a terrier does a rat. The shock produced a stupor similar to that which seems to be felt by a mouse after the first shake of the cat. It caused a sort of dreaminess, in which there was no sensation of pain nor feeling of terror, though quite conscious of all that was happening. It was like what patients partially under the influence of chloroform describe, who see all the operation but feel not the knife. This singular condition was not the result of any mental process. The shake annihilated fear, and allowed no sense of horror in looking round at the beast. This peculiar state is probably produced in all animals killed by the carnivora; and, if so, is a merciful provision by our benevolent Creator for lessening the pain of death."

THE SUEZ CANAL PROJECT.—According to some recent discoveries in the central archives of Venice, it was so early as the end of the 15th century, when Vasco de Gama had discovered the Cape of Good Hope, and the Portuguese took that new route to India, hitherto the exclusive property of the Venetian and Genoese merchants—it was already at that period that a re-cutting of the Isthmus of Suez was thought of. Plans were compiled, and embassies sent to Egypt for paving the way for the accomplishment of this great enterprise. The obstinate opposition of some patricians, probably bribed by foreign gold, prevented the execution of the plan.

PREVENTION OF SMOKE.—A patent has recently been taken out for an improved combination of mechanism whereby the smoke and gas which usually passes away through the flues is collected and made serviceable by being mixed with a large quantity of atmospheric air heated to a high temperature, after which it is again forced through the fire and furnace, and said to be effectually consumed. In this way a large amount of fuel is economised, and a blast of hot air constantly kept up, together with an increase of heat from the same amount of fuel burnt. The whole arrangement is self-adjusting, and is regulated by the pressure of steam in the boiler.

IMPROVED BEE HIVE.—This consists of dividing the hive into two compartments, each of which contains a number of frames to support the honeycomb. These frames are suspended by means of brackets to movable boards, fixed on the inner side of the hive. Each of these boards is covered with bands of linen at its extremities, to prevent the comb adhering to the inner sides of the hive. In the compartment which divides the hive, is an opening which allows the bees to pass from one part to the other, but which may be closed by a movable door and catch when required. Each compartment has an opening for the bees to enter at either end, which may also be closed by a movable door. The hive is oblong in shape, and formed of wood; there are two openings, one in each compartment, covered with gauze for the purpose of ventilating it.

COINING AT THE ROYAL MINT.—In former times when the coinage was in the hands of the Company of Moneyers, and the machinery of the Mint was worked by them, the production of 1,000,000 sovereigns a month was considered an extraordinary accomplishment. The late sudden demand for sovereigns has put to the test the capabilities of the establishment and the efficiency of its machinery under the existing system, and the result has been most creditable to the officers and men employed in this important department: 3,000,000 sovereigns have been coined and forwarded to the Bank of England within five weeks; and in one week not less than 840,000 have been turned out—a feat altogether unexampled in the history of coining.

THE BIBLE.

Thou truest friend man ever knew,
Thy constancy I've tried!
When all were false I found thee true,
My counsellor and guide.
The mines of earth no treasure give
That could this volume buy;
In teaching me the way to live
It taught me how to die!

LOOK ON THE BRIGHT SIDE.—It was old Izaak Walton who said, "Every misery that I miss is a new mercy;" a saying worthy of the profoundest philosopher. It is only too true that misfortunes come to us on wings, but retire with a limping pace; and yet one half the world are ready to meet calamities half way, and indirectly to welcome them. There is scarcely an evil in life that we cannot double by pondering upon it; a scratch will thus become a serious wound, and a slight illness even be made to end in death, by the brooding apprehension of the sick; while on the other hand, a mind accustomed to look upon the bright side of all things, will repel the mildew and dampness of care by its genial sunshine. A cheerful heart paints the world as it sees it, like a sunny landscape; the morbid mind depicts it like a sterile wilderness; and thus life, like the chameleon, takes its hues of light and shade from the soul upon which it rests.

Small Change.

A NOTION OF TALKERS.—It seems that the French language has 5,000 more words than the English. Upon this fact being mentioned to a lady, she said: "Well, I'm sure they must want them all, for the French talk five times as much as we do."

A BANKRUPT was condoled with the other day for his embarrassment. "Oh, I'm not embarrassed at all," said he; "it's my creditors that are embarrassed."

THE Irish shopkeeper who was lately cheated by an old woman stealing a jar of whisky, and leaving a jar of water in its place, described her as speaking a strange dialect, neither Irish nor English. A punster said, he had reason to complain of the jargon (jar gone).

A CORK SAYING.—You may take your health to the whisky-shop once too often—until it gets broken.

ADVICE.—To a fool advice is like an almanac—it goes in at one ear (year) and flies out at the other.

WOMAN is an exquisite production of nature, between a rose and an angel—though we have heard various other definitions. She is a treasure, of which the profligate can never appreciate the value, for he who possesses many does not possess one. Malherbe says that the Creator speaks in His Scriptures of having repented the creation of man, but does not inform us that he ever repented having made woman.

THERE are trees that are very good for fuel, and yet one would judge from their name that they have been burned already. Of course we mean ashes.

Boys are like railroad cars—oftentimes they can be kept upon the right track only by a right use of switches.

If some people would have change in their pockets, we fear they must first have some in their habits of life. In that case, "change will follow change."

WRITING is the painting of invisible words—the giving of substance and colour to immaterial thought, enabling the dumb to talk to the deaf.

THERE is a class of people who think they evince prodigious knowledge of the world when they ascribe every action to the worst possible motive, taking it for granted that all men are profligate and all women inconstant. If this misanthropical ignorance is knowledge of the world, it is only of the world comprised in their own persons.

"My hair is eighteen years older than my whiskers," said a lawyer, "and I cannot understand why my whiskers should turn gray first." "Because you have worked so much more with your jaws than your brains."

"Ah, Mr. Simpkins, we have not chairs enough for our company," said a gay wife to her frugal husband. "Plenty of chairs, Mrs. Simpkins," he replied, "but too much company."

To be jealous is to torment yourself for fear you should be tormented by another. Some author asks why jealousy, which is born with love, does not die with it. Perhaps he would have found an answer to this question if he had reflected that self-love never dies.

YOUTH is a magic lantern that surrounds us with illusions which excite pleasure, surprise, and admiration, whatever may be their nature. The old age of the sensual and the vicious is the same lantern without its magic—the glasses broken and the illusions gone; while the exhausted lamp, threatening every moment to expire, sheds a ghastly glare—not upon a fair table-cloth full of jocund associations, but upon a dismal shroud.

An ex office-holder, who performed his functions badly, boasts in a publication that he "at least understands the four ground rules of arithmetic." No doubt of it. He multiplied his speculations, subtracted from the public money till nothing remained, divided the whole between himself and an accomplice, and unquestionably proved himself in various ways the greatest adder in the land.

WINDMILLS, which are kept going only by being continually puffed, bear a pointed resemblance to certain authors. But the latter raise the wind by increasing their sale, whereas the former diminish their sail as the wind increases.

"MR. JONES, you said you were connected with the fine arts. Do you mean by that you are a sculptor?" "No, sir, I don't sculpt myself, but I furnish the stone to the man what does."

THE love of ornament creeps slowly, but surely, into the female heart. The girl who twines the lily in her tresses, and looks at herself in the clear stream, will soon wish that the lily were fadeless, and the stream a mirror. We say, let the young girl seek to adorn her beauty, if she be taught also to adorn her mind and heart, that she may have wisdom to direct her love of ornament in due moderation.

G. GILDER.—The White Pawn on Q Kt 3, in Problem No. 8, is to prevent Black from playing his Q to Q Kt 3, and cutting off the play of the adverse Bishop. The White Bishop on K R 3 is required to meet one of the variations in the defence of Black.

D. W. G.—Apply to the publishers, Paternoster-row.

D. W. P.—Problem No. 1 cannot be solved in four moves, as Black's King escapes to Q B 7, after White has played his Kt to Q Kt 5. No. 2 is much below our standard.

OXON.—It certainly is a great feat to be able to conduct three games at the same time against strong players without sight of the board. The games, however, to which you refer were played against amateurs of inferior powers.

J. D.—Many thanks for your friendly communication. Your game shall appear at the earliest opportunity.

B. R.—P to K 2, means Pawn to his King's second square. R to K B 5 means R to King's Bishop's fifth square. The chess lessons which we published in the earlier numbers of the FAMILY PAPER, will furnish you with this kind of information.

IMPRANSUS.—We cannot undertake the examination of Problems which are not submitted to us on diagrams. It is necessary also that we should be furnished with the names and addresses of the composers.

ERNESTUS.—The information which you require can be forwarded to you by letter only.

ALPHA (Oldham).—We regret that we are unable to comply with your request. In No. 15 of the old series of the FAMILY PAPER commences a series of progressive lessons on chess.

A LADY is referred to the answer given to her in No. 5 of our Journal, and to the answer given to "Ernestus" with regard to her second inquiry.

Our Editorial Table.

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANACK.—Have all our readers a copy of this beautiful almanack? If they have not, they should at once take advantage of the publication of the last edition, which is now ready, price sixpence. In addition to the sterling value which attaches to a faithful and comprehensive almanack, this publication is distinguished above all its contemporaries by the beauty of the illustrations, and the merit of its literary contributions. It is, in every respect, the best memorial that has yet appeared of the year 1857. It contains, among other striking engravings, twelve beautiful and graphic illustrations of the most interesting occurrences of the past year; such as, "The Distribution of the Victoria Cross," "The Opening of the Art Treasures Exhibition," "The Siege of Delhi," &c. &c., and, for the especial entertainment of our lady subscribers, twelve other engravings, descriptive of the marriage ceremonies of different nations. It comprises, moreover, a vast amount of useful information on subjects of every-day importance; such as, abstracts of all the recent acts of parliament, especially of the new matrimonial and divorce bill; a list of bankers; postal regulations; a history of the rise and progress of British supremacy in India; an obituary; a list of the various members of the government, of the different public offices of the Houses of Lords and Commons, of the courts of law, &c. &c. It is, indeed, as a work of art of practical utility, and has been pronounced by the press to be quite unequalled of its kind in literary merit.

PUNCTUALITY could get to Australia for about £25, that is, £18 for passage, and the rest for outfit. His friends there could no doubt put him in the way of earning his living, especially as he seems to be a clever fellow. A strong lad of sixteen ought to be able to rough it in the bush.

SOPHIA must inquire at the office of the paper in question. The expense will not exceed a few shillings.

G. L. W.—We know nothing better than the old method.

JOHN ROSS.—Why are most of the correspondents who write to us about "the sea," like the leaves in spring? Of course, "because they are young and green." But here is "John Ross," 21 years of age, inquiring, in guileless simplicity, how he could get to serve a few years' apprenticeship in the Merchant Service or the Royal Navy? A nice little cabin boy "John Ross" would make, to be kicked about by the sailors, and stagger about the decks with the soup for the cabin dinner. John would, no doubt, do very well for an apprentice on board ship, only he is about eight years too old, and would in the regular course of things be about eight-and-twenty before his profession would support him. Don't go to sea, John; as the Irishman said, "if you do, you'd better not."

S. S. R.—All ladies with whom you are entitled to use no greater familiarity, should be addressed in writing as "Madam." The title does not belong exclusively to any age.

ADA.—Discourage them, of course.

CATHOLICUS.—Anciently there was such a law in force as that you name; but in the reign of Henry VIII. a proclamation was made allowing the eating of such "white meats" during Lent as by the Roman Catholic Church had hitherto been forbidden, viz., milk, butter, eggs, and cheese, either separately, or any combination of them.

LOUISA.—One of the best and easiest methods of removing ink from linen, is to rub the spots immediately and thoroughly with the end of a mould candle, softened at the fire for the purpose.

X. Y.—A very useful filter may be made as follows: Put into an earthen vessel, such as those which are used by sugar bakers to form the loaves in, with a small hole at the pointed end, some pieces of Turkey sponge, and on them a sufficient quantity of small, clean pebbles. Suspend this filter, the end downwards, in a barrel with the head out, leaving about two or three inches space between the end of the filter and the bottom of the barrel. The upper part of the filter must be kept a little above the top of the barrel, which should be always full of water. It is obvious that the sediment of the water will remain at the bottom of the barrel and the pure water will ascend through the sponge and pebbles to the unoccupied portion of the filter. It might be suspended in a cistern or water-but, if more convenient. The pebbles and sponge should be cleaned occasionally.

AN INQUIRER.—Consult "Cassell's Educational Course, Part II., The English Language in its Elements and Forms, with a History of its Origin and Developments," by Professor W. C. Fowler.

QUILL.—If the lady's want of baptism is the only obstacle to your union, and she is willing to have the impediment removed by partaking of that sacrament, we see no difficulty in your way. Adult baptism is by no means uncommon even in the Church of England.

ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—We advise you to ask a friend to see your master, and endeavour to agree on terms for cancelling the indenture of apprenticeship. Your master may summon you before a magistrate, and can cause you to be imprisoned for neglect of service.

JOHN JONES.—B's goods are not liable to be taken in an execution for a debt; although they may be taken in a distress for rent.

H. M'G.—You cannot be compelled to work on Sundays.

LEGAL.—The word signifies younger, junior, or last created; therefore the judges and barons not chiefs, are called puisne judges or barons.

BUCEPHALUS wants to know how to revive faded flowers. Nearly all flowers may be revived when faded by placing one third of the stalks in hot water; when it has become cold, the flowers will be reset and fresh; the end of the stalks should then be cut off, and the flowers put into cold water. Or, dip flowers in spirits of wine for twenty minutes; at first they will appear to have entirely faded, but in drying the colours will revive and the fragrance be prolonged. A few grains of salt put into the water with flowers, will keep them from fading. Sand may be substituted for water. Flowers may be preserved throughout the winter if plucked when they are half blown, dipped stalk downward in equal quantities of water and verjuice mixed, and sprinkled with bay salt. They should be kept in an earthenware vessel, closely covered and in a warm place; when in mid-winter, if the flowers are taken out, washed in cold water, and held before a gentle fire, they will open as if in their first bloom.

DISCARDED.—Your master cannot assign you over to another person without your consent; but he and you must alike perform the stipulations contained in your indenture of apprenticeship.

DESPAIR.—Do not despond, or persist in looking so hopelessly at the future. The catastrophe you dread may never occur, or if it does, with the grief will surely come the strength to bear it. Nothing is so destructive to peace and happiness as the habit of meeting evil, in which some people indulge, and in which you seem an adept. "Never cross the bridge till you come to the river," is one of our wisest proverbs. Time enough to mourn when sorrow really does come; no need surely to "mount Dobbin to meet it." And who could not say, if he would, that the troubles which have never happened have cost him more care and anxiety than all those which have actually befallen him? Upon this subject we will give you a few lines, which always strike us as being peculiarly applicable:—

"Doth each day upon its wing
Its allotted burden bring?
Load it not beside with sorrow
Which belongeth to the morrow.
Strength is promised—strength is given
When the heart by God is riven.
But foretold the day of woe,
And alone thou bear'st the blow."

SCRIBO.—The white sheep skin, used by organ builders, is dressed in alum and salts. The salt is extracted from the leather by washing it in cold water, the same as a piece of cloth, and it is thus adapted to various purposes; otherwise, as you suggest, the glue would not adhere, and the work would be spoilt.

ELIZABETH R.—The usual custom with domestic servants is to engage them subject to a month's notice or a month's wages.

MACBETH.—The consequence of your faithlessness will probably be an action against you for breach of promise of marriage. "Plutarch's Lives" (which we perceive you mean) can be procured from any bookseller. The other (Pluto!) gentleman whose acquaintance you are anxious to make, must be sought in realms not mentionable to ears polite.

W. W.—Five minutes' study of your grammar would remove all your difficulties, and enable you to answer your own questions. This is not the place for giving grammatical lessons, especially to a lady who is evidently as well provided as we are with the means of procuring them.

JULIA NORMAN.—Elder flower water is an excellent application for the skin.

VASSAL.—Upon a grant of lands under the feudal system being made, besides the oath of fealty, or declaration of fidelity to the lord (which was the origin of an oath of allegiance), the vassal, or tenant, on investiture, did homage to his lord—publicly, and with all humility, kneeling at his feet, "ungirt, uncovered, and holding up his hands together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and then declaring that he did become his MAN, from that day forth, of life and limb, and earthly honour."

COMMERCIAL.—The word which has of late obtained so sad a notoriety, not only in England, but throughout the whole European and American continent, comes from the Latin words bancus, "a bench, or table," and raptus, "broken." Originally, bankers stood in public places, such as markets and fairs, and counted their moneys and wrote their bills of exchange upon tables appropriated to them, something after the same fashion as farmers do now—a-days in the Corn Exchanges in Birmingham and other large towns. Hence, when a banker failed, his bank, or bench, was broken; and thus the public were informed that he was no longer in a position to do business, but was "bankrupt."

EPAULET.—Brevet is the term applied to a commission, which confers upon an officer the nominal rank attached to a step one degree higher than that he actually holds in his regiment. It exists only in the army, there being no brevet rank in the navy, and ascends no higher than the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and descends no lower than that of captain. The increased rank, however, does not carry with it increase of pay, and is, therefore, a very empty honour.

S. P. W.—We think a master may keep an apprentice at work longer than journeyman's hours, though, of course, not to the prejudice of his health.

ANXIOUS.—We think the course you suggest is most consistent with your dignity; but how will it advance your happiness? Have you no friend who could learn the cause of the estrangement, not as your ambassador, but one equally interested in the welfare of both? and then bring about an explanation and reconciliation.

J. F. BRISTAL.—Leave the "blue-eyed young lady" to seek a mate of her own degree, and do you follow her example. To address a letter to her upon the subject of love, would be worse than a breach of etiquette, it would be an impertinence.

FANNY A. B. M.—We cannot see that you have acted indiscreetly, although you certainly will do so, if you encourage or permit a correspondence with the intrusive gentleman you describe.

BLUSH ROSE.—If you neither do nor say anything for which you ought to blush, never mind hoisting signals of distress now and then. They are not ugly or unbecoming, whatever your brother may say.

ALICE.—The letter inclosed for our opinion is commonplace and cool enough, but has no other distinctive feature than that we have been able to discover. With respect to the other question asked, we beg to refer you to the recent papers upon the subject which have appeared in the columns of this Paper. From them you can easily answer your own query.

EDGAR.—The last sign of dangerous life, on the part of the terrible and infamous Inquisition, was shown in 1806, when two excellent priests, accused by their unworthy bishop, were tried by it. The proceedings, however, were condemned by the king, who declared them contrary to law, and the accused innocent. One of the best things Napoleon ever did was to abolish the Inquisition, which was consequently defunct during the French rule in Spain. In 1814, Ferdinand VII. re-established it, but on the adoption of the Constitution of the Cortes in 1820, it was again abolished by the advice of the European powers.

GEORGE.—"John Bull," the jocular collective name given to the English people, is supposed to have been first used by Dean Swift.

MARY.—We pity you most sincerely. Domestic harshness is of all others the hardest to bear, but, like every other grief and trial, is sent from God; and, however difficult to understand, is intended and will conduce to our benefit, if borne with submission, as coming from Him. For this reason, we earnestly counsel you to endure your sorrows as patiently as you can, confident that relief from them will come at the proper time; if not so soon, or in the way you desire, yet at the right time, and in the way most truly beneficial to you; and avoid, as you would entire ruin, any clandestine engagement or correspondence. Secret love affairs seldom, if ever, come to good. Would that girls could know the estimation in which men hold those whom they thus lure from duty. In nothing more than in such matters is the apostolic precept to be followed, "Do not evil that good may come."

SUPERFLUOUS.—We know of no safe depilatory. But we have over and over again suggested means of removing superfluous hair from the lips and arms of our fair correspondents. Cannot the present writer borrow a certain keen instrument from her father's or brother's dressing table?

HAL.—Hundreds do marry and live upon the income you name, but how far they are comfortable must depend upon their ambition and expenses. If the first causes the last to exceed the weekly receipts, comfort and happiness will soon take flight.

W. S. P.—With the blushes of which you complain, we think no right, honest-minded man in his senses would choose to dispense. It is a trite saying, that that woman's face which has lost the power to blush, has also lost its power to charm—true men.

LILLAS.—Few things are more injurious to health than keeping late hours. It is by no means necessary to stay until "the small hours" at a party; nor is it contrary to etiquette to leave at a reasonable time. Hours are certainly somewhat later now than they were in Dr. Kitchener's day; but nevertheless, we confess to a high respect for the rational placard which the whimsical physician always hung over the chimney-piece of the room in which he held his celebrated Tuesday evening conversaziones, "At seven come, at eleven go."

GISEY.—It was to Josephine, Empress of France, first wife of Napoleon, and Maria Leczynski, of Poland, wife of Louis XV., that the celebrated predictions of their future greatness were made. It is also said that the present Empress of the French was, during her school days at Clifton, warned of the honours which awaited her.

INDIA.—Juggernaut means "The Lord of the World," and is one of the appellations of Vishnu, "The Preserver of the World." The idol is a most hideous monster, carved in wood, and, on festival days, is placed on a tower, sixty feet high, accompanied by two other images (his white brother and yellow sister), who sit upon separate thrones, and, instead of horses or elephants, are drawn by the infatuated people. Beneath the wheels of the tower, numbers of the half-maddened worshippers throw themselves, in order to be crushed. And this act is looked upon as a most holy and pleasing sacrifice to the deity. Out of 1,200,000 pilgrims who yearly visit the Temple at the two great festivals, in March and July, it is calculated that nine out of ten die, from famine, sickness, and hardship. For miles round, the country is covered with human bones; and not far from the holy place (?) is a spot which Europeans call Golgotha, where thousands of bodies are thrown, on which dogs and vultures continually feed. The orgies practised at the shrine of this atrocious idol are too horrible to be described; and yet, on the departure from India of the Marquis Wellesley, the Bengal Government passed an ordinance for the management of the Pagoda and taxing of the pilgrims (a source of revenue which the Marquis had repudiated); and, in 1809, the superintendence of the whole was given to the Rajah of Kurish, upon condition of his exacting the old regulations!

If M. M. (Ryde) will put the questions she desires answered into prose, we will do our best to oblige her.

LUCINDA.—Salts of lemon, thoroughly rubbed in, will take the stains of fruit or ink off the fingers. But great care must be used in applying it, as salts of lemon are poison.

A LOVER OF JUSTICE.—Don't be so quarrelsome. Is it not better to yield a little than quarrel a great deal? The habit of standing up, as people call it, for their (little) rights, is one of the most disagreeable and undignified in the world. Life is too short for the perpetual bickering which attends such a disposition; and unless in a very momentous affair indeed, where other people's claims and interests are involved, we question if it is not wiser, happier, and more prudent to yield somewhat of our precious rights than squabble to maintain them. Wherefore, O lover of justice, if thy employer does ask half an hour's extra work sometimes, to which he has no legal claim, give it. What the worse wilt thou be when thy apprenticeship is over? Better the friend which the concession will probably gain than the rescued half hour's sulky grandeur, which, ten to one, thou wilt be too ill pleased with thyself to enjoy.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.—As we have no doubt that the weekly numbers of our New Series will be carefully preserved for binding, we have had the cases for the First Volume prepared, so that they can be obtained at once and used as a portfolio for containing the numbers until the volume is completed, which it will be in future every six months, instead of twelve months, as heretofore. The price of the Cases, gilt lettered on side and back, will be 1s. 6d. each.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARTLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

I dwell amid the city,
And hear the flow of souls!
I do not hear the several contraries,
I do not hear the separate tone that rolls
In art or speech,
For pomp or trade, for merry-make or tolly
I hear the confluence and sum of each,
And that is melancholy!

Thy voice is a complaint, O crowned city,
The blue sky covering thee like God's great pity.

ELIZABETH BROWNING.

We cannot conceive a more desolate abode than London for those who, without kindred, friends, or some engrossing pursuit, seek to find a home in it.

It is animation without life, the world seen in a camera, a mart to spectators who have nothing to buy or sell, who soon tire of taking an interest in the interests of others—a raree-show where curiosity flags and repetition palls, a tinsel spectacle leaving the heart like a tired bird without one green bough to rest upon.

In London—as in most great cities—the affections and sympathies require to be well endorsed before humanity will discount them. The only bills which invariably possess a certain value are those drawn by the passions: there is little difficulty in cashing them. If first-class they are done in the bank parlour of society, and at a moderate premium. When the names are not quite so good, or doubtful, a heavier one has to be submitted to, frequently cent. per cent.—paid either in suffering, character, or self-respect. Some desperate speculators may always be found to dabble in such securities, even when they flood the market, gorging it to repletion.

London to the stranger is indeed a desert. In the proper acceptance of the word, it is impossible to find a home in it, and it takes years to make one. Can anything be more cheerless than the sitting-room of one of its lodging-houses? the faded drugget with patches of grease as numerous as the spots in the skin of the leopard; the gaudy hearth-rug, regulation number of chairs, horse-hair sofa, dirty blinds, tawdry mirror over the chimney-piece, the half-dozen ill-washed glasses, and odd decanters—facetiously called a pair—on the rickety chiffonniere, to say nothing of the old moreen curtains with yellow fringe, and brass rings which set the inmate's teeth on edge as they rattle along the lacquered poles.

Then the beds, the—but no, we will not take our readers even in imagination into them; it would be a biting return for the years of kindness we have experienced at their hands; besides, not being a disciple of the Radcliff school, there are horrors into which we really cannot go.

Sometimes the wretched pariah who has no other shelter than one of these dens, rushes desperately into the streets, stung—literally stung—into a determination of making friends, of escaping for a few hours at least from the monotony of his existence, by forcing his way into society. Alas! he might as well attempt to force his way to fame or fortune; its doors are barred against him, hermetically sealed, and he must either find the key or pick the lock: the first is difficult, the latter worse,—immoral.

Well has it been said that every Englishman's house is his castle; for few of them ever venture out of it without first clothing themselves cap-à-pie in an impenetrable armour of reserve, which they rarely lay aside till their return to their own domestic stronghold, or find themselves in one equally secure, belonging to some ally or relative; and even there, so habitual is their caution, they only remove the head-piece, seldom the breastplate.

Mark Rayner and his wife bitterly felt all this as they sat day after day in their close, smoky lodging in the city. They missed the kind, familiar faces of St. Faith's—faces they had known from childhood—the neighbourly word, the cheering smile, the heart's intercourse which tells us we are not quite isolated in the world, that beings like ourselves take an interest in our welfare. Their departure for America had been delayed by the repeated but fruitless attempts which Rose had made to obtain an interview with Lady Boothroyd, in order to remind her of her broken promise, of restoring the fatal proofs in her possession. The haughty woman had refused to see her; sent down angry messages to the suppliant, as she stood trembling and anxious at her door. More than once, threats had been added, covert ones indeed, but still sufficiently intelligible to alarm the fears of a wife.

The fifty pounds, too—the price of Lilly's abduction—all they now possessed in the world, began to diminish rapidly.

The unhappy pair, one, at least, of whom deserved a better fate, were seated at their solitary breakfast, at "The Half Moon," near Farringdon-street; neither had any great inclination for food, but they had been compelled to order it, to avoid the surly looks of their landlord, who had more than once observed to them that letting beds alone wouldn't pay his rent.

Mark was reading the paper.

"Here is something," he suddenly exclaimed, handing it to his wife, "that may answer our purpose."

She read as follows:—

"Passage to America.—In consequence of a severe domestic affliction, two berths are to be disposed of at a very considerable reduction, on board the fast-sailing clipper, the Syren, now lying in the docks at Liverpool, to take in cargo; to start on the first of the ensuing month. Apply to Mr. O. C—, No. 10, Reynolds-place, Tottenham-court-road."

"You will wait no longer then?" observed Rose.

"Not an hour," replied her husband, gloomily; "my heart is gnawed with impatience; besides, why should we linger in this wretched place in the hope of obtaining justice or pity from Lady Boothroyd?—as well attempt to draw milk from an adder—we have served her purpose; she has no further use for us; and, with that fatal proof in her possession, may defy all we can do, or threaten."

"Yes, yes!" observed his wife, nervously. "Better leave England at once. I should do so with a lighter heart if I could only ascertain the fate of the child. It is a bitter reproach to me."

Mark hid his face in his hands; he had terrible misgivings on the subject.

"Surely," added the speaker, "her ladyship can never intend any harm to her."

"No fear of that," muttered the guilty man, giving utterance to an assurance he was far from feeling. "It is poor old Simon and Hester I am thinking of—what they must suffer; the doubt, the fear. It is horrible; and to think that I should be the cause of all their misery! I, whom they have known from boyhood. Should the truth ever become known, how those who once respected will despise me! As for any harm coming to the child, I have no dread of that. Why should Lady Boothroyd harm the daughter of Barny Gee? No, no; it is her pride, nothing more—or, rather, Sir Norman's. He can't endure that the orphan of the man he caused to be murdered should remain at St. Faith's to keep up bad recollections by her presence. In a worldly point of view, Lilly will not suffer by the change, rely upon it."

"If I could only think so!" sighed his wife.

"At any rate, we are powerless to help her," added the man.

The opportunity of obtaining their passage to America at a reduced price was too important with their slender means to be lost sight of, so the speakers started at once to the address indicated in the advertisement, and were shown into a room where an old, gray-haired man and a young woman were seated. Both were in deep mourning—the latter in widow's weeds.

A Bible, with a pair of spectacles upon the open page, was lying on the table.

There was such an air of respectability and subdued sorrow in the appearance of the parties, that Rose felt quite interested.

"Be seated," said the man, pointing to chairs. "I presume that you have called respecting the advertisement."

"We have, sir."

"You are aware that the Syren sails on the first of the month?—only three days."

"Quite aware of it, sir."

The gentleman drew from a large black leather pocket-book, not unlike a sermon case, the two tickets, printed in the usual form, signed by the agent at Liverpool, and handed them to Mark Rayner.

"You see, he said, 'that thirty pounds have been paid for the two?'"

The sun was marked on them.

"They were taken," continued the old man, "for my poor boy and his wife, but—"

Here his voice faltered, and the woman in the widow's cap raised her handkerchief to her face to hide her tears.

"Well, well, my love," resumed the speaker, after a pause, "it is a severe trial, but it is our duty to submit. Providence tempers the wind to the shorn lamb. Here," he added, placing his hand upon the sacred volume on the table, "here is our consolation."

"I see, sir, you are a clergyman," observed Mark.

"A poor curate," answered the venter of the two berths, meekly; "a humble labourer in the vineyard of—of—the—"

Here a violent fit of coughing interrupted the speaker for some seconds. When he recovered, he observed that it had pleased Heaven to afflict him for many years with a severe asthma, which compelled him to smoke even at that early hour of the day.

"Doubtless," he added, "you perceived the odour of tobacco when you entered the room?"

Mark had noticed it, and his wife imagined, but it must have been fancy, that she could detect the smell of gin with it.

The purchase-money, twenty pounds, for they were first-class berths, was soon settled upon, the money counted down, and the tickets transferred. It was a large sum, considering their present means, but Mark Rayner could not endure the thought of Rose being exposed to the privations and inconveniences of a steerage passage.

"It is a sad thing to quit your native land," said the old gentleman, as he placed the notes in his large black pocket-book. "But in America you will scarcely feel yourselves amongst strangers; you will hear your own language, and find more than one faithful ministry there. May you be prosperous."

"Thank you, sir," replied the intended emigrants.

"I will pray for you," added the curate.

There was something so venerable in his appearance, so touching in the tone of his voice, that his visitors felt quite affected, and parted from him reluctantly, after thanking him again and again for the kind interest he had expressed in their welfare.

"A good man," observed Rose to her husband, as they quitted the house; "so simple and pious."

"Very," replied Mark.

"What a pity he suffers so from asthma."

"A great pity."

That same day the unsuspicious pair made several purchases of things necessary for the voyage, and started by the parliamentary train for Liverpool, and on their arrival proceeded at once to the vessel which was lying in the docks, in order to avoid the expense of another tavern bill. Mark was busy arranging the luggage, when the captain made his appearance, a hearty, bluff-speaking man.

"Hallo!" he exclaimed; "what are you doing here?"

"Stowing my things in our berths," answered Mark.

"Haden't you better have secured them first?" asked the commander of the Syren.

"If you please, sir," said Rose, "we have secured them, and paid for them in London. Show the gentleman the tickets."

"Of the agent?" demanded the captain, whilst Mark was fumbling in his pocket for the documents.

"No, sir; of the Reverend Obadiah Cheeseman."

"Whom?"

"The Reverend Obadiah Cheeseman. He had taken them for his son and daughter-in-law; but the young man died, and—"

"There are the tickets, captain," said Mark, placing them in his hand.

The rough sailor uttered an exclamation which, no doubt, would very much have shocked the pious gentleman with the asthma who had sold them, could he have heard it.

"The infamous old rascal!" he added, after indulging in a string of expressions something stronger than mere expletives; "this is the third time he has tried it on."

"Tried what on, sir?" inquired the husband of Rose, looking up from his work, and seating himself upon one of the trunks, for he began to feel a little uneasy.

"You have been robbed."

"Impossible! why, I paid twenty pounds for them."

"And they are not worth twenty pence, my poor fellow," said the captain.

Mark Rayner looked thunderstruck, and the heart of his wife sank within her. She recollected the strong odour of tobacco in the room, and now felt quite certain that her imagination had not deceived her when she fancied she detected the smell of gin as well.

"Surely," she faltered, "you must be mistaken. He is a clergyman."

The commander of the Syren gave a knowing whistle.

"We saw his daughter-in-law, too,—a widow."

"A regular Portsmouth one," observed the sailor. "It's the third time she has been bereaved within a twelvemonth to my certain knowledge. I tell you you have been regularly done; fallen into the hands of a couple of landsharks. Last voyage they sent us three on the same fools' errand, and two by the Snake, which belongs to the same line. It's an old dodge well known in Liverpool."

"What are we to do?" exclaimed the woman, clasping her hands despairingly.

"Take fresh berths."

"Alas! we have no longer the means."

"Take your traps on shore, then," said the captain. "These berths are engaged; I can do nothing, but you may see the owners if you like."

It was a faint hope, a very faint one; but Mark took the address, and hurried with his half-distracted wife to the counting-house of Messrs. Small and Skinner, who, when they discovered there was no likelihood of the poor plundered dupes taking fresh passages, could scarcely find time to listen to them. In fact, they were in doubt whether they ought not to give them in charge till they could explain their share in the transaction.

As this, however, would have required time, and time with business men is money, the idea was abandoned, and so much debited by the partners to the account of charity—for each considered that he had acted with uncommon liberality on the occasion.

On their return to the docks, Mark found that their luggage had been put on shore. Alone, he might have struggled through the difficulty—a man has so many resources; but with Rose—the thought almost maddened him as he gazed upon her pale features and sad, desponding looks.

"It is I who have brought her to this," he murmured. "All my fault. But for me she might have been happy and respected."

This self-accusation came as most self-accusations do—too late as affects the past, but it nerved him for the future. He had no friends either to assist or advise him; so, after a few moment's reflection, he decided for himself.

"We must return to London," he said.

His wife shuddered at the words: she had suffered so much there already.

"Possibly we may be in time to catch the old hypocrite who has plundered us; that is our last hope."

"And should that fail!" sobbed Rose.

"Then you must return to your friends at St. Faith's."

"And you, Mark?"

"Go for a soldier," replied her husband, gloomily.

"It's nothing more than I deserve."

"I shall never see St. Faith's without you," answered the woman, firmly; "your fate is henceforth mine, though it should drive us to seek our bread from door to door."

These words restored Mark Rayner to something like self-possession. There was more than consolation—he found strength in them. The hope could not be barren that had such love to sustain it, or the world a wilderness whilst one flower, so pure and holy, bloomed for him, and him alone. How firmly the repentant man vowed that, if fortune ever smiled upon him, he would repay her wondrous goodness, atone for the past, and render the future happy!

Rose smiled as she listened to him, and almost forgot her present misery.

How frequently do we hear the thoughtless and unreflecting complain of the dreary prospects of the future—that they cannot see their way clearly, or imagine what it will lead to. They are fools! The cloud which hides the spring of time is the great incentive to existence. Were all the page disclosed, the eye would turn wearied and listless from the volume of life, and lose all interest in perusing it.

Once more the wanderers set out for London; and, on their arrival, hastened to the address in the Tottenham-court-road. We need scarcely inform our readers that the pious curate and his afflicted daughter-in-law had disappeared from their lodgings, which they had only occupied a few days, and left no clue to their retreat. The money was irretrievably lost.

Mark and his wife were somewhat prepared for the result. The blow, therefore, was less severe than might have been expected, and they returned to their lodgings, near Farringdon-street.

"There is nothing left for it," sighed the former, when, tired with their journey and excitement, they once more found themselves in the dull, smoky room at "The Half Moon," but the army. I must look out for some regiment bound for foreign service. We have only six pounds left."

Rose proposed making another attempt to see Lady Boothroyd.

"It will be useless," answered her husband; "but you can try in the morning, whilst I go out and make inquiries in the neighbourhood of the Horse Guards."

His wife struggled successfully with her feelings, and would not add to the bitterness of his self-reproach by letting him perceive a tear.

Oh, what a paradise did the snug little cottage at St. Faith's, and the few acres of land Mark had been too lazy to cultivate, now appear! What would he not have given to have once more had the chance! Toil would have been a pleasure—a perfect luxury. But, like many others in the world, he had trifled with happiness till it had escaped him.

Happiness is something like the bird which has been once limed—it is far more difficult to cage it a second time.

In the morning they started on their several expeditions; Rose to the Regent's-park, in the vain hope of obtaining an interview which her ladyship was resolved not to grant; and her husband to the Horse Guards, the great rendezvous of the recruiting parties. Experience, however, had taught him caution, and he determined to have something surer than the word of the sergeant, that his wife would be permitted to accompany him, before he accepted the fatal shilling.

Being a fine stalwart fellow, straight as an arrow, broad shouldered, and rather over than under six feet in height, more than one of the human decoy ducks eyed him wistfully. Sergeant Kite declared that he had taken quite a friendship for him; another swore he was the model of the adjutant of his regiment, who had obtained a commission after six years' service in the ranks; and a third gray-headed old crimp gravely informed him that the government allowed two hundred and fifty pounds for an outfit when promoted to the epaulette.

"But my wife?" urged Mark.

"Separate room in barracks," exclaimed one.

"School in the regiment for the children," added a second.

"Women ride with the baggage," said a third; "and if industrious, can always make a pretty penny by washing for the officers, especially in my regiment, which is bound for India. Leaves Southampton in less than a week; just in time to sail with it. India," he added, "is the country for a fine young fellow to see service in, and no mistake! Lots of prize-money; promotion certain; natives to wait upon you; palanquin to carry you when fatigued upon march, and coffee always ready to refresh you."

If any of our readers should accuse us of making the old sergeant spin too strong a yarn, we advise them to read the placards which have lately appeared against the walls of the Horse Guards, and they will find that, instead of over-colouring, we have but modestly tinted the sketch.

Mark listened, and wisely determined not to believe any one of them. The regiment bound for India certainly tempted him; and, could he have been assured that Rose would be permitted to accompany him, would unhesitatingly have engaged himself.

"I should like to see your colonel," he said.

The colonel was already at Southampton.

"One of the officers, then."

They were at Southampton, too.

Doubtful and irresolute, Mark quitted the speaker, saying he would think of it, and sauntered on the parade in the park, where an elderly officer was inspecting the guard. When the duty was over, and the men dismissed, the intended recruit walked up to him and touched his hat—

"Would you allow me to speak with you, sir?" he said.

"Certainly, my man."

"Are the 01st really ordered to India?"

"Undoubtedly. I dined with Sir Charles Fourreau yesterday; he left town this morning for Southampton. Why do you ask?" he added.

"Because I have some thought of enlisting."

"Can't do better," replied the officer, his eyes resting complacently on the tall, well-built proportions of the speaker.

"But I am married, sir."

"Can't do worse, then," said the gentleman, "unless you have a bad wife and want to get rid of her."

"But I have a good wife, sir," exclaimed Mark, "whom I dearly love; one of the best women in the world, whom my imprudence has reduced to poverty. But even that has not shaken her affection for me. She has made up her mind to accompany me, and share my fate, whatever it may prove. What I want to know is, whether in the event of my taking the bounty they will separate us. And so, I took the liberty of asking you, knowing that I might rely upon your word."

"All depends upon the colonel, my man," answered the gentleman, struck by the candid, straightforward account Mark gave of himself. "Only a certain number of soldiers' wives are permitted to accompany the regiment. Sir Charles is proud of his regiment—very proud of it. And—what height do you stand?"

"Six feet, sir," said the husband of Rose, drawing himself up.

"Plenty of other regiments—mine, for instance."

"I should prefer foreign service, sir."

"Sorry to hear it," observed the officer, drily; "it's a bad sign when a man is anxious to quit his native country. I have given you all the information in my power. Good day to you."

The speaker returned to the orderly room; and poor Mark, his hopes considerably lessened, with a heavy heart, directed his steps once more toward the city, where he found his wife anxiously expecting his return. Her attempt to see Lady Boothroyd had been fruitless; and, in answer to her inquiries for the steward, the servants informed her Mr. Sillex had returned to St. Faith's.

Her husband related his adventure.

To remain in London upon six pounds was impossible, so they at once decided on starting for Southampton. It was a desperate chance, and they staked their last hope, and almost their last shilling upon it.

Whilst the train is whirling along the iron road to convey them to their destination, we may as well take advantage of the opportunity and introduce the gallant colonel of the 01st Dragoons to our readers.

Sir Charles Fourreau was a fine soldier-like man of fifty. Although he had seen much service, and had lived rather freely, time had dealt most leniently with him. His figure was still erect as that of any youngster in his regiment; not an officer in it rode better, or attended more sedulously to his duties. It was his pride to command one of the finest bodies of men in her Majesty's service. If the discipline was strict, there was but little flogging in his regiment. His soldiers both loved and feared him; and the reflection of "What will the colonel say?" induced many a man to keep a check upon his conduct.

Most of his friends had predicted that he would die an old bachelor: great, therefore, was their astonishment, and the disgust of his nephews, when they read in the papers the announcement of his marriage with Lady Bell, the orphan daughter of the late Earl of Clayton. The match had not even the shadow of imprudence to console them, for the bride was young, beautiful, and rich. How ever she came to accept the old soldier puzzled her acquaintance exceedingly. Some suggested that she had met with disappointment, and married out of pique; if so, appearances were exceedingly deceptive, for a lighter-hearted creature never breathed. Others suspected that she had grown tired of living in the country with her two maiden aunts; and yet she invariably spoke of them with the greatest affection. Not one hit upon the real secret, or would have believed it had she confessed it to them—that she loved her husband, who had commenced his courtship by finding fault with her, reasoning with her on her caprices, instead of flattering them as others had done. He was the first man who had ever ventured to speak truth to her; and, if she did not always yield to his arguments, she respected them.

It is a dangerous thing for a man, no matter at what age, to play the mentor with a young and lovely woman. Sir Charles soon began to perceive this; and, like an experienced soldier, thought of retreat. But it was too late; the bird was limed, not by the wings, but by the heart-strings. In a fit of desperation he proposed; and, instead of being laughed at as he expected for his folly, to his delight and astonishment found himself accepted.

Six months after their marriage, the regiment was ordered on foreign service. Every one expected, as a matter of course, that the colonel would sell out; and Major Plinlimmon, a very choleric Welshman, and a decided old bachelor, who anticipated succeeding him, made every preparation to that effect. To his disappointment, Sir Charles decided on remaining—his wife insisted upon it; she felt delighted with the idea of visiting India—the land of romance, gold, gems, poetry, perfume, and cashmeres. It was in vain that her husband offered to sacrifice his own inclinations on the subject, dwelt on the disadvantages of such a life; the lady refused to listen to him. She had made up her mind to accompany him, that he should not quit the service till he was a general, and, like most wives, carried her point.

It was in vain that her two maiden aunts remonstrated on what they decidedly considered the extraordinary resolution of their niece. She listened to them very dutifully, and, when they proposed her remaining with them during the absence of her husband, drily referred them to Sir Charles, who, as a matter of course, refused to listen to any such proposition.

"Bell," said the old soldier, when everything was finally arranged, "my lessons, I fear, have been thrown away; you are as obstinate as ever."

The beautiful culprit looked up in his face, and smiled.

"And are you really angry with me?" she asked.

"Angry!" repeated her husband; "I can only wonder at so much goodness. Would I were twenty years younger!"

"In that case I should have still been Lady Bell Clayton, and you a miserable bachelor," replied his wife; "much better as it is, Charlie. Do you know why I married you? I'd tell you, only I fear it might make you vain, and—no—I'd better not."

As a matter of course the colonel let her have no peace till she did tell him.

"Because I found I could respect as well as love you; look up to you with confidence," said the fair young creature, "and obey you; that is, when you are reasonable, Charlie. Many had sought to win me before you came," she continued; "but they all addressed themselves to my vanity, as if woman possessed neither brains nor heart; told me I was beautiful till I felt sick of hearing it; pronounced me a paragon for merits I had not the slightest claim to, and never gave me credit for one quality which I really possessed—a love of candour, simplicity, and manly truth."

"I may trust her," thought the gratified husband, as he folded her to his heart, "even in the hotbed of Indian society. It cannot force the vices which have no seed in her pure heart."

CHAPTER XX.

Why should we weep when children die?

They 'scape the brand of thought and sin;

Stretched in their innocence they lie,

Fair as the first-plucked flowers of spring.

FROM THE AUTHOR'S SCRAP-BOOK.

TRUE to his promise, Fiddler Dick made his appearance on the appointed night at the cottage of his dear friend Mike. Bet and the child Fan accompanied him. The former was a woman of business, and came, as she said, to see that everything was square between the two pals, who neither of them, it seemed, could trust the other. A witness made all right, she thought.

The child was, as its taskmaster had described, in the last stage of consumption—that fatal disease which, like the canker in the bud, destroys the promise of many an opening flower. She was thin, miserably thin; and her dark, lustrous eyes appeared unnaturally large and bright from the contrast with her pale, emaciated features. In height, and the colour of her hair, there was a strong resemblance to Lillian, who gazed with wonder and pity on the poor shivering creature as she crept to her side by the fire.

"I think that's the genooine article you require?" observed the mountebank, glancing significantly towards his victim.

Mike nodded in the affirmative.

"I'd great to do to persuade Bet to part with her, she is so fond of the kids—quite a mother to 'em. But, as I said before, when I say done, I really means done, and—"

A violent fit of coughing from Fan interrupted the rest of his speech. The ruffian smiled.

"Do you hear that?" he said. "Holler as if a nail wor a-being driven into a coffin."

Mike admitted, with a considerable amount of satisfaction as well as candour, that it did sound hollow.

"And ain't her air and eyes the very thing?"

The convict confessed it would have been difficult to find a better match.

Whilst the speakers and Bet were settling matters over the bottle, the two children made some approach to acquaintance. Lilly, who was still anxiously expecting Jack, asked the little sufferer if she was to remain with them.

"I don't know," answered the child, in a voice scarcely louder than a whisper. "I should like it; it is so warm here."

"Are you not warm at home?"

"Not since I have been sent to sleep in the wash-house."

Here a second fit of coughing disturbed the two ruffians at the table. Fan looked terrified, and vainly tried to suppress it.

"Can't you be quiet, you?" exclaimed Fiddler Dick, shaking the whip, which he had not forgotten to bring with him, at her.

"I can't help it," gasped the child, "indeed I can't."

"I'll make ye, then."

Doubtless the ruffian would have executed his threat but for Mike, who prudently reminded him that as he should be obliged to call in the parish doctor, it would not do for Fan to have any marks upon her.

"She is lucky," muttered the brute.

And the conversation was renewed.

"Does he often beat you?" inquired Lilly, in an under-tone.

"He beats us all in turn," was the reply.

There was something dreadful in the cold indifference with which the words were uttered, as if being beaten were quite a matter of course.

"And what does he beat you for?"

"I don't know—anything—when we don't dance to please him, or the gentlefolks don't give us any money."

"And do you dance?" demanded the astonished Lillian.

"Yes."

"Where?"

"In the streets, upon stilts: there are four of us. You'll know," added the speaker, "for Jane heard him tell Bet about you."

"About me!"

"Yes; you're to be one of us."

The information put poor Lilly into a terrible fright. Unhappy as she found herself in the cottage alone with Mike, the change appeared far worse.

Bet having fully satisfied herself that everything was straight and fair between Fiddler Dick and his old friend, now approached the fireplace and directed the children to change clothes. Fan did not wait to be told so a second time. So great was her dread of the virago, that had she been ordered to put her little hand between the bars of the burning grate, she would have scarcely resisted; Lillian, however, hesitated.

"Didn't you hear me?" exclaimed the woman, at the same time seizing her roughly and beginning to unloosen her frock.

The orphan resisted.

"Ah, I see what you wants!" added Bet, rising to fetch the whip.

"She will beat you," whispered Fan.

The terrified Lillian hastily began to remove her things, but obedience came too late to save her from the fury of the half-drunken wretch. One severe lash of the whip seamed her ivory shoulder with a long red scar.

"I told you you'd get it," said her companion in misfortune.

Startled by the piercing shriek which followed the blow, the two men turned round.

"Stash it, Bet!" cried her husband; "can't you wait?"

"I ain't a-goin' to stand any of her nonsense," muttered the female fury, raising the whip a second time over the crouching victim.

"Stash it, I say," roared Fiddler Dick, starting from his chair; "or do yer want me to use it? Lay it down—you may look—I mean it."

The woman threw it upon the floor: she knew that the speaker could use it, and had no wish to put him to the proof.

"Come, come, no quarrelling!" observed Mike, in a conciliatory tone.

"What is she aggravatin' me for, then?"

"Well, well," said his host, "it is settled now. Lilly will be none the worse for a slight correction."

It must not be supposed that any sentiment of humanity had induced the mountebank to interfere—far from it: he was above such weakness; but the fact was, he had felt annoyed at not being allowed to vent his own ill-humour upon poor Fan, and did not like to see another indulge in a luxury he was debarred from.

It was the first blow Lillian had ever received; and—independent of the pain, which was a severe one—shame and grief caused her to sob convulsively.

She had no Jack now to protect her.

There was something perfectly fiend-like in the looks with which Bet from time to time regarded her whilst changing her dress. Lillian shuddered at them, and well she might, for she had made a bitter enemy of one who henceforth would have the power as well as will to torment her. But her terror increased when Mike informed her that she was to accompany his visitors to their home, and the other child remain in her place.

Fan heard the announcement with considerable satisfaction; it was years since she had worn such a nice frock. She felt warm, and had no wish to return to the night air.

"Mind what Dick says," she whispered in the ear of the shuddering victim. "He's the best of the two. Good bye."

Complaint and entreaty were alike useless; her late gaoler only laughed at her prayer to be allowed to remain till Jack returned. Poor Lilly! had he granted it, she would have remained long enough.

On the departure of his visitors, who took their new victim with them, the old convict, having secured the door of the cottage, mounted to the den where Fan was to sleep. His first care was to remove one of the scanty coverings from the bed; the next, to push back the skylight directly over it.

"Every little will help," he thought, as he mentally calculated on the effect the keen night air would produce upon the delicate lungs of the dying child.

He had some idea of sprinkling the sheet with water, but having none at hand, postponed it till the next night.

Descending to the kitchen, he took the whip in his hand, and seating himself opposite to Fan, began drawing it playfully through his fingers.

The child regarded him uneasily.

"I ain't a-going to cough, sir," she said.

"I don't mind yer coughing," replied the brute. "In fact, I rather likes to hear it—it's so lonesome in this place."

Fan began to think that it was very lonesome, and would have preferred the night air and the bed in the washhouse again.

"I want to talk to you, Lilly," added Mike.

"My name isn't Lilly."

"Isn't!" exclaimed the ruffian, with a fearful scowl. "I'll teach you that it is; and, if you say it is not, I'll cut the flesh off your bones. There ain't much on 'em. Now, what is yer name?"

"Lilly," faltered the child, her dilated eyes riveted on the whip.

The convict smiled. Fiddler Dick had told him rightly—there would be no occasion to use it: she knew the sight of it.

"And now, Lilly, remember that is yer name," continued Mike; "if you are good, I'll send for a doctor to cure you of that nasty cough."

The little sufferer did not exactly comprehend how she was to be cured; but she asked no questions: even curiosity, the first bud of childhood's intelligence, had withered in her young mind. Fear had destroyed it. She promised, faithfully promised, to answer to no other name than that of Lilly; and, satisfied with having achieved so much, the old convict conducted her to her sleeping-place, and locked her in.

"She can't last very long," he muttered to himself, as he turned into his own comparatively comfortable bed; "and then I shall be a made man. Five hundred pounds! I shall be a respectable man then! and no risk run; that is to say, no great risk."

It was some time before the man, whose longings for respectability were as impatient as his ideas of it were peculiar, could compose himself to sleep. Sometimes he thought of his nephew Jack, and the kind master he had provided him with; and wondered how he liked the sea. Then he recollected Lady Boothroyd and his brother, and chuckled under the bed-clothes at the pretty trick he was preparing to play them.

"Five hundred!" he repeated. "I'll have a thousand, at least, from each of 'em, afore I've done with 'em. They ain't a-goin' to do me, I can tell 'em. Cunning as they think themselves, they shall find Mike is a match for both."

With this reflection the old convict fell asleep, without one thought of the little sufferer he had so cruelly exposed to the night wind, which continued to whistle and moan through the loose tiles of the roof, sad as a dirge over a new-made grave.

Poor Lilly felt bitterly cold as she trudged through the streets by the side of Fiddler Dick and his wife, clad in the thin frock of Fanny. It was a long way from the Belvedere-road to Whitechapel; but, though her feet ached and her limbs shivered, she did not dare to complain. The scowling looks of the woman, the harsh, coarse voice of the man, terrified her, and her tears trickled silently till the keen frost froze them on her pale cheek. A few hours since, and she considered no fate could be worse than hers; but now she thought with regret on the warm fire and the close air of the cottage, even though it was impregnated with the odours of tobacco and gin, which made her both sick and giddy.

At last her conductors stopped at a wretched-looking house in one of the narrow, dingy alleys in the neighbourhood. Bet drew forth a key, and all three entered it. There was a blazing fire in the lower room, close to which three children were closely huddled. They had been ordered to keep it up till the return of their taskmaster.

Two of these children looked sickly; but the third, a hardy, strong little creature, had all the appearance of robust health.

It was her first winter; her companions had already passed one.

At the sight of Dick and his wife all three drew back to make room for them, and remained with their eyes fixed inquiringly upon the new-comer.

"Here, Liz," said the man, addressing the healthy looking girl, "here is a companion for you."

The child looked pleased with her new acquaintance. It was something to vary the monotony of that lonely, dark abode.

"You won't see Fan any more," added Bet; "we have taken her home to her friends, and brought—"

"Silence, can't you?" muttered her husband.

"What a tongue you have!"

The woman appeared dreadfully out of temper. It was the second time she had been reprovved, and all on account of Lillian. As she dared not show her ill-humour to him, her wrath silently gathered till she could find an opportunity of expending it upon the innocent cause of her vexation.

Supper was got ready, and as Fiddler Dick happened to be in an uncommonly amiable humour—for he considered that he had made an excellent bargain—the children were permitted to seat themselves at table and join in the meal; but it seemed to afford them no pleasure beyond that of eating; the mirth, the freedom of childhood were absent. Not one of them could tell how long the unusual fit of kindness might last, and the coarse jest be exchanged for the kick or the blow.

"This is what I call comfortable," said the ruffian, as he made himself a glass of strong gin-and-water, and then passed the bottle to Bet; "ain't it, Lilly?"

The child thought of Jack, and made no answer.

"Why don't you speak?" he added, crossly.

"Because she's obstinate as a young donkey," replied the woman, striving to excite his anger against her: "but you're allays a spilin' the gals."

The last observation betrayed the speaker's want of tact, for it drew the storm upon herself.

"And what is it to you if I does spile 'em?" exclaimed her husband: "they belongs to me, not you. She ain't used to us yet, that's all. She'll be reasonable enough—won't you, Lilly?"

"Y'es, sir," faltered the orphan.

The man called her to him, looked into her face, passed his hand over her long silken locks, and declared, with a chuckle, that eyes and air wor the very model of his own.

"You must call me father," he added.

"Papa is dead," sobbed the orphan, giving way to her tears.

"And what was your papa, as you call him?" inquired Dick.

Lillian made the same answer she had given to Mike, when he questioned her upon the subject—

"She didn't know, but he used to wear a red coat with gold somethings which she had forgotten the name of, on the shoulder."

"A common soldier!" roared Bet.

Fiddler Dick suspected that he must have been something more than a common soldier, but he kept his opinion to himself. He already felt quite satisfied that more than the twenty pounds his old pal had promised him might be made out of the affair; at all events, he was resolved to try it.

When the children were ordered to their dens, for it would be a misnomer to call them beds, Liz ventured to ask where the new-comer was to be put to.

"In Fan's place in the washus," answered the woman, angrily, "and quite good enough for her too."

"No, it ain't," said the man.

"I say it is," repeated his wife, getting very red in the face.

The mountebank began to draw down the corners of his mouth, always a bad sign with him, and laying down his pipe, stared Bet very hard in the face.

"What's up?" he asked; "you forget who's master; must I just remind yer on it?"

Bold as she naturally was, the woman could not endure the cold, serpent-like gaze of the speaker, who evidently meant all, if not more than his words implied.

"Take her with you, Liz," he added, patting Lillian on the cheek; "and mind you are both up early in the mornin' to exercise."

"Yes, master," replied the child.

"And everything ready for breakfast," said Bet.

"Yes, missis."

"Good night."

The children mechanically repeated the words and huddled out of the room. It was evidently a great relief to them to escape from the presence of their taskmaster.

"Well," muttered the man as they disappeared, "she is uncommon like me; just my air."

With the look of a man who felt perfectly satisfied with himself, he passed his dirty fingers through the greasy mass that thatched his round bullet-shaped head; it bore about as much resemblance to the locks of Lillian as horsehair does to the finest silk.

"It strikes me, Bet," he observed, as soon as they were alone, "that you've taken a dislike to that gal."

"What if I has?" muttered the female. "Ain't I to have my likes and dislikes as well as another?"

Under any other circumstances, that is to say, if Lilly had come into his hands in the ordinary way of business, this would have appeared only reasonable, for after all, Bet was a valuable wife to him; but he had other views and expectations.

"Can't you read it?" he said.

"Read what?" demanded the woman, sullenly.

"That the time'll come when that gal, if properly managed, will prove a fortin' to us. If somebody is villin' to pay fifty pounds to hear of her death, why, somebody else may be villin' to pay ten fifties to hear that she is alive. Now are you fly? can't you see it?"

Bet's amiable disposition had been too much ruffled to see anything of the kind. The prospect was too much in the perspective, even if she had been in the best of humours, to strike her very forcibly. Her only reply, therefore, was an impatient toss of the head, accompanied by something about the speaker's being able to see through a millstone.

"Very well," said her husband, savagely. "I know yer game, but ye shan't play it. I won't have a finger laid upon Lilly."

"You won't?"

"No; and if ye does, Bet, I'll—but there: I needn't say any more: you knows me. I've said it, and I means it. When the gal wants a thrashing I'll give it her myself."

How far the victim might profit by this very considerate arrangement remains to be seen. For the present, at least, it had one advantage—it secured her against any positive ill-usage on the part of Bet. The tigress for once was cowed.

During the night Lillian heard many things from her young companion, which very much surprised her: the first was that she was to be taught to dance on poles in the streets, and walk round the crowd with a little spangled cap in her hand, to collect contributions from the crowd. One piece of advice was really valuable.

"When master gives you a cut with the whip," said Liz, "don't cry out, and then you won't eat another. Fan used to shriek so, and that's why she got more than all the rest of us."

"And does he often beat you?" inquired the child, with a shudder.

"Only when he's drunk—at exercise—or the people don't give us much money," replied Liz: "he ain't half so sharp as Bet."

"Is he your father?"

"We always call him father in the streets," was the cautious answer—"at home we say master—though I can recollect another father; and—but no, no—I dare not tell you that."

"Why not?"

"You might split on me," answered Liz, cunningly; "I don't know you well enough yet. Ain't we warm and comfortable here," she added, evidently anxious to change the subject of conversation; "better with me than in the washus where poor Fan was. I used to creep to her at night, and snug to her to keep her warm till they found it out, and I got a good whipping."

"Why did they put her in the washhouse?"

"She did cough so," said the child.

Lilly mentally resolved, if possible, never to cough, and avoid being sent there.

In the morning, all the children were up early. Liz, being the eldest, lit the fire, and then began to put the room to rights; Loo, a blue-eyed, flaxen-haired, little creature, thrust one of her wasted arms into Fiddler Dick's boot, and began brushing it; whilst her sister Tilly removed the things from the table.

The orphan looked round her—she had scarcely dared to make any observation, for fear of giving offence, on the preceding night. In one corner of the place stood a drum, with a clarionet and set of Pandean pipes, suspended by a faded blue riband, over it; in another, the stilts for the dancers; there was a line attached to two hooks, one over the chimney piece, and the other fastened to the window opposite, on which hung a variety of little muslin dresses, spangled, or trimmed with artificial flowers and tinsel.

"That's mine," observed Liz, pointing, with a certain amount of pride, to the smartest one.

"And that's mine," lisped little Loo.

"And do you dance upon these things?" inquired Lillian, pointing to the poles in the corner.

"Yes!"

"It must be very hard."

The children laughed, and assured her that nothing could be more easy. To convince her that such was really the case, Loo dropped the boot she had been cleaning, and, with an agility which terrified the new-comer, sprang upon the stilts, by first placing the ends under her arms, like a pair of crutches; the others followed her example, and they walked, danced, and wheeled round the narrow space with a velocity that made Lillian feel quite giddy contemplating them.

"I shall never be able to do that," she observed, with a sigh.

"Oh, yes, you will," said Liz.

"She hasn't felt the whip yet," added Tilly.

Lillian had felt it. Bursting into tears, she silently bared her shoulder on which the mark of the lash still remained, red and inflamed. Her fellow-sufferers gazed upon it without expressing either curiosity or sympathy. It was no novelty to them; in fact, they almost wondered what she was crying for, seeing that the punishment must have been inflicted the preceding night.

"You will soon learn," lisped Loo. "Fan wasn't half so strong as you are."

The fire was blazing cheerfully—if anything could look cheerful in such a miserable hole—the boots cleaned, and everything ready for breakfast a couple of hours at least before the master of the house made his appearance. Even then, they had a long time to wait for Bet; like most gin-drinkers, neither of the precious pair cared much about food in the morning.

To do him justice, however, Fiddler Dick saw that the children had theirs; they were the sources of his idleness, the means by which he lived, and he could not afford to let them knock up.

"No work to-day, girls," he exclaimed, casting anything but an amiable glance at the window, through which the snow might be seen falling thickly.

His wife looked equally discontented; she calculated the keep of her victims, who tried very hard not to seem pleased at being spared exposure to the cold and snow.

"Can't be helped," he added; "mustn't lose time, however."

With a lazy, lounging air, as if every step he took was a trouble to him, he walked to the corner in which the stilts were piled, and picked out the shortest pair.

"Come here, Lilly," he said.

The heart of the orphan beat wildly, as she advanced to him.

"You haven't got your whip, Dick," observed Bet, maliciously.

"Give it us then," replied the ruffian. "And now, Lilly, come and take your first lesson."

(To be continued.)

THE FAITHFUL WIFE.—Nothing upon this earth can compare with the faithful attachment of a wife; there is no other creature who, for the object of her love, is so indomitable, so persevering, so ready to suffer and die. Under the most distressing circumstances, woman's weakness becomes a mighty power; all her shrinking and sinking pass away, and her spirit acquires the firmness of marble—adamantine firmness when circumstances drive her to put forth all her energies under the inspiration of her affections.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SELF-HELPERS.—II.

IN close connection with the elements of character to which reference was made in the last article, is Perseverance. This is one of the most obvious and most important parts of a self-helper's character. He steadily goes forward in the path he has chosen, and pursues it to the end.

Self-helpers, by ceaseless perseverance, overcome all difficulties. They do not for one repulse, nor for a thousand, forego the purpose they have resolved to effect. When the late president of America was young at the bar he failed, broke down in his client's defence, and lost the cause. When his friends consoled with him, he only laughed, and said, so far from being daunted, he was only the more resolved to succeed; and that if he failed ninety-nine times he would try the hundredth. He afterwards succeeded, and gained the most distinguished position his country could bestow. This perseverance is the mainspring which perpetually impels the firmest souls. I believe that the ability for great things is lodged in every human spirit; but only the persevering worker knows what this latent power is really capable of achieving. The self-helpers march toward the execution of their purpose as if they were intent on the conquest of a world. They are not daunted by any obstacles, and if foiled they only retreat to recover strength that they may renew the attack.

The day was waning on the field of Marengo, when Napoleon—observing a particular part, the capture of which would decide the victory—called to the brave Dessaix, and said to him, "Can you carry that point?" "I will try," was the laconic reply. He did try—he succeeded—but fell in the moment of victory. Self-helpers have thus given their life for their victories on more than one occasion. Many a standard, floating in the wind, has been planted on the battlement by a dying hand. Thus, a self-helper's life is sometimes written in his heart's blood. Dante's Divine Comedy is mainly attributable to the troubled life of the writer. He was driven from city to city, he was in poverty, misery, and with the prospect of death before him, and this made his book so terribly real, that the people, when they saw him, used to whisper, "See, there's the man that was in hell." The very fact of danger and death hedging about the great man's progress makes him oftentimes all the greater—all his energies are called forth, and he is mightfully in earnest.

A strong fortification is won, not by hap-hazard shots which wound it in a thousand different places, and pierce it through in none; but by directing the battery to some one point, in persevering attacks, until an avenue is shattered down for victorious hosts to enter and take possession. Iron, and even the hardest steel, is blunted on rock by a single blow; but the softest water by continually falling in the same place, scoops a hollow in adamant and forces its way through granite and marble. A little worm, starting at the bottom of the Pacific Ocean, by persevering toil builds up vast islands of coral, against which the stoutest ships are wrecked, and on which colonies of men may live.

Columbus had to encounter difficulties which others might have considered insurmountable; but by steady perseverance he triumphed over them all.

"For Hercules himself must yield to odds;
And many strokes, though with a little axe,
Hew down and fell the hardest timbered oak."

It was not the magnitude of the Grecian army, nor the martial skill of Achilles, that conquered Troy; but ten years of perseverance. Caratach, in one of Fletcher's plays, when admonished to inquire into the mind of the god Audate, replies:—

"His hidden meaning lies in our endeavours,
Our valours are our best gods."

There is much truth in this; and a truth practically acknowledged by all self-helpers.

Perhaps there is no case of self-helpful perseverance more interesting, or more full of instruction, than that which is related of the founder of the Foley family.

This man was a fiddler, living near Stourbridge, was often witness of the immense labour and loss of time caused by dividing the rods of iron necessary in making nails. The discovery of the process called "splitting," in works called "splitting mills," was first made in Sweden; and the consequences of this advance in art were most disastrous to the iron manufacturers of Stourbridge. Foley, the fiddler, was shortly missed from his accustomed rounds, and was not seen again for many years. He had resolved to ascertain by what process the splitting of the bars of iron was accomplished; and, without communicating his intentions to a single human being, he proceeded to Hull, and thence, without funds, worked his passage to the Swedish iron port.

Arrived in Sweden, he begged and fiddled his way to the iron foundries, where, after a time, he became a universal favourite with the workmen; and from the apparent entire absence of intelligence, or anything like ultimate object, he was received into the works, to every part of which he had access. He took the advantage thus offered, and having stored his memory with observations, and all the combinations, he disappeared from among his kind friends as he had appeared, no one knew whence or whither. On his return to England, he communicated his voyage and its results to Mr. Knight and another person in the neighbourhood, with whom he was associated, and by whom the necessary buildings were erected and machinery provided. When at length everything was prepared, it was found the machinery would not act—at all events, it did not answer the sole end of its erection; it would not split the bar of iron. Foley disappeared again, and it was concluded that shame and mortification at his failure had driven him away for ever. Not so: again, though somewhat more speedily, he found his way to the Swedish iron works, where he was received most joyfully; and to make sure of their fiddler, he was lodged in the splitting mill itself. Here was the very aim and end of his life attained, beyond his utmost hopes. He examined the works, and very soon discovered the cause of his failure. He now made rough drawings, and having remained sufficient time to verify his observations, and to impress them clearly and vividly on his mind, he made his way to the port, and once more returned to England. This time he was completely successful, and by the results of his experience, he enriched himself, and greatly benefited the English trade.

The successes achieved by indomitable perseverance cannot be over-estimated. The self-helpers have invariably this spirit within, a spirit which nothing can daunt, and nothing destroy. One day it was advertised in Paris that a balloon of unusual dimensions would ascend from some public gardens. The time came, but the ascent could not be effected. The crowd grew impatient, as crowds will when they are disappointed. Well, suddenly a boy jumped over the palisade, and cut the silken bag of the balloon into a dozen pieces. It was a boy belonging to one of the military schools—Napoleon Bonaparte was his name; and who would not have laughed to see his flushed face and boyish passion as they took him to the guard-house, if they had been told that he was the future emperor of France? Yet, by steady perseverance, he gained that post. Battle after battle, triumph after triumph: the soldiers used to say on their march, "The babbling avocats up at Paris—all play and no work: no wonder it all goes wrong. We must send our petit corporal there." And they did it. The Corsican schoolboy trampled down the world—the world recoiled, and flung him out upon a rock to die. But his name was a talisman that after years, and years of legitimacy and illegitimacy, of born kings and elected monarchs, could inspire all France with enthusiasm.

It is not necessary to say more. Here is the fact—that in all ages of the world there have been men who have risen by their own unaided exertions to positions of honour and renown. Clear enough it is, that these men had clear heads and strong hearts—that they worked laboriously, and persevered indefatigably. Much ENCOURAGEMENT is to be drawn from it. It is not one of those facts that seem to have no bearing on ourselves. It is something that has to do with us, for WHAT MAN HAS DONE, MAN MAY DO. THE GODS HELP THOSE WHO HELP THEMSELVES.

There are two positions which the indolent and helpless are wont to regard as impregnable; and when they hear of people succeeding in the world, they set down that success to their having reached one of the two.

If the man succeeds without help, then they say, "What an extraordinary genius! what a marvellous man—so liberally endowed by nature, so highly gifted! Ah me! sure such a man is certain to succeed."

Now, I am not going to argue there is no original difference in minds. Even supposing the point was admitted, and every man was equally capable at the very outset, the difference of position in life, and the influence of surrounding circumstances, would make the two different within a very short time. But what I do say is this—that industry and perseverance will do more for a man than anything else that I know; that the remark applies alike to art, science, literature, and that the history of the self-helpers is only an illustration of the truth.

The other great point is, that a regular education will do everything. Disregarding the fact that most or nearly all of the world's best men have been half-taught or self-taught, they have an absurd faith in the efficiency of a regular education. "Had I spent seven or eight years," they say, "within some learned walls, I might then have been able to erect some pillar of literary excellence. But I have not received the necessary preparation of a learned education—a classical apprenticeship. I may lose myself in regions which others have explored, but I can never make any discovery, or add a single particle to the common stock of knowledge. I must resign every department of literature to those who have enjoyed the happy shade of academic bowers." Very different is the language of the self-helper. He determines to avail himself of the advantages which are his, a far better plan than sighing over what can never belong to him.

But as it is not one charge that usually wins the field, but repeated onsets from different points, so the self-helper often changes his employment that he may attain his end. Emerson has recorded good practical truth in the following remarks:—"If our young men miscarry in their first enterprises, they lose all heart; if the young merchant fails, men say he is ruined; if the finest genius studies at one of our colleges, and is not installed in an office within one year afterwards, in the city or suburbs of Boston or New York, it seems to his friends and to himself that he is right in being disheartened and in complaining all the rest of his life. A sturdy lad from New Hampshire or Vermont, who in turn tries all the professions—who teams it, farms it, peddles, keeps school, preaches, edits a paper, goes to congress, buys a township, and so forth, in successive years, and always, like a cat, falls on his feet—is worth a hundred of these city dolls. He walks abreast with his days, and feels no shame in not studying a profession, for he does not postpone his life, but lives already. He has not one chance, but a hundred chances."

The chief difficulty in self-helpfulness is to begin. It is like the story told of Buffon the naturalist. He used to bid his servant over night call him up early in the morning; but when the morning came, and he was roused from his comfortable sleep, and was called up to abdicate the congenial blankets, he had no disposition to do so; but, expostulating, threatening, beseeching, would be finally dragged up, and that one effort over, would contentedly and philosophically set to work. Just so it is with the mind and the energy of will. You must wake up both, and once fairly awake, the self-helper works in earnest.

The self-helper will never admit the idler's excuse that he has no time. The more a man works the more opportunity he seems to have for leisure. A self-helper is a time-economist. He does not fling away the fragments; he gathers them up that nothing may be lost, and the world is surprised at the bushels which these fragments fill.

The self-helper knows nothing of the sloven's haste. He does everything in his best manner, and studies hard to acquit himself with propriety. He has, too, his eyes and ears about him. He purges his mind from prejudice, never relies on hearsay, but takes up his stand on solid ground.

It is quite possible to be a self-helper; and self-helpfulness once attained, who can predicate the result? Whatever a self-helper undertakes, he carries through by doing it with all his might. Does he aspire to scholarship, he reads much and thinks more; is it to be a capitalist, he takes care of the pence and the pounds, and leaves nothing to take care of itself. Are his energies called in some nobler cause—the spread of education, the advancement, social and political, of the people, the progress of religion through the world—he brings all his mind and all his body to bear upon it. The sentiment of his soul is characteristically expressed in the following Yankee rhyme:—

"Never doubt a righteous cause,
Go ahead.
Throw yourself completely in,
Conscience sharpens all your laws,
Manfully through thick and thin
Go ahead.
"Do not ask who'll go with you—
Go ahead.
Numbers! spurn the coward's plea;
If there be but one or two,
Single-handed though it be,
Go ahead.
"Though before you mountains rise,
Go ahead.
Scale them, certainly you can;
Let them proudly dare the skies;
What are mountains to a man?
Go ahead.
"Though fierce waters round you dash,
Go ahead.
Let no hardship baffle you;
Though the heavens roar and flash,
Still undaunted, firm, and true,
Go ahead."

THE MISTAKE.

"I'll never do it—never, so long as I live!" And the boy clinched his hands together, and strode up and down the room, his fine features flushed, and his forehead darkened with anger and shame. "I'd ask the minister's pardon, in father's presence, of course I would; but to go before the whole academy, boys and girls, and do this!" His whole frame fairly writhed at the thought. "Ellsworth Grant, you'll brand yourself as a coward and a fool all the days of your life."

"But father never retracts, and he said I must do this or leave school, and go out on the farm to work; and the whole village will know the reason, and I shall be ashamed to look anybody in the face. I've a good mind to run away." The boy's voice grew lower, and a troubled, bewildered expression gathered on his flushed features.

"It would be very hard to leave all the old places; and then, never to see Nellie again; it would almost break her heart, I know it would." And his face worked convulsively a moment, but it settled down into a look of dogged resolution the next. "I mustn't think of that now; though it's only ten miles to the seaport, and I could walk that in two hours, and get a place on some ship about to sail, before father was any wiser. Some time I'd come back, of course; but not till I was old enough to be my own master." The boy sat down by the table, and buried his face in his hands, and the sunset of the summer's day poured its currents of crimson and amber into the chamber, and over the bowed figure of the boy.

At last he lifted his head: there was a look of quiet resolve in the dark hazel eyes and about the usually smiling mouth, which in youth is so painful, because it always indicates mental suffering.

Ellsworth Grant was, at this time, just fifteen; he was his father's only son, and he was motherless.

Mr. Grant was a stern, severe man; while Ellsworth inherited his mother's warm, sunny temperament. His father was a man of unswerving integrity and rectitude—a man who would have parted with his right hand sooner than have committed a dishonest act; but one who had few sympathies for faults indigenous to peculiar temperaments and characters; a man whose heart had never learned the height and depth, the all-embracing beauty of that mightiest text, which is the one diamond among all the pearls and precious stones of the Bible:—"Be ye kind one to another."

He was a hard, exacting parent, and Ellsworth was a fun-loving, mischief-brewing boy, that everybody loved, despite his faults, and the scrapes he was always getting his neck into. There is no doubt that Mr. Grant loved his son, but he was not a demonstrative man; and, then—it is the sad, sad story that may be written of many a parent—"he didn't understand his child," and there was no mother, with her soft voice and soothing words, to come between them.

Ellsworth's last offence can be told in a few words. The grape vine, which, heavy with purple clusters, trailed over the kitchen windows of the school-master's residence, had been robbed of more than half its fruit, one Saturday afternoon, when the inmates were absent.

The perpetrators of this deed were, however, discovered to be a party of the school-boys, among whom was Ellsworth.

The rest of the scholars privately solicited and obtained the school-master's pardon; but Mr. Grant, who was terribly shocked at this evidence of his son's want of principle, insisted that he should make a public confession of his fault, before the assembled school.

In vain Ellsworth explained and entreated. His father was invulnerable, and the boy's haughty spirit entirely unmitigated.

"Ellsworth, Ellsworth, where are you going?" There came down the garden walk an eager, quivering voice, that made the boy start, and turn round eagerly, as he stood at the garden gate, while the light of the rising day was flushing the gray mountains in the east with rose-coloured hues. A moment later, a small, light figure, crowned with golden hair, and a large shawl thrown over its night-dress, stood by the boy's side.

"Why, Nellie, how could you? you'll take cold in your bare feet, among these dews."

"I can't help it, Ellsworth." It was a tear-swollen face that looked up wistfully to the boy's. "You see, I haven't slept any, hardly, all night, thinking about you; and so I was up, looking out of the window, and saw you going down the walk."

"Well, Nellie," pushing back the yellow, tangled hair, and looking at her fondly, "you see, I can't do what father says I must, to-day, and so I'm going off."

"Oh, Ellsworth! what will uncle say?" cried the child, betwixt her shivering and weeping, "what will uncle say? How long shall you be gone?"

"I don't know," evasively; "I shan't be back to-day, though. But you mustn't stand here, talking any longer. Father'll be up soon, you know. Now, good-bye, Nellie."

There was a sob in his throat, as he leaned down and kissed the sweet face, that had only seen a dozen summers, and then, he was gone.

"Go and call Ellsworth to breakfast, will you, Ellen?" said Mr. Grant, two hours later.

"He isn't up stairs, uncle." And then, as they two sat down to theirs, Ellen briefly related what had transpired.

Mr. Grant's face grew dark as she proceeded. "He thinks to elude the confession, and frighten me, by running off for a day or two," he said; "he will find he is mistaken."

So that day and the next passed, and nothing more was said, but Ellen, who was his adopted child, and the orphan daughter of his wife's most intimate friend, noticed that he began to look restless, and to start anxiously at the sound of a footfall; but still Ellsworth came not.

At last a strict search was instituted, and it was discovered that Ellsworth had gone to sea, in a ship bound for some part of the western coast of Asia, on a three years' voyage.

"I hope he will come back a better boy than he left," was Mr. Grant's solitary commentary, but in the long nights Ellen used to hear him walking restlessly up and down his room, and his black hair began to be thickly scattered with gray.

But the worst was not come yet. One November night, when the winds clamoured and stormed fiercely among the old apple trees in the garden, Mr. Grant and Ellen sat by the fire in the old kitchen, when the former removed the wrapper from his weekly newspaper, and the first passage that met his eye was one that told him how the ship —, the one in which Ellsworth had sailed, had been wrecked off the coast, and every soul on board had perished.

Then the voice of the father woke up in the heart of the old man. He staggered toward Ellen with a white, haggard face, and a wild, fearful cry, "My boy! my boy!" It was more than his proud spirit could bear. "Oh, Ellsworth! Ellsworth!" and he sank down senseless, and his head fell into the lap of the frightened child.

After this Mr. Grant was a changed man. I do not know which was the more to blame, the father or the son. But equally to the heart of many a parent and many a child, the story has its message and its warning.

Eight years had passed. It was summer time again, and the hills were green, and the fields were yellow with her glory. It was in the morning, and Mr. Grant sat under the porch of the great old rambling cottage; for the day was very warm, and the top was wrapped round thickly with a hop vine.

These eight years had greatly changed him. He seemed to have stepped very suddenly into old age, and the light wind that stirred the green leaves, shook the gray hairs over his wrinkled forehead as he sat there reading the village newspaper with eyes that had begun to grow dim.

And every little while, fragments of some old-fashioned tune floated out to the old man, soft, sweet, stray fragments; and fitting back and forth from the pantry to the breakfast table was a young girl, not handsome, but with a sweet, frank, rosy countenance, whose smiles seemed to hover naturally as sunshine over June skies.

She wore a pink calico dress, the sleeves tucked above her elbows, and a "checked apron." Altogether, she was a fair, plump, healthful-looking country girl.

And while the old man read the paper under the hop-vine, and the young girl hummed and fluttered between the pantry and the kitchen table, a young man opened the small front gate, and went up the narrow path to the house.

He went up very slowly, staring all about him with an eager, wistful look, and sometimes the muscles of his mouth worked and quivered, as one's will when strong emotions are shaking the heart.

He had a firm, sinewy frame, of middling height. He was not handsome, but there was something in his face you would have liked: perhaps it was the light away down in the dark eyes—perhaps it was the strength and character foreshadowed in the lines about the mouth. I cannot tell; it was as intangible as it was certain you would have liked that face.

The door was open, and the young man walked into the wide hall. He stood still a moment, staring around the low wall, and on the palm-leaved paper that covered the side. Then a thick mist broke into his eyes, and he walked on like one in a dream, apparently quite forgetful that this was not his own home.

I think those low, sweet fragments of song unconsciously drew his steps to the kitchen, for a few moments later, he stood in the doorway, watching that fair girl as she removed the small rolls of yellow butter from a wooden box to an earthen plate. I can hardly transcribe the expression of the man's face. It was one of mingled doubt, surprise, eagerness—that at last all converged into one of joyful certainty.

"Merciful Heaven!" The words broke from the girl's lips, and the last roll of butter fell from the little hands, as, looking up, she saw the stranger standing in the doorway; and her rosy cheeks actually turned pale with the start of surprise.

The exclamation seemed to recall the young man to himself. He removed his hat. "Excuse me," he said, with a bow of instinctive grace, "but can you tell me, ma'am, if Mr. Grant resides here?"

"Oh yes, sir. Will you walk into the parlour and take a seat?" Uncle, here is a gentleman who wishes to see you;" and, in a flutter of embarrassment, she hurried towards the door.

The gentleman did not stir, and removing his silver spectacles, the old gentleman came in; and the two looked at each other, the older with some surprise, and a great deal of curiosity in his face; the younger with a strange, longing eagerness in his dark eyes that seemed wholly unaccountable.

"Do you know me, sir?" he asked, after a moment's silence, and there was a shaking in his voice.

"I do not know that I ever had the pleasure of meeting you before," said Mr. Grant.

But here a change came over the face of the girl, who had been watching the stranger intently all the time. A light, the light of a long-buried recollection, seemed to break up from her heart into her face. Her breath came gaspingly between her parted lips, her dilated eyes were fastened on the stranger; then, with a quick cry, she sprang forward.

"Uncle, it is Ellsworth, it is surely Ellsworth!"

Oh! if you had seen that old man then! His cheeks turned ashen pale, his frame shivered; he tottered a few steps forward, and then the great wild cry of his heart broke out—"Is it you, my boy, Ellsworth?"

"It is I, father; are you glad to see me?" And that strong man asked the question with a sob, and a timid voice like that of a little child.

"Come to me! come to me, my boy, that I thought was dead, that I have seen every night for the last eight years, lying with the dark eyes of his mother under the white waves. Oh! Ellsworth, God has sent you from the dead! Come to me, my boy!"

And the old man drew his arms around his son's neck, and leaned his gray head on his strong breast, and for a while there was no word spoken between them.

"You have forgiven me, father?" asked the young man at last.

"Do not ask me that, my boy? How many times I would have given everything I possessed on earth to ask 'Forgive me, Ellsworth?' and to hear you answer, 'Yes, father.'"

So there was peace between those two, such peace as the angels who walk up and down the hills, crowned with the royal purple of eternity, tune their harps over!

"And this—this is Nellie? How she has altered! But I knew the voice," said Ellsworth, at last, as he took the girl's hands in his own, and kissed her wet cheeks, adding very tenderly: "My darling sister, Nellie." And at last they all went out under the cool shade of the hop vine, and there Ellsworth told his story.

The merchantman in which he had sailed from home was wrecked, and many on board perished; but some of the sailors constructed a raft, on which the boy was saved, with several others. They were afterwards rescued by a vessel bound for South America. Here Ellsworth had obtained a situation in a large mercantile establishment, first as a clerk, afterwards as junior partner.

He had written home twice, but the letters had been lost or miscarried. As he received no answer, he supposed his father had never forgiven him for "running away," and tried to reconcile himself to the estrangement.

But he had, of late, found it very difficult to do this, and, at last, he had resolved to return to his home, have an interview with his parent, and try whether the sight of his long absent son would not soften his heart.

Oh! it was a happy trio that sat under the green leaves of the hop vine that summer morning. It was a happy trio that sat down in that low, old-fashioned kitchen, to the delicious dinner of chicken and fresh peas that Nelly had been so long in preparing.

And that night three very happy people knelt in the old sitting room, while the trembling voice of the old man thanked God for him that was dead and "alive again."

Another year went by, and one bright summer morning the old gray church on the green was opened, and crowded with curious, smiling faces.

Suddenly there came a hush over all the rustle of eagerness and expectancy, for Ellsworth Grant and Ellen passed up the aisle, he looking very manly and happy, and she very shy and fair in her white bridal robes.

So they stood together at the altar, and said to each other those most solemn, most beautiful words that man and woman ever have said or ever will say to each other—"Till death us do part."

And behind them stood an old man with gray hairs and wrinkled face, about whom the people gathered with congratulations as soon as the newly-married pair had left the church. And the old man rubbed his hands, and a smile, very beaming, very full of "perfect peace," went over his face, as he said—

"God has dealt very kindly with me. He sent my boy home to me, and now he has given me two children."

Monody

ON THE

DEATH OF GENERAL HAVELOCK, K.C.B.

MOURN not for the warrior dead;

He rests not on a broken shield;

Mourn not the gallant spirit fled;

For victory crowned his latest field.

Mourn that the wreath his country gave

Can only serve to deck his grave.

Mourn for the hearts whose hopes are fled;

Eyes that are dimmed by sorrow's tear

See not the halo conquest shed

Round Havelock's sad, untimely bier.

The laurel cannot calm despair,

Grief only marks the cypress there.

He was no silken carpet knight,

No protégé of court or throne;

But gained each step to glory's height

By gallant deeds, by worth alone.

The race of honour nobly run,

His was the meed by merit won.

How he avenged each martyr's tears,

The heathen in their fury scourged;

How beauty's prayer, and childhood's fears,

To more than mortal daring urged,

Let Lucknow's rescued host record,

And bless the Christian soldier's sword.

Rear not the stone, inscribe no verse;

The people's soldier needs them not.

Their grateful voice his deeds rehearse!

The poet's strains are soon forgot!

Children unborn the tale shall tell

How Havelock fought! how Havelock fell!

The herald's records fade with age;

Time rots each line of parchment fame.

His country hath a nobler page

On which to write her hero's name—

Each English heart that page supplies—

A nation's memory never dies.

J. F. SMITH.

SOMETIME.

"Oh, dear! I hope you're satisfied now, Mr. Fern. You've spilled the water all over my dress, which Bridget was half the morning doing up for me; and that's all you care!" and with an angry jerk, and a frown that disfigured a face which could look very sweet, Mrs. Fern rose up, and shook the drops which had fallen from her husband's glass.

Now Mr. Fern was by no means a perfect man. I presume he was, on the whole, a pretty fair sample of the average of husbands; but he certainly was not one of those very few who could take cross words and general fault-finding patiently.

"Keep your dress out of the way next time, then, Mrs. Fern, if you don't want it soiled; it'll save that and your temper, too, I hope," and the gentleman placed the offending glass on the table, and left the room.

A robin was singing softly by the open window, and the still afternoon sunshine came in through the thick peach boughs, and fell on the floor.

Perhaps it was these things, and perhaps it was the soft hand of her good angel, that dropped the thought in Mrs. Fern's heart, but she certainly felt sorry a few moments later that she had spoken so angrily. She was still a young wife, and the daily discords of married life had not obliterated the memory of that time when it was full of love and harmony, when petty tempers, and harsh words, and little rudenesses, had never come between her and the man whom she surely loved better than any one on earth.

"I declare it's too bad," murmured the lady, sewing away very rapidly at the handkerchief she was hemming for her husband. "Robert and I must stop talking in this perpetual fault-finding way to each other. I suppose it's partly my fault, but dear me! he needn't take everything I say in such dudgeon."

"I wouldn't have believed the first year we were married, that matters would ever have come to this pass. I must make an effort sometime to bring back the old gentleness and harmony. I suspect I'm a little quick-tempered, and so, surely, is Robert."

"No matter! we'll make it all right, sometime." Ah, poor mistaken wife! sitting there so peacefully in the midst of that summer sunshine, taking that lie to your heart.

Has not six years of wife-hood taught you how much easier it is to gain a husband's love than to retain it? And not keeping this truth before you, you will go on blindly in the way you have begun, until little squabbles, and daily disputes, end in open defiance, and fierce recrimination, and final indifference, it may be hatred.

Sometime! sometime! Never trust it, reader, for it is a land of graves, and the ghosts of good resolutions, and broken promises, stalk through it, forever and forever.

THE honourable member for Finsbury, Mr. Thomas Slingsby Duncombe, is by no means the least popular of our representatives in the House of Commons. Before his gray hairs began to show, and his naturally vigorous constitution gave way to an uncertain state of health, he was looked upon as a "pet" among the extremes of the liberal side of the House. He was distinguished (as, indeed, he still is) for the thorough independence of his political views, the courage with which he maintained a position he deemed right, and the gentlemanly and decorous manner with which he invariably endeavoured to impress his convictions upon the mind of his opponent.

Mr. Duncombe is descended from the family of the Fevershams, and is cousin to the present earl. He was born in August, 1796. On the completion of his educational studies, which were principally pursued at Harrow, the subject of our sketch fixed upon the army as a profession. He obtained a commission in the Coldstream Guards; and, finding the soldier's life agreeable, he undertook service abroad as well as at home. He continued in the army upwards of ten years, at the close of which period he threw up his commission for the purpose of seeking parliamentary honours.

In 1826 Mr. Duncombe was returned member of parliament for Hertford, and sat for that borough until the passing of the Reform Bill. His right to the seat was then contested by a noble lord, who was fortunate enough to come in at the head of the poll, but afterwards had to succumb to the petition of Mr. Duncombe. His lordship was unseated, and the borough had the unenviable distinction of being disfranchised for the remainder of that parliament.

Towards the middle of 1834 a vacancy occurred in the representation of Finsbury. Although opposed by Mr. Wakley, the present coroner for Middlesex, Mr. Babbage, and others strong in the confidence of the good people of that borough, Mr. Duncombe offered his services, tried the issue, and was accepted. Henceforward he was safe as far as his parliamentary seat was concerned. From that time to the present he has continued to represent Finsbury, and he is now the only metropolitan member remaining who, having sat in the first reformed parliament, has ever since remained attached to the same constituency. He has been chosen by the electors of Finsbury for no less than seven consecutive parliaments.

During the many years which have elapsed since his first election for this influential metropolitan borough, Mr. Duncombe has had occasion to join in many important debates. It is not in our province to give an opinion upon the merits of the political matters discussed; it may be mentioned, however, that the views of the honourable member, as expressed in the House of Commons and at the many public meetings in which he has taken part, have invariably exhibited a liberal tendency. Whenever occasion seemed to require it, Mr. Duncombe has shown spirit and courage in maintaining or defending his opinion. He has no claim to distinction as an original genius, or as the possessor of brilliant, statesman-like qualities; but he is no less valuable as a public servant. He has always earned the respect of his colleagues in parliament for his staunch advocacy of reform measures, as well as for his consistency in vindicating the rights of the oppressed.

The honourable gentleman is a good speaker; he can argue long and energetically, without using a word to offend the nicest sense of decorous language or gentlemanly bearing. In the early part of his career Mr. Duncombe was remarkable in this respect.

FUTTEHPOR, PROVINCE OF ALLAHABAD.

He cultivated the qualities of the perfect gentleman not only in manner, but in style. For years he was pointed out in the House of Commons as the beau Brummell of the senate. In person, he was the beau idéal of a gentleman—dressed well, and always in keeping; was never seen without brilliant, well-fitting boots, fashionable gloves, and an equipage worthy of an aristocrat of the highest order. Illness of late years has altered all this. As far as conversation or debate goes, Mr. Duncombe is still the polished gentleman, but the other distinguishing characteristics are less marked. He has still the slim figure of youth, but it is bent by the weight of sixty years, and more especially by the severity of recent sickness. The latter circumstance caused Mr. Duncombe to be absent from his parliamentary duties upwards of two sessions, but his constituents considerably forgave him, out of respect for his past services.

At the last general election he was returned at the head of the poll by a majority of thousands, and with an enthusiasm quite equal to that of former years.

Herewith we present the reader with a portrait of Mr. T. S. Duncombe, from an excellent photograph by Mayall, of Regent-street.

FUTTEHPOR.

As neighbours of a similar name are sometimes mistaken for one another, so Futtehpore and Futtipore, although a considerable distance apart, are occasionally confounded with one another.

Futtipore, or, as it is sometimes called, Futtipore Sikra, is an inland town of India, in the province of Agra, on the British frontier, nineteen miles distant from the capital. It was, three hundred years ago, the favourite residence of Acbar Khan, and it still boasts of the ruins of the gorgeous palace which he there erected. Acbar also built about this city a battlemented wall, and fortified it in all respects after the fashion of his time. But, now-a-days, its glory has departed, the town itself is small and thinly inhabited by an impoverished population, and its chief attraction to the traveller is the débris of its former magnificence.

There is another Futtehpore, or, as it is commonly written, Futtiehpore, in the province of Allahabad, on the high road from Bengal to the Upper Provinces. It is sixty miles north-west of Allahabad, and contains a number of well-built houses and an elegant and spacious mosque.

The elevated position occupied by the town, and its peculiar architecture, render it particularly interesting to the admirer of the picturesque, and few towns wear so attractive an appearance as Futtehpore, in the brilliant light of an Indian sky, and with every cupola glittering in a splendour of sunshine unknown to our northern climate.

At Futtehpore the Dinapore rebels were defeated with immense slaughter. Uncertain whither to betake themselves, after the fall of Delhi, either to Lucknow, or to make their way to the Ganges in small parties, they fell in with a detachment of troops under Colonel Powell. The rebels immediately posted themselves in the most advantageous position; but their superior numbers and more eligible situation were alike unavailing. The red-coats sent the pandies flying before them, captured their guns, and stripped their camp.

Futtehpore has thus become interesting as the locality of a decisive victory, and as the spot where poor Colonel Powell lost his life. That brave man died like a soldier—in the discharge of his duty. The action was severe but decisive, the Dinapore rebels being completely defeated.

Futtipore Sikra has also been the scene of a recent victory. It will be remembered that the rebels came down on Agra, and retreated faster than they came. The surprise on the part of the enemy was complete, and upon troops less inured to war than the men who stormed Delhi it might have operated very unfavourably. But the veterans, English and Sikhs, readily recovered themselves. A desperate charge of a party of the Lancers, and a rolling fire from the 75th and 2nd Punjabees in squares, checked and repelled the enemy's horse, and then the troops formed in line and drove back his infantry. So complete was the rout that the mutineers of Indore and Mhow have ceased to exist as a body. For a time a party of them held together, and occupied some buildings at Futtipore Sikra, but when a small force moved against them from Agra, under Colonel Cotton, all fled and dispersed but a few desperate men, who were cut to pieces. "How many of the enemy were wounded?" asked an engineer officer at Agra of a soldier, when the force came back. "There were none wounded," replied the man, with a look that could not be mistaken.

CHAPTER XXXII.

NURSES THE SICK.

"Aye, aye, ring away, old boy, it'll do ye good: patience is a virtue." And all the household laughed at the easy good humour of the colonel's valet as the bedroom bell rang for the third time that evening unanswered.

Ralph, thoroughly knocked up with day and night work for so long, had been obliged to take to bed on his own account, and could hardly manage to crawl, at long intervals, from his room, which was allowed to adjoin his master's, to see how he was going on—his office being filled, at least nominally, by the above-named gentleman.

On this occasion Ralph Grange was worse than usual; and the faithful, ill-used old servant lay listening to the unheeded bells in a perfect agony.

"It's our turn now," said one of the menials, as he stretched his finely-turned calves before the fire, and smoothed down the plush, while the bell was ringing a fourth time as if the wires were tearing all before them.

"It's our turn now. Swear to thy night-cap, dear sir. We're busy, very busy; and we all remains yours respectfully."

When the doctor's carriage drove up, as it did after two or three more bedroom ringings, the physician found the colonel in a dead faint, lying half out of bed. He had evidently been making a desperate effort to get up—no doubt in a terrible rage—and had sunk exhausted by the attempt.

And there he found the master of that splendid estate, without one single attendant (and that not by any means for the first time), the plaything and the sport of his own servants.

After bringing the colonel somewhat to himself, and duly reprimanding the servants (to how little purpose was sufficiently plain before he had been gone half an hour), the doctor sat for a while by the miserable man, who, tortured with dropsy of the chest and half a dozen other ailments, was propped up in bed.

"When did you hear of Claude Blance?" asked the physician, who was a really kind old friend of the family.

And the colonel had hard work to gulp down an oath, as he answered, that he had never had a line from his son since he left England; but that the gentleman who travelled with him, half tutor, half companion, had written him a short note six weeks back, from Vienna.

It was a miserable interview that the good old physician had with his patient that day.

Latson spoke of disinheriting his son—of going to look for him—of selling The Towers—of discharging all the servants (who had already so effectually discharged him)—and of a dozen other schemes, at which the doctor good-naturedly smiled; and, for the sake of discouraging and dispersing them, acquiesced. For to try to thwart the colonel, was to give him his own way at once.

From the master's room, the physician passed to the chamber of Mr. Grange.

"Well, Ralph, and how are we this morning?"

"Lord love ye! don't ask me. I'm in a perfect fever, sir. Feel my pulse, sir, and see if I ain't. If I could only get down amongst those scoundrels, I'd make them understand a little of old Ralph's mind. How's the colonel, sir, if you please?"

"Not so well, Ralph, not so well. A good deal disturbed, Ralph, this morning. Those people down stairs are behaving disgracefully. Can't some of them be got rid of?"

"Aye, aye, sir—they're got rid of every month, in this house. Where's the new ones to come from?—that's the business. We've had all the servants in the county, or thereabouts, during the last few years, doctor."

"What's the reason, Ralph?" asked the doctor, speaking very much under his breath.

And the old man turned his head round on the pillow away from the physician, and fairly gave in to his honest grief. The bedclothes shook again as old Ralph sobbed.

"Well, well," said the doctor, "we won't talk about it now. I must send along a nurse, a regularly qualified person, to take charge of the colonel. This kind of thing mustn't last another twenty-four hours, Ralph. Some one shall be here to-night. Good day, my good fellow."

And the physician, knowing that Grange ailed nothing but the infirmities of years, was preparing to leave the room.

"Stop one moment, if you please, sir," cried Ralph. "By all means."

"Did the colonel tell ye, sir, may I be so bold, when he heard from Master Claude Blance?"

"He has never heard at all, Ralph; but What's-his-name, the tutor, has written once, but the young gentleman not at all."

"No, sir, I thought as much; you'll be surprised to hear, though, that I've heard from the young master, and more than once."

"Aye, aye!" said the doctor.

"Yes, sir."

And here Mr. Grange turned away again, and paid to the son a tribute of genuine agony, similar to that he had accorded to the father.

The doctor waited patiently.

"Don't try to cure old Ralph, doctor," the steward said, with his eyes raining down tears, as he lifted himself, with much difficulty, on his elbow.

"Ralph, Ralph, that's not right! What's the matter? Make a friend of me, my good fellow. Be sure you may trust me. Is the lad going wrong?"

"Is it going wrong to be drawing for hundreds on his father, when his father knows nothing about it?"

"Ralph! what can you mean? He doesn't tell you of that."

"No, sir, no; he doesn't tell me of that; he only writes begging me to get him money; but I have good cause to know how matters are going on, sir; and I don't wish to live, doctor, till it all comes out. It'll be better, too, for the colonel, if he doesn't, either."

"But, do the bankers honour Claude's drafts to these amounts, Ralph?"

"They have as yet, sir; for the colonel gave the young gentleman some sort of a liberty, and so many signed cheques, or something, when he started. But I durst be bound, he's no notion of the state of things."

"Then tell him at once—at once," said the physician, with great emphasis.

"Forgive me, sir; I durstn't for my very life."

"Then I will," cried the doctor.

And in a week the colonel knew that his general account at the bank had been largely overdrawn.

And what struck him down at once lower than ever was that the signature, "Hugh Latson," was, in some later drafts, not his own.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

STARTING IN LIFE.

ROUND goes the ball in the middle of the table, at the Conversation-house of Baden-Baden.

Under those brilliant lights, what a company—mixed, silent, and mad, gather in a dense crowd!

Here is a dowager-duchess arranging her Napoleons on the green baize, side by side with the dressed-up lodging-keeper of the town.

Here are London shopmen, out for their month, putting down their five-franc pieces carefully within those magic-lines, or over the number they please to back; and in their very midst is a young lady, with the last novel in her hand, determined to get again the little she resolved to stake, and making the loss more and more every throw.

Mark the faces of the front rank. The struggle to look careless; the ending by looking very fiends in obstinacy, and in hatred to the two thin, gray haired men who rake up the coin, without even a glance towards the losers.

I see there one youth, doesn't look more than fifteen certainly. He began with risking five francs. He has now a pile of Napoleons so tall, that he splits it into five or six piles. He gets much more than "the Table" gets.

But the Table knows him.

By to-morrow night that youth will have lost all he has on the baize, and ten times as much as his mother at the Hotel will give him to play with.

Outside, but pressing in to see what goes on, is a different sort of crowd. This is where we stand. We could watch the "Bank" lose every franc to the players, without being tempted to risk one sou. For we should know that to-morrow night, the "Bank" would appear with fresh funds, and re-win all its losses in a few hours.

"Ah! here he is! He's come at last!"

This is said by some outsiders, as a dashing young fellow enters the room, along with a shorter, but older man, who looks as if he had taken a full complement of the vin, but not the ordinaire, of the duchy.

"Here he is! here he is!" say several voices at once.

The thin, gray old gentlemen do not even look up, but everybody else turns to see the new arrivals.

We said, "dashing young fellow," but we had no idea of picturing anything noble or spirited in the young man's appearance.

He had a finely moulded figure, and tried to give it the easy bearing and the off-hand gait with which it landed abroad, months ago. But it was a failure.

Only a few months of rioting and gambling had done their work. And "dashing," save in the cut and colour of his clothes, and a certain swagger that was all assumed, is not the word for him. We recall it.

Claude's companion was of about as much use in guiding and restraining him, as the tutors of young men of family generally are.

"Now, we'll just let the fools have it all to themselves for once, Claude," said Firnaby, the tutor.

"We'll just mind our own business, if you please, Mr. Parson, for, if I don't turn the luck in my favour, to-night, may I—"

But Claude's sentence was never finished. For, just then, the crowd opened, and there sprang out from the inner room, where the larger stakes are lost and won, right upon Claude (who was nearly knocked over), a middle-aged, tall man, who grasping his iron gray hair on both sides of his head, rushed to the door, crying—

"Perdu! Perdu!" at the very top of his voice.

He had just lost the last hundred of several thousands of pounds, and cried, with many a French, and many an Italian oath, too, that his wife and child were beggars.

"Look at that," said Firnaby.

"I am looking," Claude answered. "And that is just the man I've no ambition whatever of resembling. Already, I'm a little more like him, Firnaby, than you suppose."

And Claude clenched his teeth in a deep "sacre!"

When the rouge et noir had disposed of every farthing of that morning's remittance, the mad youth, far on in the night, dashed open the door of the inner "hell," and, before he left it, he was fifteen or twenty thousand pounds in debt, to some of those gentlemen of the Jewish persuasion, who hang about the establishment for the accommodation of the public.

That night was the ghost, that haunted the heir of the house of Latson many, many days and nights yet to come.

And so the down-train rushed, and rushed along,—how fast, the first-class passenger little dreamed.

And when miles and miles away from where we have just left him, Claude Blance, muddle-brained, flashy, and lost, one day rubbed shoulders with Hugh Church (still called Hugh Church), neat, sober, and a gentleman, in a crowded London street, the Up-train flashed past the Down, and the half-brothers never knew how close they had been, for half-a-second, on the hot Railway of Life.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

REVEALS ANOTHER NEMESIS.

"Hi! stop! you can't go in there!"

"And, pray, why not? I thought the house was 'on view.'"

"No, not that room."

"Then why can't you tell us what is and what ain't?"

This was a little colloquy between poor old Ralph Grange, whose back had been turned for a moment, but who was keeping watch and ward over his master's bedroom in Latson Towers, and a strange gentleman from London.

Old Ralph had sufficiently recovered to get up.

Latson Towers was fast going down.

The master of the house was to have been removed before the week in question, but he had become suddenly worse, and the creditors—some his own, more of them his sons—were worn out, and refused to wait.

The person addressed by the steward was one of that interesting class that you always see in a house that is in trouble, as you see vultures near a dying camel in the desert.

He is a low general dealer from London. He takes the place in the house, with many others, of the ruined man's son, whom he has left somewhere in the metropolis, drowning dull care with the spoils of his last theft upon his father.

"Hi! stop! you can't go in there!"

But he can go everywhere else. To be sure he can.

He can go into that hall, across which, twenty years ago or more, the Lady Ethel was led from the travelling carriage, on the arm of the Honourable Hugh. And he can run his hand over those splendid bronzes, and sit down on those easy chairs, and guess the price of that painted window.

He can go into the bedroom of the late mistress of the house, and there he can turn over the wardrobe, which the loving Mrs. Glyde had carefully stowed away in locked drawers, all now unlocked, and there he can finger even Ethel's wedding dress.

He can go, can that London vulture, into Ethel's private room of all, and rummage among the precious things which Mande omitted to take away, or dared not trouble Latson by asking for.

And he can push his fingers round and about a cabinet of buhl, and, touching a secret spring, he can come upon a long and glossy band of hair, Ethel's half of what they took, just before the countess was laid in her coffin. And the gentleman can take this relic to a brother bird of prey standing there, and crack his jokes upon it, and say he supposes "this is the heir of the house," and throw it down, all scattered and unbound, upon the floor.

He can go into the private room, also, of the colonel himself. Ralph has taken care of some things that were in it, but not of all. For, in another cabinet, which a neat jerk of a stout penknife opens, is a small bundle of letters, each of which is signed "Your faithful Joyce," or "Your devoted Joyce," and those next the top (why had he never destroyed them, as he did the ring?), "Your broken-hearted wife."

"Joyce! Joyce!" said one of the fellows. "His wife's name was Ethel, wasn't it?"

"Aye, aye, his wife's was," said another.

"Well, she says wife, don't she, stupid?"

And then they thrust the tongue into the cheek, or laid their forefingers against their noses, or otherwise insulted the lonely churchyard slab, and the memory of its poor J. C., who slumbered under it.

Or, the vulture could go and loiter against the fireplace, in that same room where Ethel passed that night of horror, when the sound of the billiard-room had died away, and she learned that her lord had forgotten she was there, or left her as if he had.

And the broker sat on the very chair on which Ethel heard from the footman how much her husband loved her.

He could go everywhere else but into that one room—and why should he go there?

His mission and his work are quite understood by the sinking tenant of that sinking house.

Ralph and the physician, with a hired nurse, are all the attendants that remain to the Honourable Hugh.

There he sits, on that bed. He has not laid down for many, many months. There he sits, propped up with pillows.

The doctor is on one side of him. Now and then, old Grange comes and stands respectfully on the other, and asks whether he shall change the posture, lower or raise the pillows.

The colonel's breaths, quick and hard, shake the very bed itself.

Every now and then, he suddenly dashes his hands to the mattress on either side of him, and convulsively springs up by their help, gasping for dear life.

It is a sad sight to look upon; when, every now and then, some one tries the handle of his door, and the patient proves, with a shudder, that he knows what it means; at intervals adding to the shudder a volley of curses, fearful to listen to,—it gives him such pain and distress to bring them out.

"Has the young villain never come near me?" gasped Latson, turning a look towards the doctor, that was too full of rage for the misery of it to excite much pity.

"Claude Blance?" asked the other. "No; but I should think he is certain to be here to-day. I have written again."

And the colonel, subsiding into one of his quieter moments, fixed his look on the other side, away from the doctor, a look of unspeakable anguish, and groaned out as if to himself—

"Wife, son, friends, servants, all gone—gone—all gone!"

"Doctor," he said, again looking towards him.

"Yes, my dear sir."

And the old man had hard work to say it.

"If that young imp doesn't pay you when I'm gone—"

And here Latson fired up again fearfully.

"Promise me to try and make him, will you?"

"Pray, pray, my good friend, don't talk of such matters now. I want nothing, and will have nothing. But you, you,—speak and think, my dear sir, of yourself."

"What about me?" Latson asked, with a half sneer, that showed he guessed the good doctor's meaning.

"Is there not some One else, colonel, to whom you really do owe a debt? To me, you owe nothing."

"He knows," was Latson's answer, "that I can't pay him."

And he turned away again.

"Just so, and therefore, my dear colonel, he has told you, and all of us, about a Surety who will pay off everything, everything, only for our asking and trusting him."

"Yes," murmured the dying man, "yes, perhaps He might, if He knew no more about me than you do, doctor."

The doctor was beginning to reply.

"He knows," the colonel gasped on, "that I've got the blood of some score of deaths on my head. Yes; and He knows, that, but for this cursed drowsy, I should have had a score more by this time to answer for. No, no, doctor, you mean it well; but I'm past all that sort of thing now."

And Latson sank exhausted, and was presently in a slight doze. He had passed many nights without sleep.

He was awakened by old Ralph coming into the room.

But when he was roused, the doctor saw that there was a great change for the worse.

Anxiety, fear, despair, and disease, all together, made that countenance a sight that even Justice must have declared herself contented to see, until, indeed, the last account, and the worst, should be required.

Presently, Latson caught sight of a letter in Ralph's hand, which the man had either forgotten to mention, in the new extremity he saw upon his master's features, or else had purposely withheld.

"What's—that's that?" he asked, with a terrible effort, looking towards the letter.

Ralph, who was bitterly weeping, explained, that he didn't think the colonel, whatever it might be, was equal to the task of attending to it.

But his master insisted, and the doctor took the letter, thinking it was probably from the absent Claude.

The colonel signed to him to open it, and read it to him at once.

"It's from Folkstone, sir, Folkstone—I don't know the hand—it's short, and signed—"

But Latson impatiently motioned to have it read immediately.

The doctor read, in a low, but distinct voice, as follows:—

"My dear Latson,—"

"You will long since have forgotten me, but I cannot allow that to prevent my discharging a duty which I am ashamed of having neglected so long."

"On a certain Wednesday morning, many years ago, in a London church, I appeared to you to be taking part, with you, in ruining the happiness of a poor, innocent girl."

"Indeed, to a certain extent, I did take that part; for, as I have since heard, you deserted that girl, as the victim of a mock marriage."

"Latson, it was no mock marriage!"

The colonel made a violent effort to get up in bed, and was fearful to look upon.

"I was in holy orders when I read the service, though studying medicine; and I concealed my ordination, partly for the love of the romance of the thing, but partly because I knew how you would laugh at, and despise, me, for living the life I lived in your company, when such vows were upon me."

"I hope I now know better; and though I cannot, from all I have heard, repair the mischief I assisted you in doing, I dare not hide from you, any longer, that you have a son—at least one—whom it is your duty to protect, or—at all events—inquire after."

"Latson, may God forgive both of us!"

"I have left, with the boy's guardians, ample proof of the fact now communicated; but I deemed it, on consideration, best that you should hear the circumstances straight from myself."

"Again, I say—may God forgive us both!"

"I remain, my dear Latson,

"Your old, unworthy companion,

"MARMADUKE BLISS."

"Then—then," whispered the colonel, in terrible excitement, "I married—Ethel—while—Joyce—was still—"

"No,—no,—thank God!—no,—the old man,—Ah!—she was dead,—poor Joyce!—yes!—dead, just in time. Ugh!—ugh!" and a sharp spasm, followed by a fearful gasp for breath, stopped him.

The doctor and Ralph were left to guess what all this meant.

But they could not stand in that room without feeling, that, whatever had been the crime, the temporal punishment, while just, was terribly complete.

Could Dan himself have seen it he would have thought so too. And even Ruth would have been satisfied.

"Can I do anything for you, my dear colonel, in consequence of this letter?" asked the doctor.

"Do!—do!—what can you do?"

And he literally gnashed his teeth.

"Can—you—bring—bring—her back, you fool, eh? What can you do?"

"The boy," suggested the physician.

And there was just one brief glimpse of a smile, as if the word had given him a moment's prospect of some poor reparation.

But he was forbidden to seize it.

He fell back heavily; and the lips that might have sent a message and a prayer to his first-born, spoke again neither blessing nor cursing.

CHAPTER XXXV.

TUMBLING TOWERS.

Of course the sale was postponed.

Indeed, it would have been, no doubt, had the colonel lived, as soon as they found he was too ill to be removed.

Claude was not at the funeral, and merely wrote a short note to the doctor, making some lame excuse, and giving a wrong address.

Maude and her husband would, no doubt, have done violence to their feelings, and have paid the last external tokens of decent respect for the dead (however little they might have felt), but the ruin of the estate rendered it impossible that they should be seen in the neighbourhood.

So the good old doctor, Ralph, the nurse, and a very thin sprinkling of former tenants, followed to his grave the lord of Latson Towers.

His fall, chiefly the result of high play, first his own, then Claude's, had been rapid but complete.

And when last we were in the part of the country where he flourished, we found the house had undergone a singular change.

We procured an introduction, and went to see it.

Here is a fine stalwart form, marching along the corridor, where Ethel, in the early twilight, sought her room, as you remember, to change her evening for her morning dress. This form is attired in scarlet and in gold, and carries on its head a crown of gilt paper. As we pass him, he stops us, and touches us gently on the shoulder, and says—

"It is usual to bow when you meet the king, but you can pass on, only remember next time who I am."

Here, seated in that room, where Latson studied the visions of the fire-caverns,—here is a young lady, pale and very lovely, who is busy all day long in getting the room ready for her husband, whom she is always expecting, in just seven minutes.

As we enter the apartment she is laying his dressing-gown across the arm of an easy chair; and after curtsying with much grace, and telling us how glad she is to see us, she puts a pair of gentleman's slippers inside the fender just before the fire, remarking, as she looks at the clock on the chimney-piece—

"Yes, now I think we're ready. In seven minutes he will join me in telling you how welcome you are. Poor fellow! he'll be very tired, but so glad to see an old friend."

And with a delicious smile, the poor thing placed a chair for us near her own, opposite the dressing-gown, where we sat as long as we could keep her from seeing that our eyes were filling very fast.

We were glad to get away. She wished us "Good-by, but only for the present. He'll be home, I'm sure," she said, "before you call again;" and she stooped to put up one of the slippers that had fallen down.

Then, in another room, there was an old lady, neatly and even elegantly dressed, who rose as we entered, but immediately sat down again.

We went up to her and made some common observation about the weather and the beauty of the grounds.

"They used to be beautiful," she said; "but no beauty can withstand that walking pestilence. I saw him only half an hour ago. He walks from room to room, with a human head under each arm, a female head, and the locks—one light, the other dark, dabbled in blood—curl down on each side of him; and he holds them up in turns and smiles at them. But I'll be the death of him. Wait and see—Ah! there he is again!"

And in a moment the window was flung up, and the old lady had leaped some few feet down upon the terrace, and, with a speed wonderful for her years, was rushing across the lawn.

"She'll take no harm," said the attendant. "She's the least mad of any of them, after all; for I shouldn't wonder if that horrid colonel really did sometimes appear."

"What colonel?" we asked.

"The man who used to live here. And it is said he was the death of two wives. Perhaps the two heads are theirs."

And we turned cold and hot as we thought how the past and present of Latson Towers thus joined in the mad whims of this poor lady.

Man about town! polite assassin of the drawing-room, and licensed butcher in the shambles of profligate love!—you, too, can make asylums for idiots, and turn happy homes into madhouses. Only your horrid work comes out less boldly, and is seen by fewer witnesses, than the crimes of the Honourable Hugh.

But we have more yet to see.

Let us look a little longer.

(To be continued.)

INFLUENCE OF A SMILE.—A beautiful smile is to the female countenance what the sunbeam is to the landscape. It embellishes an inferior face, and redeems an ugly one. A smile, however, should not become habitual, or insipidity is the result; nor should the mouth break into a smile on one side, the other remaining passive and unmoved, for this imparts an air of deceit and grotesqueness to the face. A disagreeable smile distorts the lines of beauty, and is more repulsive than a frown. There are many kinds of smiles, each having a distinct character—some announce goodness and sweetness—others betray sarcasm, bitterness, and pride—some soften the countenance by their languishing tenderness—others brighten by their spiritual vivacity. Gazing and poring before a mirror cannot aid in acquiring beautiful smiles half so well as the turning the gaze inward, to watch that the heart keeps unsullied from the reflection of evil, and is illuminated and beautified by all sweet thoughts.

Chemical Experiments.

FIRE UNDER WATER.

Few appearances strike a person unacquainted with chemistry as being more extraordinary than fire under water, or fire in any way connected with water, yet few things to chemical comprehension are more simple. To produce a fire of any sort two agents are required at least—a combustible and a supporter of combustion.

Now it so happens that in the atmosphere around about us there exists a certain element in the state of gas called "oxygen." Every hundred part by measure of atmospheric air contains twenty-one of oxygen gas, and seventy-nine of another gas, called nitrogen. Now, of these two gases, oxygen is that which alone supports combustion, and if the atmosphere were wholly composed of oxygen instead of twenty-one per cent. of it, materials which burn in our present atmosphere, would burn much faster than desirable, and things which now do not burn at all, or imperfectly—such as iron, for example—would enter readily into combustion.

In all common cases of combustion, the presence of air is necessary for the sake of the oxygen yielded by it; but the chemist can readily produce combustion without the contact of any air whatever, by merely bringing the combustible, or thing to be burned, into contact with some body which has a supporter of combustion, usually oxygen, locked up within it, and ready to evolve it. For example, gunpowder can burn, as everybody knows, when tightly rammed into a gun barrel, and deprived of all contact with air; nay, gunpowder can burn if placed under the receiver of an air-pump, and the air exhausted; or under water, provided it be rammed into a case, after the manner of a rocket. The explanation of the burning of gunpowder under the above circumstances is, that it combines within itself not only a combustible, but a supporter of combustion. The materials of gunpowder are charcoal, sulphur, and nitre or saltpetre, as is well known. The two former burn if ignited, as almost every person knows. Saltpetre will not burn, it cannot be ignited; but it helps other things to burn by imparting to them, at the very instant of burning, the same element (oxygen) which exists as a gaseous component of the atmosphere, and is, as we have seen, the atmospheric supporter of combustion. Saltpetre may be made to give out its oxygen in the state of gas when heated, and still more readily chlorate of potash may be made to do so by heat and certain other modes of treatment, a fact upon which depends the success of the experiment presently to be described—namely, the production of fire under water.

The materials required for performing the experiment will be a little phosphorus—say half a drachm—cut into small pieces under cold water; an equal weight of chlorate of potash in crystals—the larger the better; a little oil of vitriol—about a pennyworth; a conical wine-glass, some water, and a small glass funnel with long neck, or even a piece of glass tube. Having poured water into the wine-glass—about three-fourths as much as it will hold—drop in first the phosphorus, cut into small pieces as described. Do not touch the phosphorus with the fingers, or anything warm, lest it burst into flame. Transfer it to the wine-glass from the water in which it has been cut by means of a piece of wire or of quill; but on no account touch it with the fingers. Next drop down upon the phosphorus the crystals of chlorate of potash. The object now is to bring oil of vitriol into contact with the materials, mingling it with the water as little as possible. This may be accomplished by means of the funnel, the stem of which being thrust down amidst the phosphorus, and the chlorate and oil of vitriol poured into the funnel itself, the desired contact between the phosphorus, chlorate, and oil of vitriol will be accomplished.

No sooner does this take place than a brilliant combustion ensues, underneath the surface of the water. After a time when the oil of vitriol mingles with the water and becomes diluted, the combusive energy ceases. It may be re-established, however, again and again, as long as any phosphorus remains unconsumed, by dropping a few crystals of chlorate of potash into the wine-glass from time to time, and pouring in more oil of vitriol.

Combustion by contact of water.—By no great stretch of imagination or misuse of terms, the experiment now about to be detailed might be designated combustion of water, or the setting of water on fire.

In prosecuting our last experiment, we employed chlorate of potash as the oxygen-yielding material; but water itself contains oxygen, being a compound of that element and hydrogen; so that if by any means we can discover a substance able to take away the oxygen which water holds, and take it away with sufficient energy, combustion should ensue. Now, the curious metal potassium is an agent of this sort. So violent an attachment has it for oxygen, that it decomposes water and produces flame. Potassium is always kept in a bath of Persian naphtha, a material which contains no oxygen. It exists in globules, and when a globule is taken out of its bath and thrown into water, flame is the immediate result; the potassium totally disappearing, and the water becoming charged with a solution of potash.

Curiously enough, potassium, though it takes fire immediately on coming into contact with water, is difficult to be ignited when surrounded by atmospheric air. The reason of this is that a crust surrounds it exteriorly, and prevents the atmospheric contact which is necessary to combustion.

Combustion on the surface of water—the modern Greek fire, as it has been called.—Vary the potassium experiment now as follows:—Take a basin, three parts fill it with water, and pour upon the surface of the water sufficient Persian naphtha to form a thin pellicle. This done, project a globule of potassium into the basin as before: it not only takes fire, but sets the pellicle of naphtha on fire.

Within the last few years, it has been proposed to turn the above-mentioned little device to account in naval warfare. It has been proposed to stave a few barrels of naphtha amongst adverse shipping, and throw a lump of potassium into the water. The proposition is ingenious, no doubt; but an objection applies to its practicability, of the same character as the objection to the catching of birds by a peculiar application of salt. The real Greek fire was a composition very different from that just described. It appears to have been a mixture of nitre, sulphur, and petroleum.

TO THE WORLD!

SING for the blessed and tender declaring

That shines in the beauty of innocent eyes;

Sing for the glory of winning and wearing

Fate in its loftiest and lowliest guise!

Sing when the daybreaks of bliss over-sky thee!

Sing when their sunsets of splendour depart!

Sing when the angel of death, passing by thee,

Knocks at the door of some cherished one's heart!

Sing for the strength that hath crowned thee victorious

O'er the wild armies of sorrow and pain;

Sing for the woes that have made thy life glorious—

Sing! for none sorrow and suffer in vain!

Sing! when the heart bleeds thy song shall be sweetest,

Mournfullest music is born in the night!

Sing through the storm of each battle thou meetest—

Sing for the beautiful promise of light!

Sing when the sands of the grave overblow thee!

Sing when earth's shadow lies furthest and dim!

Sing when the rivers of death overflow thee—

Noblest of all is the victor's last hymn!

HOW A RIVER OVERFLOWED, AFTER A BATTLE.

It was at Lindenau, near Leipsic, in the winter of 1846—one of the hardest known there for years. I had been skating on the Elster all the afternoon, and felt "warm as a toast," though the frozen breath lay on my whiskers and on my greatcoat collar in a white, powdery rime. Half Leipsic seemed to have turned out, on that Saturday afternoon, to pass its half-holiday in skating; and the men struck out boldly; and the ladies came clinking along gracefully (for many German ladies skate). Their silvery laughter was very pleasant to hear; and all was "merry as a marriage bell."

But three successive journeys between Lindenau and Leipsic had satisfied my skating propensities, for the time being; and I was glad enough to take off my "sledge-shoes," as the Germans expressively call skates. By the bank stood old Fritz, the fisherman, collecting the toll of one Dreyer, a coin in value between a halfpenny and a farthing, exacted by the fisherman from all who skate on the river Elster. The tax is not a heavy one; and in consideration of its payment the fishermen keep the river swept as smooth as a sheet of glass, all the two miles and a half between Leipsic and Lindenau. So old Fritz stood there with his tin box, looking sharply after the interests of his craft, his face shining through the cold like a ruddy winter apple. I was a favourite with old Fritz, who had seen a good deal of life, and imparted his recollections, in a strange, rambling way, by the hour together. I got into conversation with him; and this is what he told me, as nearly as I can recollect his words:—

"Yes, mein Herr, yes," he began, in acknowledgment of an observation I had made on the severity of the season, and the hardness of the times, "we've had our trials, as you say, and it's difficult enough to get through, with half rations, and little to do. But, after all, it's very much better than what I and many other men, not older than myself, have seen here in the old winters. Why, I've seen the river on which we're standing now (and he stamped his felt shoes emphatically on the ice)—I've seen the Elster overflow its banks, and pour over the meadows like an over-filled cistern; it was so blocked up with ice that came floating down the stream from the higher lands—ah! and I've seen it overflow when there wasn't a block of ice to interfere with its course," and old Fritz took his pipe with the porcelain bowl and cherry-stick from between his lips, and laid his hand on my arm impressively; "it was blocked up though, for all that—and with what, do you think? With men and horses, rushing headlong through to the bank over yonder—tearing, scrambling, and crushing each other. There were men hacking at their own comrades to loosen the grasp the poor drowning wretches laid on them. There was work, I can tell you, for us fishermen, for days afterwards, in clearing the river of the bodies of men and horses—and then what a famine there was the next winter, and what misery! There's nothing to compare to it now—nothing."

"I'm talking about the great battle? Yes, surely; and I've reason enough to remember it too."

"Tell you about it. Yes, I will; though I can't explain to you how the battle was fought, for a common soldier is never expected to understand much of the movements of his officers—his duty is to obey orders. And besides, I was out of the army already, at the time the battle of Leipsic was fought, my period of service being over in the year of the Russian campaign."

"You see, when it was first rumoured that Napoleon and his army were marching upon Leipsic, there were divided opinions about the leader and his men. Some people remembered the old soldiers who had won Jena and Austerlitz—fine manly fellows, rather rough and ready, but civil enough if you knew how to treat them,—and these were almost glad at the prospect of seeing the French army again. But others, and by far the greater number, asserted that the new army Napoleon had raised since the Russian disasters consisted of little more than a set of robbers, who would plunder friend and foe alike—and the majority were in the right, as we soon found to our cost."

"I don't know how it was. I suppose the best men among the French had all been killed in the long years of fighting; but no man ever saw such a set of thorough-paced scoundrels as came marching into Leipsic on the first days of October, 1813. The fellows seemed to know that their master was under a cloud, and that he couldn't do without them, so they maintained a show of discipline while on duty, but in their quarters they did just as they chose, and their officers knew better than to interfere with them."

"Thieves? Why no, you couldn't say that they thieved exactly, for they carried away everything openly, in broad daylight; and what they couldn't use they would break up rather than leave it behind them in such a state as to be of any good. I've seen a great fellow of a pioneer, when the drum beat to muster the men, stay behind a minute to smash a child's cradle to pieces with his axe; and another I saw set fire to a heap of logs stacked up as fuel against the coming winter. The first intimation we had of the rascals' coming, was by seeing a number of poor peasants come flocking into Leipsic from all the villages round about, driving their sheep and cattle before them. They knew well enough, poor souls, that if the Frenchmen got to see the beasts, not a horn or a hoof would remain. Of course there wasn't forage or stabling for all the beasts within the town, so they had to be slaughtered, and you could buy pounds upon pounds' weight of first-rate beef or mutton for a very few groschen."

"The French soon began to arrive; and they were quartered upon the citizens of Leipsic, who had a heavy time with them, I can assure you. Nothing was good enough. If brown bread was set before them, they clamoured for white; if their hosts regaled them with strong beer, they yelled for wine; and at the least contradiction, out would come their bayonets and swords,—and they knew how to use them too, I can tell you! So at last the Leipsic people really wished the battle to begin, if it was only to get the scamps out of their houses."

"Did I see Napoleon himself? Yes, surely. One evening about five o'clock, I was walking along the Rossplatz (a large open square), when a britska dashed past me at a rattling speed, and drew up in front of the Hotel de Prusse. On the box beside the driver sat Roustan, the Mameluke, a favourite servant of the emperor's; but I am told he deserted his master at last. In the carriage rode a tall, soldierly man, with gray hair and a melancholy face."

OVERFLOW OF THE ELSTER AFTER THE BATTLE OF LEIPSIK.

It was Poniatowsky, the Pole. Beside him sat Napoleon.

"Well, I'll describe him as clearly as I can. I saw him once afterwards, and each time got a good long look at him. He was a short man, stout in figure, but not unwieldy. His face was of a pale yellowish colour, and had a jaded, careworn look. He sat leaning back in his carriage, with his head sunk a little forward on his breast, as if the weight he had on his mind had been bearing him down. As the carriage stopped he started up abruptly, and signed hurriedly to have the door opened for him. Then he got out and walked hastily into the hotel. All his movements were abrupt, and there was a restless, unquiet look in his splendid blue eye.

"Was he like his portraits? Well, yes; and yet not. The features I have seen given accurately enough, but seldom the expression. He was a handsome man, certainly; and if you had once seen his face you could never forget it. I can't tell you what it was, but it was something. There was his brother-in-law, Murat, a handsomer man, but one whose face you forgot in a minute; for he looked just what he was—a swaggering hussar officer

"The King of Saxony was on Napoleon's side; so were the rest of the royal family; and the Saxon army, between twenty and thirty thousand in number, were to fight for Napoleon. But the people were too much embittered by the behaviour of the French soldiery; and the Saxon troops, who had wives, and sisters, and mothers in Leipsic, planned and carried out a deep scheme of revenge. On the second day of the battle, at a critical time, they quitted their position and marched over to the allies, on whose side they fought afterwards. I never half liked their deserting their leader: a soldier should stick to his colours; but then, you see, they had wives and sisters in Leipsic, and it served the French right.

"The battle was a terrible one. Napoleon never fought better; and at one time, on the first day, it was thought the allied army would have to retreat. The news of victory had actually been sent off to Paris, and from one of the windows of the Pleissenburg, where the royal family had shut themselves up, a white handkerchief was waved. It was never found out for certain who waved that handkerchief; but it was long before the people forgave the royal family for showing their joy that the Germans were beaten,

"But the news had been sent off too soon; and at the end of the first day neither side had much to boast of. The second day they didn't do much; but on the third the fortune of war turned against Napoleon. They say his ammunition failed: at any rate, the Emperor gave up all hope, and only thought of securing the retreat of his men in the morning.

"Now, it would be necessary for a great number of the troops to cross the Elster, over which there was a great, broad wooden bridge. Napoleon left the divisions of Macdonald and Poniatowsky to cover the retreat, and gave orders that the bridge should be blown up when the troops had passed, to stop the pursuit of the allies. But there was a mistake somewhere; for suddenly a tremendous crash was heard, and the old Elster bridge flew into the air in splinters. The two divisions were still in Leipsic, with the whole of the allied army at their heels.

"The yell of rage and horror those Frenchmen gave, when they saw their retreat cut off, might have been heard for miles. I am pretty well case-hardened, but I didn't get it out of my ears for weeks after. There was nothing for it but to take to the water—sink or swim—and in they all went, with the cannon of the allies playing upon them. It was a horrible ending, even for a battle in which four hundred thousand men had been engaged.

"We were employed for days afterwards in clearing the river. Among the dead were several of the Saxon troops, who had been taken prisoners, and whom the rascally Frenchmen had hurried away with them. One poor little drummer boy was taken out of the river two days afterwards, in the very sight of his mother, who had been searching for him night and day. It was a cruel thing to make the poor little chap serve; but those were hard times, and people did almost anything for a bit of bread.

"I and my mates had been at work all day, drawing bodies from the water. We were going to give up, though there was plenty yet to do, when I spied a corpse in a general's uniform floating slowly down the stream. I took the boat-hook, and got it into my flat-bottomed punt. I thought I had seen the melancholy face and the white hair before. A second glance showed me I was right.

"It was Prince Poniatowsky the Pole, whom I had seen in the britska with Napoleon. When I thought of the poor little drummer boy, and of the thousands of other victims of the battle, I felt that I wouldn't have minded fishing the other occupant of that carriage out of the water, instead of Poniatowsky."

THE FAULTY HEART AND THE STAMMERING TONGUE.

"O, now, Maggie, why will you be always thinking of that stammering Dickie O'Neil? What matter is it whether he is to be the frolic or not? There'll be enough more there, rest ye assured."

"I know—I know, Bridgy. I only asked be—"

"Yes, yes, ye only asked because ye wanted to know. And ye're only blushing, now, as ye're always sure to blush when that stuttering body is mentioned. You are a silly girl, Mag, that's what you are, to be so cold to Pete Hannigan, who's a most d'ying for ye this blessed minit; and whose nice farm is full of good things he'd be glad to offer your own self, if ye'd only give him the least bit of encouragement. Well, well, everybody has their own taste, to be sure." And with a dignified toss of the head, Maggie's friend drew her bonnet-strings together, preparatory to bringing her call to a close.

"Oh, Bridget!" said the pleading voice of the accused, "don't blame me so. You do not know how bad a heart Pete Hannigan has got. If you'd only heard him speak to his poor, old, blind mother, as I did once, ye'd never be the one to say such words to me. I know Dickie has a faltering tongue; but—but, Bridgy, he's got a good heart of his own, that's fuller of good than anybody's farm." And, half frightened at what she had said, the blushing girl bent lower over her ironing, to hide the tears her full soul pressed to her eyes.

Bridget's Irish heart melted instantly. With genuine repentance, she threw her arms around Maggie's neck and begged forgiveness.

"Oh, never you mind, darlin', what I said. I'm for ever saying the wrong thing. There's enough that would be proud of your love, dear; but your own clear heart will guide ye right. And I might have remembered that, too, before I went to blaming you with my foolish tongue."

Maggie, no doubt, remembered that "to err is human, to forgive divine," when she gave her hand in token of reconciliation. She wiped away her tears, and carefully folding the shirt she had finished ironing, laid it away, while a heavy sigh escaped her, as if from weariness; though the absent look betrayed another cause.

"We'll go early, won't we?" said Bridget, as she lifted the door latch.

"Yes," replied Maggie, pensively.

"And you will wear your blue cambric dress?"

"Yes."

"And I'll wear mine. Good-bye, Maggie, dear."

"Good bye."

A kiss, and the friends parted until evening.

"Bright shone the lights" o'er Ireland's sons and daughters. And if the rustling of silks was not there, that broad, old kitchen resounded to happier sounds. There were blushing maidens there, and hopeful swains; and music and dancing, and coquetting. And, if all was not done in the most refined style, there was as much good motive and purity as the most conscientious and delicate could have desired.

Away in one corner were Bridget and Maggie; and in close proximity were the Dickie O'Neil and Pete Hannigan, about whom they had contended in the morning.

The friends had worn their blue cambric dresses, according to agreement; and if they were not cut precisely after "the last Paris fashion," they, nevertheless, did credit to the industrious hands that made them. And the deep falls of cotton lace were just as delicious, in the eyes of their numerous admirers, as the richest blonde would have been.

There was one among the crowd that night whose entrance had hushed, for a little time, the voice of mirth, and given rise to many a feeling of pity in the warm hearts that beat there. It was a blind sister of Dickie O'Neil's!

"She wanted to come," he was saying to Maggie, "and I told mother if she would let her, I'd see that no harm came upon her."

"I ought to brought my old, blind mother," said Hannigan, drawing down his chin, with a chuckling laugh.

"And many's the thing you could ha' done worse," tartly added Bridget, his late defender.

The young farmer, failing to excite ridicule against his hated rival, cast an angry glance at Bridget, and turning to O'Neil, continued—

"'Tis a hard time you must have of it to feed so many mouths, and only your two hands to work with. You must find you a wife who will bring you some land to live upon."

"I would not have a wi-wife for the land she would bring me," blushing replied O'Neil. "I love to work for the dear ones at home, and we always have e-enough and to spare."

"'Tis sildom a frolic ye can attind, though, for want of money," bitterly replied Hannigan, reddening with vexation.

"Oh! fie upon you, Pete Hannigan," again chimed in Bridget, "to be spaking sich words to the like of Dickie O'Neil. He's got a big, warm heart of his own, that's worth a thousand times more'n your few acres of cold land. And I know," she added slowly, "of some one else who thinks—"

But an imploring glance from Maggie caused her to stop.

An angry light was burning in Hannigan's eye; but he dared not say what he wanted, because of Maggie's presence, whose face was red with confusion—the shade of satisfaction upon it being perceptible only to the saucy Bridget.

A sudden relief for all came at this moment: a soft, pleasant voice was calling "Dickie!"

"Yes, Mary," answered the brother; and the young man was at his sister's side in a moment.

"I left you a long time," was the brother's kind remark. "I did not consider how quickly the time passed."

"Oh, no! it was not long. I have not been lonely. I have been talking with the girls, and but just stopped to listen for your voice; I did not hear it, so I spoke. But what is the matter, Dickie? how hot your hand is!"

"Oh! nothing: it's yours is co-cold, that's all. I'll lead you to the fire."

The sister strained her sightless orbs, as if to look in her brother's face. But it was in vain, and she contented herself to be led by him where he chose.

It was a pleasing sight, for those who had hearts to appreciate it, to see that young man leading about his blind sister, and trying to amuse her, carefully guiding her steps, and stopping where he thought she would be pleased. He did not leave her many times to join in the merriment. Only once more, for the sake of leading Maggie into the whirling dance, he left her, seating her where the sound of the music would fall the most pleasantly upon her sensitive ear. When he went back to her, Bridget again heard Hannigan trying to ridicule him, which so roused her indignation that she longed for an opportunity to tell him how detestable he was. To appease her wrath she managed to give him a disagreeable shove whenever they passed and re-passed each other, during the mysterious changes of the dance. And he, vexed with her impudence, at length made it convenient to catch one of the brass buttons of his coat into one of the flowing ruffles of her dress, and did not stop his forward movement until the dainty trimming was shorn of all its beauty.

Bridget's wailing was long and hearty, at this disfigurement of her favourite blue. The dance was stopped, and hosts of sympathising friends crowded around her.

"Never you mind, darling," said one.

"It can surely be mended, as good as new," comfortingly added another.

"Accidents will happen," gravely remarked a third.

"I'll help you to fix it to-morrow," whispered Maggie, who had an indistinct idea that it was not all an accident.

And so Bridget was comforted, at length, and the dance went on; though not until she had called

Hannigan a miserable, old piece of awkwardness, and declared that he "wasn't fit to dance with the decent girls."

"That's more'n you can prove, Miss Bridget," was his retort. And so the matter was settled for that night; each, however, vowing future vengeance upon the other.

"Like all things lovely," the frolic had its ending. Groups formed, here and there, around the heaps of bonnets and cloaks, that had been laid up carefully in divers places, to be out of the way. The young men cast eager glances around, each intent to secure his favourite for the homeward walk.

Hannigan's head rose high above those around him, as he threaded his way industriously towards the spot where Maggie's voice was heard.

But Maggie was manœuvring with all a woman's adroitness to keep out of his way. Did he approach in one direction, something was sura to claim her attention in another. And when, by rapid movements, he at length managed to face her, she suddenly remembered something she had forgotten to say to a friend across the room. She was relieved from her exertions, at last, by hearing a pleasant voice over her shoulder, asking—

"May I go ho-home with you, Maggie?"

"Yes, Dickie," was the prompt reply.

Placing his blind sister where no harm would be likely to befall her, O'Neil bade her wait his return; and then triumphantly walked away with the only one that the well-to-do farmer cared to gallant home. Deep and bitter were the curses that followed the fortunate rival; but they did not rob him of Maggie's love, or the sweet pleasure of having her by his side.

How those full hearts unburdened themselves, during that moonlight walk, is not necessary for us to know. But, we are sure that both experienced a full satisfaction ere they parted at Maggie's door.

"O! Maggie, Maggie, I'm so glad of your choice," said Bridget, as they sat busily drawing together the broken meshes of torn lace. "It was a poor fool that I was, to be sure, to want you to have that mean, wicked fellow, who has no good word to say of any one. It would be a sorry life he would lead you, honey, with your kind heart that's always making you do somebody some good." And, stopping for breath, Maggie's friend wiped away the tears that were falling fast upon the shining cambric.

"I knew, Bridget, you would despise him, as I do, when you came to see him more. But, indeed, I'm far from wishing any harm to him, and hope he may yet be taken in the right way."

"He wouldn't see it, dear, if he was, for he is always looking for bad. Only to think, of his making fun of Dickie, because he had his poor, blind sister there, who had as good a right as anybody to have her heart made glad with the sounds of our frolic. No, no, never a good thought could stay with that Pete Hannigan, I dare declare! But come, tell me, Mag, that's a darlin'—is it settled that you and Dickie will be married soon?"

"Yes, Bridget, I may as well tell you, for you'll know all about it before long," replied Maggie, thoughtfully.

"You'll never tell him what I said about him yesterday morning, will you, dear?"

"Never."

"Well, it's nothing, after all, his stammering. It's only once in the while a word; and then he always says just what he wants to, at last, and it's always something good, too—so where's the difference?"

"Indeed, Maggie, I don't believe he'll stammer so much now that he knows you love him. I dare say he's always felt embarrassed like, when he was near you; but now he'll feel more free, and talk easier."

"Yes, he did last night, Bridgy. He bid me 'good-by,' and told me when he would come and see me, just as well as you or I. And, O, Bridgy, he's so good! Now, that's the thing, after all, isn't it?" And again the cambric dress was saved from being soiled only by its polished surface, over which the friends' tears glided, an offering at each other's feet.

"There, it's all as good as ever now," said Bridget, holding up the mended garment triumphantly.

"Yes; it'll never show a bit where it was torn."

"And I can wear it at your wedding, Maggie."

"And I hope there'll be nobody there that'll tear it again."

"Always wishing a good wish, sure it's you that deserves a good husband." And throwing her arms around Maggie's neck, the friends promised everlasting constancy to each other, whatever the future might make of change for them.

If you wish to increase the size and prominence of your eyes, just keep an account of the money you spend foolishly, and add it up at the end of the year.

THE CITY BLACKSMITH.

I LOVE to stand at the blacksmith's door,
Just at the close of day,
When the feather we call the evening star
From night's wing is floating away,
And the blinding glories of the west
Melt into quaking gray.

'Tis a homely and a quiet joy
To lose sight of earthly jars,
By watching the fire-flakes, soft as snow,
Like a shoal of falling stars,
Sprout, like miniature comets, through the gloom,
Twixt the glowing iron bars.

I stand on the threshold—day without,
And murkiness within—
And watch the swarthy figures flit
From the fire to the dusty bin;
And not unpleasant to my ear
Is the hammer and anvil's din.

I love to watch the bright red glow
On the labourer's honest face,
And the thick and well-marked veins, that show
Firm as an iron brace;
And in steadier mood I seek my work,
With a quicker and happier pace.

Small Change.

"WHAT keeps our friend D— away from church?" asked a clergyman of his clerk; "I hope he has not a tendency to socinianism or deism." "No, sir, it is something worse than that," replied the clerk. "Worse! I trust you don't mean atheism?"

"No, sir; worse still. I mean rheumatism."

LORD NORTH, who detested music, was asked to subscribe to the ancient concerts. He refused. "But your lordship's brother, the Bishop of Winchester, subscribes," urged the applicant. "If I were as deaf as he, I would subscribe too," was the reply.

A DRAMATIC author went to see his own play performed, and expressed his surprise to a friend on the thinness of the house. "I suppose," he added, "it's owing to the war." "No," replied his friend, "I think it must be owing to the piece."

WHERE?—A man who had had a severe fall was asked by the surgeon "Have you sprained yourself near the fibula?" "No, sir," answered he; "near the market place."

CATALOGUE RAISONNÉ.—A picture-dealer, selling his pictures by an exhibition in a provincial town lately, had, among other performances, the following subject, according to his catalogue, "A View in Italy," by A. Caracci, with a figure of John the Baptist, baptising in the river Jordan."

NEGATIVE VIRTUES.—A person below the middle stature observed, he could boast of two negative qualifications, viz., that he never wore a great coat, nor ever lay long in bed.

PRIVATEERING.—A gentleman in a tea-party over-hearing one lady say to another, "I have something for your private ear," immediately exclaimed, "I protest against that, for there is a law against private-ering."

ALIAS JONES.—An old offender was lately brought before a learned justice of the peace in Shropshire. The constable, as a preliminary, informed his worship that he had in custody John Simmons, alias Jones, alias Smith. "Very well," said the magistrate, "I will try the two women first: bring in Alice Jones."

LOGIC.—No cat has two tails. A cat has one tail more than no cat. Ergo, a cat has three tails.

MILITARY REWARD.—All the ideas of King William III. were military. Being told that Dean Swift was a very clever fellow, and had done great service to his majesty, the king replied, "Very well, then, I'll give him a troop of light horse."

A GOOD PRICE.—Mrs. Rugg, a widow, having taken Sir Charles Price for her second husband, and being asked by a friend how she liked the change, replied, "Oh, I have got rid of my old Rugg for a good Price."

NATIONAL PARADOXES.—Somebody once remarked that the Englishman is never happy but when he is miserable; the Scotchman is never at home but when he is abroad; and the Irishman is never at peace but when he is fighting.

THE MOVING POWER.—Dr. Busby was asked how he contrived to keep all his preferences and the head-mastership of Westminster school, through so many changes of party and of power. He replied, "The fathers govern the nation, the mothers govern the fathers; but the boys govern the mothers, and I govern the boys."

A REMONSTRANCE TO THE MARRIED.—Clergyman: "Really, my good friend, it is a pity that you, so lately married, too, should quarrel as you do; you ought besides to recollect that you are properly but one." Husband: "One, sir! I wish, when you happen to be passing that way, you would just stop and listen under our window; you would imagine we were twenty!"

A LONG WALK.—There were two very fat noble-men at the court of Louis XV., the Duke of L— and the Duke of N—. They were both one day at the levee when the king began to rally the former on his corpulence. "You take no exercise, I suppose," said the king. "Pardon me, sire," said De L—, "I walk twice every day round my cousin, De N—."

THOUGHT is to the thinker what the sparks are to the glowing iron, as it is whirled rustling from the forge to the anvil. It is a part of the thinker; a scintillation from the soul; and the language is the light of the kindling thought.

PHILOSOPHICAL EPIGRAM.

Says the earth to the moon, "You're a pilfering jade,
What you steal from the sun is beyond-all belief."
Fair Scynthia replies, "Madam Earth, hold your peace;
The receiver is always as bad as the thief."

"I HAVE whitewashed my ceiling," said a bad painter, "and now I am going to paint it." "It is a pity," said a friend, "that you did not paint it first."

PHRENOLOGY.—Blumenbach, speaking of phre-nology, says, "There is a great deal that is new and true in this system: but the new is not true, and the true is not new."

A LADY remarked of a very ignorant man, who was complimented on his good sense, "He ought to have a great stock of good sense, for he never spends any."

You may always get rid of an acquaintance whom you don't like. If he is poor, lend him some money; if he is rich, ask him to lend you some. Both methods are infallible.

"CARO, what do you suppose is the reason that the sun goes towards the south in the winter?"

"Well, I don't know, massa, unless he no stand de 'clemency of de norf, and so am 'bliged to go to de souf, where he 'periences warmer longitude," was the philosophic reply.

"Is molasses good for a cough?" inquired Jones, who had taken a slight cold, and was barking with considerable energy. "I should think so," said Brown; "it is sold for consumption."

It has been said doctors may well have an especial horror of the sea, because they are more liable than others to see sickness.

ON A SURGEON.

"Here lies in repose, after great deeds of blood,
An hospital surgeon thorough,
Who bled, for his own and his country's good,
And St. Thomas's Hospital, Borough."

A FAST young member of the aristocracy, who plumed himself upon being aide-de-camp to one of our famous generals, happening one day to find himself in company with a grave and learned bishop, with singular bad taste and breeding, put the following conundrum:—"Why is a bishop like a donkey?"

The reply was as deficient in point as the question was in tact. The bishop, after allowing his assailant to recover from the discomfiture which the failure of his bad joke had occasioned, quietly said, "Now, sir, I will put a conundrum—can you tell me what is the difference between an aide-de-camp and a donkey?" The aide-de-camp said he could not tell. "Neither can I," said the bishop.

Why does a duck dip its head under water? For divers reasons. Why does it bring it back again? For sun-dry reasons.

Puzzles for the Ingenious.

HISTORICAL ENIGMA.

AN intimate friend of a Roman emperor. This friend disclosed the secrets of the emperor to his wife, who divulged them to other matrons, for which he received so severe a reprimand, that he and his wife destroyed themselves.

The initials of the six following characters supply the successive letters of the name of the person above referred to:—

1. A cruel and ambitious woman, who, when a certain celebrated orator of ancient Rome was beheaded, ordered the head to be brought before her, and treated it with every indignity. She died broken-hearted at the coldness and neglect which she experienced from her husband.

2. A town in Africa, in which a celebrated Roman patriot destroyed himself.

3. One of Napoleon Bonaparte's bravest generals. He was killed in battle.

4. A celebrated French author, and one of the most virulent enemies of the Christian religion.

5. One of the seven Persian noblemen who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. He was ultimately put to death by Darius.

6. Magistrates at Athens to whom those who were publicly condemned were delivered to be executed.

7. A Roman senator, who vigorously resisted the changes made in the national religion by the progress of Christianity.

W.—Your batch of Problems is very acceptable. The positions are very instructive.

ROBERT G.—If in Problem No. 9 Black play his B to Q Kt 8, with the view of capturing the Rook next move, White must play his Kt to Q sq, when the Bishop will mate next move. Like all the compositions of our esteemed correspondent, "Domino," it is a very clever piece of chess strategy.

J. P. COURTENAY.—Your Problem shall be presented to the juveniles. We shall feel obliged if in future you will submit your Problems on diagrams. Forms can be forwarded to you on your favouring us with a stamped envelope.

GEO. VAUGHAN (Maidstone).—The proper reply of Black to your first move in Problem No. 8 is R takes B, which renders the mate impossible. In Problem No. 9 you overlook the move of K to Q 5, after the Kt has captured the Bishop.

Our Editorial Table.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—An engaged young lady should not receive presents from any man, with the proviso that the present is to be concealed from him she is about to marry. In this case we recommend her to return the books to the gentleman who sent them, but without note or letter, and merely with "Miss So-and-so's compliments" written on the paper containing the books. As to the other subject on which "A Constant Subscriber" asks our advice, we would advise him not to retaliate upon ladies for any little freedoms of speech. But even they should not be too severe, neither should they irritate their lovers by boasting of other admirers. Still, "I don't care" is so unguarded a retort, that we recommend an apology.

ALEXANDER H. DOUGLAS.—Promises, though signed and sealed, if obtained under false pretences, are neither morally nor legally binding. But we must confess it is our opinion that a young lady nearly eighteen years of age should have known better than to sign a paper without being aware of what she was signing. However, there could be nothing binding in the odious and absurd agreement she unconsciously signed. No woman has a right to promise to marry a married man, and no man has a right to exact such a promise. Should this disgraceful transaction ever become public, it is the married man and his lawyer who have cause to tremble.

W. E. Y.—If a man dies intestate, his freehold landed property goes to his heir-at-law, and his other property is divided among his next of kin.

BELA.—Desertion gives a woman no right to marry again, and while her husband lives she can only acquire this right by proving infidelity and cruelty.

R. D.—The words are—

"He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God, who loveth us,
He made and loveth all."

They form part of Coleridge's "Rhyme of the Ancient Mariner."

IDA FETTER.—In answer to your question, we must say that it is very indiscreet to parade letters from former admirers, and most especially to read passages from them, in the presence of one from whom you have received similar epistles. Indeed it is not delicate; and as the young man to whom you revealed these extracts had not declared himself matrimonially, the proceeding appears like an effort to make him do so. His seizing his own letter from the box in which these previous effusions were preserved, was a very natural impulse; and had you wished to show real regard for him, you would not have allowed his communications such companionship. His behaviour afterwards was manly and scarcely what you deserved. You evidently wish to renew the acquaintance. Our advice is, make him aware of your wish through some polite inquiry after his health, or in any dignified indirect manner. After your conduct you cannot expect him to meet you half way: you must undertake the whole journey.

A SUBSCRIBER TO THE NEW SERIES OF CASSELL'S FAMILY PAPER.—This subscriber has selected a very vague title, and one by which he will hardly recognise himself. However, we will give him the chance. He wishes to know our opinion as to the treatment a young wife deserves (from her acquaintances), she having become a mother before marriage. The question is a serious one. Frailty and virtue lead to opposite results. A good reputation is earned by resisting, not by yielding to temptation; and the woman who has once yielded has no right to complain though she should never recover her former position in the world's estimation. On this delicate subject we have no right to dictate to public opinion; but speaking for ourselves, we think much ought to depend on the young woman's conduct after (to use rustic language) "she has been made an honest woman of;" in other words, since she has been married. If prudence, modesty, and domestic virtues are her characteristics, and if sufficient time has elapsed to show that these qualities are likely to be permanent, we are convinced her most respectable acquaintances will rally round her. This subject brings to mind the words of our most popular writer, "There is a future left all men who have virtue to repent, and energy to atone."

J. D.—A farmer can ferret rabbits on the farm he rents, unless there is an agreement in his lease which prohibits his doing so.

WINTERBOURNE.—The notice is not legal. Unless you entered into a fresh contract with the new landlord, you are entitled to, and must give, a six months' notice prior to Michaelmas-day in any year.

LAURA LENORA.—"Slighted love is sair to bide." Of this truth we are fully convinced, and therefore we will endeavour to console the victims of unrequited love. We shall give the more time and attention to "Laura Lenora's" case, because we believe it to be a very common one, though few have the good sense of our correspondent, who seeks for counsel and owns her grief. Too many "let concealment, like a worm in the bud, feed on their damask cheek." We do not undertake to give all the reasons why young ladies often misplace their affections; but a few of the causes of this evil may be discussed, and we hope with advantage to sentimental sufferers. In the first place, young girls are too much in the habit of identifying themselves with the heroines of their romances, and of considering a lover as necessary to their happiness as to the interest of the story. Secondly, they misinterpret the attentions of gentlemen who sometimes like to indulge their vanity in inspiring love which they have no intention of fostering or returning. A third cause—and this is the most common one—may be found in young girls' lively, ardent imaginations. They invest a very common-place object with the glowing hues of fancy, and then worship their own creation. When we discern the cause of an evil, we can often discover the cure for it. Has "Laura" foolishly thought that a lover is necessary to happiness? Has she (almost unwittingly) put a wrong construction on unmeaning attentions? or has she, with the creative warmth of woman's heart, made an idol, and then found it clay? At any rate, she has indulged in some illusion that destroys her own happiness, and the sooner she wakes from her painful dream the better. But now for "Laura Lenora's" particular case:—She tells us of her love for a young man, and she adds that she would give the world to win his affections. From the tenor of her letter we find she has little hope of doing so, and that she has tried in vain to love another. She wishes for our advice, and that we should direct her what to do. In the first place, let her seek divine aid, without which all efforts are unavailing. Let her pray for an earnest determination to conquer her hopeless love. In "Laura's" case, too many fondly nurse the arrow that wounds them. They would rather go on suffering than have the cause removed. But we trust our correspondent is not so weak. Let her avoid meeting the object of her misplaced affections, and shun everything that would recall him. If possible, let her have recourse to change of scene. Let her accept any invitation, to go anywhere out of the reach of him she sighs for. Let her court some other powerful impression. Let her visit the huts of the poor, the hungry, and the destitute. Let her gaze on the aged, pinched with cold, and the children vainly crying for bread, and then turn to witness the mother's anguish at having none to give them. "Laura's" heart will expand. New desires, those of assisting others, will dispel many foolish thoughts. Tears will flow from pure sources, and she will be ashamed of the morbid woes of sentimentalism. This feeling of shame will do her good. The idol will be shaken on his throne; but we want to have him banished altogether. Earnest occupations must effect this. The needle, or the crochet, though invaluable in their way, will not suffice for "Laura Lenora." She must do something that requires serious thought. Let her begin the study of some foreign language, of German especially. If she has already some knowledge of it, let her carry on her studies of it further. No one can think of lovers and of German idioms at the same time. Ancient and modern history have also a strengthening effect on the mind, and they are powerful in raising us above the trials of life. Influenced by religion, charity, and mental exertion, we fancy we behold "Laura Lenora" heart-whole, and blooming and happy as ever, and we shall not be surprised if in the course of time she writes to tell us, that she is about to marry a young man whom she loves and who loves her with his whole heart.

BRISTOL.—The cost of the copy of the will must depend upon its length.

CALEDONIA.—Make the best terms you can with the holder of the note, and see it cancelled. You are liable to pay all principal and interest due upon it, unless the holder's claim as against you is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

LAWRENCE.—No mistress is bound to give her servant a character; although, if she does give one, it must be strictly true, or she renders herself liable to an action.

MANCHESTER.—You can invest £150 in the Bank of England, by purchasing stock to that amount, which must be done through a broker, who will make a trifling charge for commission. We cannot recommend a safer investment. The interest you will get for your money will be from 3 to 3½ per cent.

CAMBRIDGE.—Yes, very respectfully; but you have not told us how many you have in family.

M. A. W.—Present the gift personally, and make in it the entry you desire. But if you are apprehensive that the motive for making the present will be misunderstood, do not make it. Better the lady should lack the book than fancy its bestowal symptomatic of feelings you do not entertain.

SIR ALLAN GLENCAIRN.—Surely you cannot be seriously jealous of a boy "between sixteen and seventeen." Remonstrate with the lady upon the indiscretion of allowing the lad such familiarities, and show how others (since even you have done so) may misconstrue her actions. Speak temperately, not authoritatively, and there can be no doubt she will attend to your wishes.

MOUNTAINEER asks. "What is the best and easiest way to get a young lady to be in love with one?" We really cannot decide, there are so many. No man's experience will much help his neighbour in this respect, for scarcely two women are exactly of the same tastes, fancies, and dispositions. What would fascinate one might hopelessly revolt another. But we must say that the man who is in love, and requires another's help to teach him how to win his lady's affections, does not deserve to gain them.

AN UNDECIDED ONE.—A handsomely-illustrated book, an article of jewelry, or some pretty specimen of your own work, such as a music-stand, ottoman, sofa-cushion, would be an appropriate and welcome present. In choosing it, however, due attention should be paid to the bride's position, rank, and needs. Nothing is more offensive than ostentatious gifts, which are always made more for the purpose of flattering the donor's vanity than pleasing the recipient. In nothing more than in making presents should the "fitness of things" be considered.

ROSE.—We are sorry for the painful position in which "Rose" has placed herself by her imprudence. She should have spent her money in household articles after marriage, not before it. She has now lost her place, her money, and her sweetheart. The last of these three is the least to be regretted. As this sweetheart was evidently cruel and faithless, we think "Rose" is well rid of him. But through him she is for the present a great loser. The legal course would be to sue him for breach of promise of marriage. But this would require money, and a knowledge of her faithless suitor's abode. Neither of these "Rose" possesses. We advise her to drive the traitor from her thoughts, and to bend all her energies towards getting another place. As emigration has rendered servants scarce, we hope and trust she will soon find another situation.

DOMINGO.—The lady was perhaps indiscreet to dance under the circumstances, but as you acknowledge that you had not requested her not to do so, we cannot see that you have any cause of complaint. Nor was her relinquishing your arm for that of another gentleman wrong: she had in your presence, and with your tacit approbation, accepted him as a partner, and therefore had no option but to join the set for which she was engaged, when he came up to claim her. Do not make yourself miserable for nothing, or encourage a disposition to jealousy. If the lady does wrong, tell her so kindly but firmly, but don't fret life away with imaginings, or become "ragous" (?) with anger that your betrothed does, or does not do, things which you have never honestly told her you approve or disapprove.

MARCUS.—"Faint heart never won fair lady." We can't understand how any rational being can be so madly in love with a lady to whom he has never spoken, of whose character, temper, habits, and disposition he is, therefore, perfectly ignorant; but if it is so, we think perseverance and courage will in some way open a road to our inflammable correspondent's introduction to the lady's family, when he must make the most of the opportunity.

DONE-DALE.—The lines are quite upon an average with those of young ladies generally, and will doubtless please the gentleman for whom they are written.

YORK. whom we believe to be identical with our late correspondent "Bedford," is referred to the advice given in that case.

AN ADMIRER OF CASSELL'S PAPER.—If an executor uses the money of his legatee he is compellable to give him the profit made from it; and further, he uses the money at his own risk, and a court of equity would make him pay a reasonable rate of interest, as it will be considered that he ought to have invested the money upon proper security. We cannot, however, advise correctly upon the true construction of any will, or other written document, unless we saw it.

TOM.—This correspondent being under age, would only be bound by an agreement made for his own interest. His case is quite different from that of an apprentice.

TRIP.—No: but if he is aged and poor it is their duty to work and keep him.

ARTHUR HENRY.—In cases of legacy, a certificate of birth, unaccompanied by a certificate of baptism, is sufficient to entitle a candidate to receive bank stock property.

LAURA wishes to know how long it is necessary for a young girl of fifteen to practise on the piano, in order to become a proficient in music. In the first place, she has no chance of ever being a good performer unless nature has endowed her with an ear for time and tune. Without this requisite, long-continued practice may give her execution, but cannot render her an agreeable player. If "Laura" has a natural taste for music, we consider that two hours a day devoted to the piano, would be quite sufficient to insure success, supposing always that she practises attentively, and devotes one of the hours to scales and exercises. The other hour she may give to pieces and airs. The music of Mendelssohn is best suited for advanced pupils.

B. W. J.—In willing his land and all he possesses to his wife, "B. W. J." can legally make his wife's father, or his wife's brother, his executor.

OMEGA.—If the lady who wears "Omega's" ring knows whence it comes, her proceeding shows a preference, unless she be an arrant coquette.

ASK AND LEARN.—The material for the delicate silken robes you admire, is produced by the little silk-worm, whose habits can be tolerably well studied by any one who chooses to become the proprietor of half a dozen or so of these useful creatures. They require very little time or attention; the chief trouble consequent upon having them is procuring good and sufficient leaves for their food.

RACHEL should consult a medical man; we cannot (nor would we even if we could) answer so indelicate a question.

LORIA.—Do not give way to fancies. If your lover loves you as truly as he says, and as you have no rational right to doubt, do not torment him and yourself by suspecting his truth. All people are not equally demonstrative, and those who say little are quite as likely to feel much as those who profess a great deal.

WILLIAM BARGE is referred to our reply to "Mountaineer."

CHARLOIS J. B.—Your idea of visiting foreign countries, and working your way through, is not likely to succeed. The opinion we form of you by your own statement is, that you are of an idle turn of mind, having a decided objection to work, and neglecting every opportunity to learn. The mere fact of your once knowing a little Latin, and a few French phrases, will not procure you a situation in France; besides which, you have not the ability (if we take your letter as a specimen) to conduct the correspondence of an office.

A. E. B.—You would be acting unwisely to emigrate to Australia. The few pounds which by industry and prudence you have managed to save would in all probability be sacrificed. If, by removing to a sea-port town, you could find a better market for your labour, and thus improve your position, the step would be a judicious one.

ANXIOUS.—We must refer you to the owner.

THEODORA.—The remuneration would depend entirely on the merit of the contribution.

SPORTSMAN.—The most simple and effectual method of making shoes waterproof is to well rub into the upper leather and round the edges of the sole what is called dubbing, a mixture of oil and tallow, enough of which may be purchased of your bootmaker for twopenny to render a pair of boots thoroughly impervious to wet.

SELF-EDUCATED.—A knowledge of foreign languages is not indispensable for either of the situations you mention, although sometimes advantageous. We recommend your acquainting yourself well with the first rules of arithmetic, otherwise you will be unqualified for any mercantile situation.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.—As we have no doubt that the weekly numbers of our New Series will be carefully preserved for binding, we have had the cases for the First Volume prepared, so that they can be obtained at once and used as a portfolio for containing the numbers until the volume is completed, which it will be in future every six months, instead of twelve months, as heretofore. The price of the Cases, gilt lettered on side and back, will be 1s. 6d. each.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.

Oh, what makes woman lovely? Virtue, faith,
And gentleness in suffering; an endurance
Through scorn or trial. These call beauty forth,
Give it the stamp celestial, and admit it
To sisterhood with angels.—JOHN BRENT.

THE embarkation of the gallant 01st for India was proceeding rapidly at Southampton. Three days more and the transport would have taken in its living freight, spread its white wings, and, like some huge leviathan, commenced ploughing its native element. Lady Bell was delighted with the novelty and bustle of the scene—the succession of boats filled with the men rowing continually from shore; the hearty cheer they gave as they stepped on deck, cheers which came merrily over the waters, and reached her at the window of the hotel, from which she would stand for hours watching them impatiently, till her own turn of bidding adieu to terra firma came.

Meanwhile Sir Charles and his orderly, Corporal Stock, were busily engaged in arranging one of the most commodious of the state cabins for her reception. Every comfort that affection could suggest or modern invention design was sent on board the "Harold."

The colonel was so intently occupied with these attentions, that the affairs of the regiment were left in the hands of Major Plinlimmon. Unhappy man—he had no wife. Years ago old bachelorhood had set its seal upon him; and the lines were as sharp and scratchy as though the impression had been made but yesterday.

It must be confessed that Sir Charles had an able assistant in the person of his orderly, who had never separated from him for any length of time since he entered the regiment. He had been born, as he frequently used to boast, over his master's stables; and when the young squire, for he had not succeeded to the baronetcy then, obtained his first commission, John Stock enlisted in the same regiment, refused every offer to purchase his discharge, and the reason he gave for it was, that Master Charlie shouldn't get rid of him.

The faithful fellow would long since have risen to the rank of sergeant-major but for two obstacles: he could neither read nor write, and what was more, didn't care to learn. He could brush clothes or groom a horse without any of that nonsense; in short, he had but one wish—through life to remain in the service in which he had been born.

When Sir Charles married, the corporal had serious doubts in his own mind whether he ought not to marry too. Unfortunately, the bride's waiting-maid was a French one, and John Stock couldn't abide anything that wasn't English. He made one or two attempts to get over this aversion, and render himself agreeable; but mademoiselle only laughed at him. She had no idea of a husband of fifty, if her young lady had.

That settled the question. He wouldn't have married a duchess if she had spoken slightly of his master. It was Stock's first courtship and his last.

This somewhat eccentric person was a great favourite with Lady Bell, who frequently declared that, after her husband, he was the only loveable man in the regiment; an assertion at which the young officers laughed heartily; but John believed her. He had a very high opinion of her good sense; in fact, it would have been rather ungrateful of him to have doubted it.

Although it was not exactly his duty to attend to such matters, the corporal had seen with his own eye that breakfast was properly laid for Sir Charles and his lady; he had ironed the papers, as he had regularly done for more than thirty years, placed the Times for his master and the Post for his mistress, on whose plate a little three-cornered note was lying, simply addressed to "Mi ladi."

"Why, it's Annette's writing," exclaimed her ladyship, when she perceived it. "Why doesn't the silly thing speak to me if she has anything to say?"

The colonel was too deeply occupied in the leader of the Times to hear this.

"What shall I do?" added his wife, after reading it. "The ungrateful creature!—at such a moment, too! after the promises I made her."

"What is the matter, my love?" inquired her husband, laying down the paper.

Stock would have liked to have asked the same question, but contented himself with waiting to hear the answer.

"Read it, Charlie," said his wife, handing it to him.

The French waiting-maid had taken French leave—her courage had failed her at the sight of the sea; and Monsieur Hypolite, the hair-dresser in the Burlington-arcade, had come down all the way to Southampton to make her an offer—she felt au désespoir to disoblige so good a mistress, &c. &c. &c.

"The jade!" muttered the corporal, involuntarily.

The colonel turned sharply round to reprove him, but the offender did not choose to meet his eye just then—something had attracted his attention in the street.

"What will you do, my love?" said Sir Charles.

"What can I do?—only three more days."

"Perhaps you had better write to your aunts to find you another femme-de-chambre."

"They are in Norfolk," answered her ladyship, pettishly, "and would send me some awkward, stupid creature, to try my patience every minute."

"To my sister, then," added the gentleman.

"That would be worse."

"Some of your friends."

"Friends!" repeated Lady Bell; "did you ever know friends put themselves out of the way when service was really required? Do, Sir Charles, for once in your life suggest something really reasonable. Now, don't smile in that quiet, provoking way," she added; "what would you say if any one came and told you that Stock had run away?"

"He wouldn't believe it, my lady," said the man, answering the question for his master, who tried to look exceedingly grave.

"I wish you were a French waiting-maid, John," observed his mistress.

"Thank you, my lady," replied the old soldier, in a tone so irresistibly comic, that neither husband nor wife could retain their gravity.

After all, the difficulty was a grave one; something must be done. Lady Bell did not wish anything unreasonable—that is to say, very unreasonable for a woman young, rich, beautiful, lately married, who had never been contradicted, and could not dress her back hair. The ship must be detained for a week.

"Impossible!" exclaimed the colonel, despairingly. Her ladyship chose to consider herself a very ill-used person; and as the real culprit was not present to serve as a conductor to her anger, it very naturally vented itself upon the speaker.

What could he mean by such an unkind word—"impossible"—to the first serious request she had ever made to him?

It was in vain the doting husband attempted to explain that it was quite out of his power to detain the vessel a single day; the wife turned poutingly away.

At this juncture John Stock crept quietly out of the room. He was a great tactician in his way—had proved a most invaluable servant to his master in the days of his bachelorhood, and now that he was married, showed himself just as discreet.

Sir Charles felt hurt, and walked to the window.

It was the first cloud of unkindness that had ever passed between them; fortunately, it proved but a momentary one: the sunshine of a naturally happy disposition dispersed it almost as soon as formed.

Gliding gently after him, his wife laid her head upon his shoulder, and looked up into his face with tearful eyes but smiling lips.

"It's all your fault, Charlie," she whispered; "you are too good to me." Aunt Margaret said that you would spoil me."

As a matter of course, the gentleman vowed that was impossible, kissed away her tears, and wondered that she endured the annoyance and inconvenience Annette had caused her so patiently.

Still the important question, what was to be done, remained unanswered. The colonel suggested running up to town himself. This, however, Lady Bell would not listen to; in her anxiety to atone for her past unkindness, she affected indifference, could not understand how she had suffered such a trifle to vex her, declared she could do without a waiting-maid during the voyage, that the stewardess or one of the sergeant's wives should assist her.

This, however, was an arrangement Sir Charles positively refused to listen to; and in doing so he displayed a remarkable knowledge of the sex, considering he had been so many years a bachelor. A husband of her own age, in all probability, would have acceded to it as the readiest way of avoiding further trouble, but the husband of fifty knew better.

Various plans were still under discussion, when a gentle tap at the door was heard.

"Come in," cried the gentleman.

Corporal Stock made his appearance, his looks full of importance.

"I think, colonel," he began, drawing himself up in an attitude of attention, as he invariably did when about to make a speech, "I've found the very thing her ladyship requires."

"A French waiting-maid?"

"No, colonel, an English one."

Sir Charles regarded his wife before venturing to offer an opinion.

"Who is she?" inquired the lady.

"The wife of a tall, fine fellow who wants to enlist."

"Where is she?"

"Below, my lady."

"And what does she look like?"

"Pretty, modest, and very unhappy," answered the old soldier, with a strong emphasis upon each word. "I only wish your ladyship would see her; rely upon it, she is worth a dozen such flighty articles as Mamselle, who never knew her own mind five minutes together."

"I will see her," said Lady Bell, whose curiosity, and, to do her justice, whose better feelings were excited by the description. "It is just possible," she added, turning to her husband, "that she may suit."

The colonel shrugged his shoulders. He had no such hope.

In a few minutes Mark Rayner and Rose made their appearance in the drawing-room.

"A fine fellow," thought the commander of the gallant 01st, eyeing him critically.

"Really modest and prepossessing," mentally observed his wife.

"So, my man, you want to enlist," said the former.

"Provided I am not separated from my wife," was the reply.

"And you seek a place as waiting-maid?" demanded Lady Bell. "Have you ever been in such a situation before?"

"Never," answered Rose.

"Really, your hair is very tastefully dressed. Who taught you?"

"No one, my lady."

"And how comes it that you want to enlist, and your wife to take a situation?" inquired the colonel.

Mark related his story. Not quite as briefly as Rose would have wished, for he dwelt upon her goodness, the sacrifice she had made for him, and his own misconduct, with a manly frankness and regret, which produced a favourable impression upon his hearers. Lady Bell's feelings became positively enlisted in his favour, when he described how they had been plundered by a hypocritical old rascal who had advertised the sale of berths in the paper—their going to Liverpool, disappointment, and return to London. She would have engaged Rose at once, but a look from her husband restrained her.

Although a kind-hearted man, he was also a man of the world.

"In what day's paper," he asked, "did you see this advertisement?"

"In Thursday's, Sir Charles."

"Stock, the Times."

The corporal hastily searched amongst the pile of newspapers on one of the side tables, till he found the one required, and handed it to his master, who soon discovered the advertisement.

"Have you the tickets?"

Mark produced them.

"So far, my man," observed the baronet, "your tale appears consistent enough; and were it merely a question of receiving you into my regiment, I should inquire no further—perhaps not have inquired so much, although a recruit is all the better looked upon when his antecedents are known."

Here Lady Bell began to beat the carpet with a tiny foot, a sign that she was getting slightly impatient.

"But before I can consent to Lady Fourreau's engaging your wife to attend upon her," added the speaker, "I must have some further reference. Do you know any one in London?"

"No one that we can refer to, sir," replied Rose, with great presence of mind. "But if you would write to St. Faith's, to Mr. Thornton, the magistrate; or the rector, Dr. Poundtext, either of them I am sure would confirm every word we have stated."

Sir Charles wrote down the address.

The eyes of the speaker filled with tears; evidently she wanted to add something more, but shame or the fear of offending restrained her.

"Speak freely," said Lady Bell, who had been watching her.

"Ask any question you please, sir," continued the faithful wife; "but don't, pray don't say my husband is going to enlist, or that I am seeking a service. We once had a home, a happy, though humble one, and land of our own, and—"

"I understand," interrupted the colonel, "and will frame my questions so as to spare your feelings."

"Thank you, sir."

"At all events," he continued, turning to Mark, "you may enlist; and I promise you that your wife shall accompany the regiment to India; but whether as Lady Fourreau's attendant, or with the wives of your comrades, must depend upon the answer to my letter."

The applicants thanked him gratefully, and withdrew. One weight, at least, was removed from their hearts; come what might, they would not be separated.

The corporal followed them from the drawing-room; the honest fellow had taken quite an interest in Rose and her husband, and resolved to enlist the latter himself. "It will be a credit," he thought, "to bring such a fine-looking fellow into the regiment."

"I am sure," said Mark, before accepting the shilling, "I may rely upon the word of the colonel."

"I should think you might," replied the old soldier, drily; "he never broke it since I've known him; and that's going on for fifty years."

"Rose?"

"Take it," said his wife, firmly.

The palm of Mark Rayner closed over the coin. He was a soldier.

During the day Lady Fourreau sent for the former to the hotel, and they had a long conversation together on the various mysteries of the toilette; a subject which only a female pen can venture to do more than touch upon. There were many points, no doubt, on which the fashionable wife found the simple Rose lamentably deficient; but then the emergency was great; her tale of sorrow had interested her; and before dismissing her, she promised, provided the answer to Sir Charles's letter proved satisfactory, to engage her at least for the voyage out.

When, at dinner, she informed her husband what she had done, he shook his head, half reprovingly.

"Always acting upon impulse," he said.

"Now, Charlie," replied the lady, "it is you that are unreasonable; remember, you fixed the conditions yourself. Besides, the affair is peculiarly my own. What would you say to me, if I were to interfere with the command of your regiment?"

"My love!"

"I've a great mind to try it."

The colonel began to look a little uneasy.

"And I will, too," added his wife, laughingly.

"There, don't look so horror-struck; I'll do nothing unfeminine or very dreadful, I promise you."

Stock, who was waiting at table, turned aside to conceal a smile. He felt convinced that her ladyship would keep her word.

The next post brought a reply from the Elms. It ran thus:—

"Mr. Thornton presents his compliments to Sir Charles Fourreau, and is most happy in being able to answer his inquiries respecting Mark Rayner and Rose favourably, especially regarding the latter, whom he has known for years. Her conduct, both as a girl and a wife, has ever been most exemplary; in fact, cited as an example to the young women of St. Faith's. Sir Charles Fourreau may rest assured that she is a trustworthy person; her integrity is undoubted.

"Mr. Thornton would have felt happy, had they remained at St. Faith's, to have taken them both into his employ."

"Satisfactory, quite satisfactory," said the baronet, handing the letter to his wife, who felt delighted that the good opinion she had formed of her protégée was confirmed.

Mark and his wife were sent for; the former appeared to great advantage in his undress uniform.

The colonel mentally decided that he had not a finer looking man in his regiment.

The letter was read over to them.

"Mr. Thornton is a good gentleman," said the recruit, "and has spoken more kindly of me, perhaps, than I deserve. But not of Rose," he added, gazing proudly on her; "she merits every word that he has written about her, and more, much more, if he knew all."

"Hush!" whispered his wife.

"What troop are you in?" inquired his commanding officer, pleased at what he considered the manliness of his remarks.

"Captain Unlocks," replied Mark.

Lady Bell made a slight grimace; evidently the captain was no favourite of hers.

"You will proceed on board at once, and—"

"Stay, stay!" interrupted her ladyship. "The colonel means that you will proceed on board tomorrow; he forgets that your wife is to remain at the hotel, and that you must have many things to say to each other. Conduct yourself well," she added, "and you may rely that he will not lose sight of you."

Rose and her husband both looked exceedingly grateful, and Sir Charles, happy to be let off so easily, good-naturedly confirmed the arrangement.

"I kept my promise," said his wife, when they had withdrawn.

"Gracefully, and like yourself," replied her husband, gaily. "But, Bell, I think I must make a compromise with you."

"What is it?" demanded the lady, laughingly.

"No more interference in military matters; discipline must not be tampered with: come, promise me. Of course," he added, "I shall always feel happy to listen to anything you may have to say, privately."

"A compromise!"

"No; a treaty."

"Which I loyally ratify," exclaimed her ladyship.

The commander of the 01st gallantly kissed the white hand extended to him, and the subject dropped between them.

We must once more trouble our readers to return with us to the house of the convict in the Belvedere-road, where Fan, now thoroughly disciplined to answer to the name of Lillian, was rapidly dying. The parish doctor had been called in, and at once pronounced the case beyond the reach of science.

"Let her have anything she asks for," he said; "she cannot last more than three or four days."

Mike listened to the sentence with pleasure. Every word was like the signature of a bank-note to him. In a few days the five hundred pounds would be his, and the great risk avoided; yet, brief as the time the surgeon had fixed, the ruffian felt a nervous impatience to shorten it. Prudence alone restrained him; so, for the first two days contented himself with smoking continually in her presence.

"Every little helps," he thought, each time he heard her cough.

On the third morning, when he entered the bedroom—for he had removed the sufferer from the dark closet where Lillian slept, for appearance' sake—he found Fan apparently much better. Although he had the pipe as usual between his lips, the child never coughed once. Mike didn't half like it—couldn't tell what to make of it. Was it possible she could be getting better?

"I am so glad," exclaimed the little victim; "I have seen father."

"What!" said the ruffian; "has Fiddler Dick been here?"

"I mean my own father, the one that used to take me on his knees a long while ago, kiss me, play with me in the garden, and call me Fanny."

"Your name ain't Fanny, I tell yer," roared the convict.

"Yes, it is."

Mike raised the whip. To his astonishment, the child, instead of shrinking and trembling at the sight of it, looked up in his face and smiled. She was no longer afraid of him.

A suspicion of the truth suddenly crossed his mind: she was dying; and the majesty of death, even in one so young, restrained the arm of her brutal tyrant. To assure himself that such was really the fact, he thrust his hand under the bed-clothes and felt her feet: they were quite cold. She appeared perfectly unconscious that he had touched them.

"And so you saw yer father, did yer?" said the convict.

"And the garden and the flowers," answered Fan.

"And where did you see them?"

The child tried to raise her emaciated arm, and pointed to the foot of the bed, in the direction Mike was standing. A chill crept through his veins, and he moved uneasily to the other side of the room.

The eyes of the poor dying girl still remained fixed in the direction to which she had pointed.

"What are you a-starin' at?" he demanded.

The word "father" fell, gently murmured, on his ear. The ruffian quitted the room: he could endure it no longer. A nameless terror fell on him. Perhaps the bright spirits hovering round that innocent death-bed inspired the fear, that he might not profane it by his presence.

Not only did he leave the room but the house, carefully locking the door after him.

"It will be all over by the time I come back," he muttered, "and then I shall be a made man. Five hundred pounds!"

Feeling rather shaky on the occasion, he directed his steps to one of his usual haunts to strengthen his "nerves," as he called them, by the usual stimulant—gin.

No sooner was the dying child left alone than her eyelids began to droop, gently, as if the fingers of some pitying angel pressed them down, no mother's hand being near to close them, and sweet sleep fell on her—sleep accompanied by happy dreams, judging from the smile which rested on her pale, thin lips, and remained there long after the spirit of the little sufferer had passed from earth—

A smile as pure as e'er was given

By a soul redeem'd, just winged for heaven.

So imperceptibly did the change take place, that it would have been impossible for the most experienced eye to have marked the exact moment, which was unaccompanied either by a struggle or a sigh. The life of Fanny exhaled silently away, like the perfume of some delicate half-closed flower untimely plucked, or unkind frosts had nipped.

The weather, which had been dull and gloomy all the morning, now began to break, and a struggling sunbeam, such as will occasionally force its way through the foggy atmosphere of London, penetrated into the chamber of death, and rested like a benediction on the pale features of the untimely dead.

When Mike returned home, which he took care to do before the usual hour of the parish doctor's visit, he just ventured to take one peep into the room, and, satisfied that all was over, returned to the kitchen to await his arrival. Strange to say, he did not feel quite so happy as he expected he should; the sight of the wasted, colourless features of the little victim had produced a disagreeable impression: conscience had imprinted them upon his memory, and he half regretted having left the skylight open, and accelerated her death by removing the coverlet from the bed.

It was quite a relief to him when the medical man and his assistant entered.

"How is the child?" inquired the former.

"Why, I think she be better, doctor," replied the hypocrite; "poor little thing! I took her up some tea this morning, but she didn't drink it—she seemed more inclined to go to sleep."

"And her cough?"

"Oh, that be quite gone. I ain't heard her the last hour. Won't you step up and look at her?"

Judging what had taken place, the gentleman complied with his request, and, accompanied by his assistant, followed the speaker up the narrow staircase.

"Lilly, do speak to me," exclaimed Mike, pretending to be very much alarmed. "She be mortal bad, I fear."

"She will never know what pain is again," observed the parish doctor, placing his fingers on her pulse. "She is dead, and must have been so these two hours. I told you from the first," he added, "it was impossible she could recover."

"Poor thing!" said the convict, trying to look very much concerned; "I ain't 'ad her long, but I feel as if I had lost one of my own."

"What do you mean?" inquired the assistant; "was not the child yours?"

"Not a bit on it," answered the ruffian; "only a nuss child."

"And who are her parents?"

"Can't tell; a lady brought her to me, and promised to pay me so much a week for her keep. I don't even know her name."

"I thought you called her Lilly."

"Yes, that's one of her names," answered Mike.

"I wish I'd never a-taken her; but the money was an object, for I am a poor man. Don't you think, sir," he added, addressing himself to the surgeon, "you had better open her?"

The gentleman regarded him very earnestly, wondering what could be the motive for such an unusual request—persons of the speaker's class generally entertaining a weak and childish horror of such a thing, which they look upon as an outrage offered to the dead.

"Do you wish it?" he demanded.

"Well, I'd rather like it."

"And why?"

"That there may be no mistake about what she died on," said the old rascal, knowingly. "The world ain't a bit too charitable about judging of its neighbours."

"After what you have stated," replied the parish doctor, "I feel it my duty to make a post mortem examination; not that I entertain the slightest doubt of the result."

Mike did not exactly understand what a post mortem examination meant, but he concluded that his desire would be complied with.

It was duly and carefully made, and the result proved as the medical man expected—consumption: the diagnostics of the disease were unmistakable. A certificate to that effect was given, and Mike now felt himself perfectly secure. He could defy his brother and Lady Boothroyd.

CHAPTER XXII.

A woman's tongue is sharper than a sword;
Nature has armed her with it, as she arms
The blind worm with its sting.—OLD PEAT.

It is not to be supposed that the professional exertions of Fiddler Dick, and his partner Mr. Dexter, had altogether escaped the notice of the police. On the contrary, they had long kept an eye upon them both, but so cleverly were their operations carried on, that hitherto detection had been impossible. Both the men knew they were watched, and chuckled at the idea of outwitting the officers, but there was one point neither of them had calculated upon.

Bet knew of their exertions too.

Cruel natures are invariably revengeful. As long as her husband permitted her to use the children as she pleased, she found an outlet for her savage humour. But when he interfered between her and Lillian, against whom she had conceived a most violent hatred, it recoiled upon himself.

Strange that the one solitary good action of his life should have been the cause of his punishment for so many bad ones.

The woman meditated well the game she had to play, before taking a single step towards the accomplishment of her design, well-knowing the result to herself in case of failure. At times her courage faltered, and she half resolved to abandon her design. Then some taunting, bitter gibe, or a blow perhaps, would rekindle her resentment, till it burnt stronger than ever.

Meanwhile, the innocent object of her hatred did everything in her power to conciliate her. No matter how harshly Bet spoke to her, she answered humbly, if not cheerfully. The fearful scowl, or still more fearful curse, were the only replies the female fury condescended to make her. And fortunate it was that blows were not added. But Dick's menaces had hitherto protected her from them, even in his absence. She recollected the expression of his face, the peculiar drawing down of the corners of his mouth, when he uttered them, and knew that it would not be safe to disobey him. Had a doubt remained upon her mind, Bet would long since have gratified her malice by tormenting and ill using her victim.

The occasion on which the woman fully made up her mind was a very trivial one, and shows how an evil word may rankle in a still more evil heart.

Fiddler Dick had just been giving Lilly her lesson, and satisfied with the evident desire of the child to please him, called his wife to look at her.

"I've seen enough on her," growled Bet.

Had she noticed the twitching of his lips, in all probability her words would have ended there, but she instantly added—

"You seems uncommon fond on her; it's my belief your'e half in love with the conceited brat."

"No mistake on that pint, old gal," replied the fellow, carelessly; "and when she is old enough I shall be all the other half."

This retort, which was meaningless—for the speaker's admiration of Lilly arose merely from her supposed resemblance to himself—added to the gin she had previously been drinking, roused the fury of the woman beyond the power of self-control, and vowing, in her own expressive language, that she would limb her, she rushed towards the terrified child.

"Are you mad?" exclaimed her husband, stepping between them.

"Let me get at her!" exclaimed the half-drunken fury, struggling to pass him.

"Stash it, I say!—yer won't, won't you? Take it, then."

A blow followed, and Bet fell senseless upon the floor of the kitchen.

Accustomed as he had been to beat and tyrannise over her, little did he imagine how cunningly and patiently that blow, and the idle words which preceded it, would be avenged.

From that day Bet took little or no notice of Lillian, and drank but sparingly of her favourite beverage. Her husband considered that she had profited by the lesson, and paid no attention to her sulky looks—he could cure them, he thought, at any time.

It was in vain that Dexter, who had been present at the quarrel, warned him there was danger in the sudden change. His partner only laughed at him for his apprehensions. He knew how to deal with women. Bet might grumble and take the sulks, but in the end was true as steel.

In his confidence he forgot that steel is the very article traps are made of.

Considering that Fiddler Dick was naturally of a suspicious nature, the confidence he placed in Bet was extraordinary; his best affections, that is to say, his savings were in her keeping; an additional temptation to betray him, for the sum exceeded thirty pounds. With thirty pounds and the business, what might she not command?—independence—that word so dear to every woman's heart; and what, in the present instance, appeared still more delicious, undisputed control over the fate of poor Lilly. The object of her hatred would be entirely at her mercy; and with fiend-like malice she gloated over the thought.

As a matter of prudence, her advances to the police were made with due caution. It was only when her husband was at the public-house she ventured to hold intercourse with the detective, who, in the disguise of a journeyman-baker, for several days had been lingering about the neighbourhood.

"Only contrive to let us take him in the fact," said the officer, "and I can promise you ten pounds; he has long been wanted."

"And how long will he get it for?" demanded Bet; for the question was an important one to her, more so even than the reward.

"Seven years, at the least," replied the tempter, who perfectly read her motives.

"It will be no easy matter," observed the woman, wiping the cold perspiration from her red, blowzy face; "Dick never works the oracle in London."

The policeman knew as much.

"But in the country," he replied.

"There," said Bet, "is your chance. We are a-go'in' in a day or two to Southampton: you be down."

The detective nodded as much as to say he would.

"But don't be too eager, or you'll spile the game: he is the artfullest villain livin'—watchful as a cat—a fox wouldn't stand no chance with him. When you sees me and one of the kids a-standin' close behind him," added the speaker, lowering her voice to a whisper, "then is the time to grab him."

"I understand."

"You'll find the swag in his hand."

It was not because Fiddler Dick was known to be a dexterous pickpocket that the police were so exceedingly anxious to get him into their hands, but on account of an extensive burglary which it was presumed he had taken part in, or at least could furnish a clue to the perpetrators, for whose apprehension a large reward had been offered.

"Do you leave London by train?" inquired the officer.

"No; we work our way down," replied Bet.

"How am I to know when you start?"

The woman reflected for an instant. It was a delicate point, for every step she took in the affair menaced danger to her, Fiddler Dick being just one of those characters most likely to take effectual means of thwarting her scheme of betraying him on the slightest suspicion. He never reasoned.

"You know our house?" she said.

"Yes."

The question was almost a needless one. The man had been prowling round it for the last fortnight, sometimes in one disguise, sometimes in another. One day he dressed as a journeyman baker, with a basket on his shoulders; the next as a butcher, or a countryman. Proteus might have envied him the facility with which he changed his appearance.

"You know the window over the door?" whispered the traitress.

"The one with the bundle of white rags stuffed in the broken pane."

"My night-cap," answered Bet. "Well, then, when you see a blue rag in the place of it, you'll know that we are off."

The detective nodded approvingly. It looked, he thought, as if the speaker this time really meant business.

"Let us understand each other," he said. "You have stood shilly-shallying and disappointed me more than once—not that I wish to risk the affair by too great a hurry; but if you play me false this time, I will take care that Fiddler Dick knows of your intention to sell him."

"Yer don't mean that?"

"It's the very thing I do mean," replied the man; "so now you know exactly what you may expect."

Bet vowed to be true; the threat had seriously alarmed her; for, as the speaker said, she did know exactly what she might expect in the event of his keeping his word.

The officer thrust a sovereign into her hand. The woman took it reluctantly; it was the seal to a bond she no longer retained the power of cancelling.

"You say he'll get seven years?" she muttered.

"Perhaps more."

This somewhat reassured her, and after looking carefully round to see that no one had been observing them, Bet returned home. As she entered the habitation, she saw Lillian and Lizzy practising upon their stilts. A scowl knit her beetle brows, and the thought how soon she would have the innocent object of her hatred in her power filled her malignant breast with joy.

If the wife of Fiddler Dick was good at anything, it was at hating; it did not even cost her an effort,—it was a self-development.

The day dawned at last on which the "Harold" was to sail. All the regiment were on board; the band had been the last to embark, which they did to the sound of their own instruments, playing as if in mockery of the groups of disconsolate women gathered on the beach. "The girl I left behind me." Many of these females were the wives of soldiers who had married without the colonel's permission, a serious offence according to the military law. We have known a husband confined to barracks for months, his punishment commencing the very day after his marriage, for no other cause.

To be sure he had one satisfaction: whilst pacing the barrack yard he might hear the band of an evening playing at the officers's mess, "Britons never shall be slaves," and other patriotic and equally truthful airs.

Sir Charles and Lady Fourreau had already embarked. Rose, Corporal Stock, and one or two of the servants remained at the hotel to follow with a portion of the baggage. In their way through the square they were impeded by a crowd gathered to witness the exhibition of some itinerant mountebanks.

Three children dressed in miserably thin muslin frocks, their necks and arms quite bare, were dancing upon stilts, to the accompaniment of a drum and Pandean pipes played by Mr. Dexter; his partner, his operations screened by his wife, who held Lillian by the hand, was busily exercising his peculiar industry.

The child not being considered yet sufficiently accomplished to appear in public, still wore the clothes of poor Fan; consequently there was nothing to identify either her or the woman as forming part of the troupe.

Bet, who, in order to keep herself perfectly cool on the occasion, had abstained from her usual potations, noticed that, whichever way she moved, two respectable-looking men, one having the appearance of a tradesman, the other dressed as a countryman, followed her.

They were the detective and his companion. She speedily recognised the former.

But what she did not observe was a woman in a cloak and veil who watched her every turn—the female being no other than Rose. She had recognised Lillian in the crowd, yet dared not speak to her.

"Now," said Mr. Dexter, whose gift of the patter was not the least of accomplishments, "favour the public, the discriminating public, who only wait to show their solid appreciation of talent, with the 'Highland Reel,' young ladies."

"The same costumes, ladies and gentlemen," he continued, before striking up, "in which they danced it before her Royal Majesty, and his Royal Highness the Prince, and their Royal Highnesses the princes and princesses, at Windsor—Revels," he added, in an undertone.

The music commenced; and as Mr. Dexter could not conveniently contrive to speak and play the Pandean pipes at the same time, his discourse ceased.

Unnatural as such an exhibition is, the children really went through it gracefully; and the attention of the crowd became riveted upon them quite as fixedly as the attention of the police officers were fixed upon the movements of Fiddler Dick, who felt that the moment for his performance had arrived also. Somehow he felt no great inclination for the task; perhaps his hand was a little out, and he required one or two successful hauls to reassure him; or the morning drop had not produced its usual effects upon his nerves.

"This way," he whispered to Bet.

The woman followed.

"Mind and stand close."

"All right," muttered his wife, whose heart beat violently, not with remorse, but terror; for the crisis was at hand, and failure—a very unpleasant sensation rose in her throat when she thought of the possibility of that.

The first person Fiddler Dick sounded was a respectable-looking stout old gentleman, in all probability a visitor from London; for not even a handkerchief, much less a purse, could the long, bony fingers of Dick discover in his great-coat. The first was in his hat, the latter safely lodged in his waistcoat pocket.

The thief turned from him with disgust; in fact, he looked upon the aforesaid old gentleman as rather a doubtful character. What right had a person so well-dressed to come into a crowd with empty pockets, causing him to lose his valuable time? It was shameful, to say the least of it.

The second attempt was made upon a comfortable-looking woman, a tradesman's wife, who held up a little boy in order that he might see the dancers. Here was an easy victim—her arms were engaged.

Bet nodded to him encouragingly, and shielded the delicate manipulation with her ample person. Whilst her husband was thus engaged, she cast a hurried look around. The detectives and the female in the cloak and veil were close behind her.

Industry is not always doomed to be unsuccessful; this time the pickpocket ascertained there was a purse, and rather a heavy one.

Could a spectator have witnessed the modus operandi in extracting it, he must have been struck by the extreme delicacy of the process. First the fingers glided lightly round it, playfully, as if coquetting with the prize; gradually they closed, and, acting from the wrist as from a lever, began cautiously to raise it—not suddenly, but gently, very gently, in order that the diminution of weight in the pocket might not be perceived.

Fiddler Dick had accomplished all this. The purse was withdrawn, and, holding it in the palm of his hand, downwards, he held it out for Bet to take; but instead of doing so, the woman stepped aside, dragging Lillian with her.

Before the pickpocket could drop the proof of his guilt, or even ejaculate an oath, the two officers pounced upon him, and a pair of iron bracelets—vulgarily called handcuffs—slipped over his wrists and securely fastened.

All this took place so rapidly, that the prisoner was secured before those standing round had the least notion of what had taken place.

Fiddler Dick knew from the professional, business-like way in which he had been taken and handcuffed, that he must have fallen into the hands of the metropolitan police; no country officer could have accomplished it with half the rapidity. He also knew that he had been sold to them, and by whom.

At last there was a cry of "Pickpocket!" and the crowd pressed so closely that Bet, despite her efforts, could not escape from the sight of her husband, who, with every feature livid with passion, stood gazing at her. His rage was too great for words; but his eyes were most eloquent, there was something so truly savage and fiend-like in their expression as they glared upon her.

It was long, very long, before Bet forgot them. Years afterwards, especially when she had been drinking, she would dream of those fearful eyes, and start from her sleep in terror.

On hearing the cry the first impulse of the crowd, or rather that portion of it having anything to lose, was to feel in their pockets.

"I am robbed!" exclaimed the woman with the little boy in her arms. "That's my purse—give it to me."

"Can't do that, ma'am," replied the officer.

"But it's mine."

"I'll take care of it: you will get your money back after the trial."

The mob, however, felt very much inclined to take the law into its own hands and inflict summary justice—especially the sailors, who were for ducking the culprit, the beach was so conveniently near.

Several attempts were made to tear him from the detectives; but they stood firm—declaring who they were, threatening and cautioning those nearest against a breach of the peace.

Although their prisoner, at one time, was in a position of considerable danger, he seemed to take no notice of it, but remained with his eyes still riveted upon the red, blowzy features of Bet, who now, that it was too late, bitterly regretted the part she had acted. Several times she tried to escape from his glance, but it fascinated her, like that of the rattlesnake. Once when the pressure of those around her brought her within reach of her husband, he aimed a desperate kick at her, and laughed, with a peculiar expression, when he saw that it had failed to reach her.

It was in the midst of this pushing, struggling, and confusion, that Lillian somehow got separated from her.

"It ain't for life," muttered Fiddler Dick, drawing down the corners of his mouth.

The woman shuddered.

"I shall come back agin."

What would not Bet have given to have got away.

"The money won't do yer much good," he added; "blood money never does. Good-bye, till we sees each other agin."

"What does the land-shark mean by threatening the woman?" demanded a sailor.

"She is my wife," shouted Fiddler Dick, who overheard the question, "and has sold me to the police, that's all; but if ever I gets free agin, let her look—"

The rest of the menace was lost, for the officers were dragging him away.

The crowd now began to press round Bet, and one fellow made a proposal to duck her. Fortunately it was not seconded, for the detectives were no longer at hand to protect her. She even contrived to excite a certain amount of sympathy by exclaiming that she had lost her child, and entreating the people to restore her to her.

It was in vain that Bet searched through the mob for Lillian. Lillian was nowhere to be found. She had disappeared, vanished—escaped from the effects of the female fury's long-gathering hate—escaped at the very moment, too, when it would have been so easy for her to have indulged in the gratification of it.

As a last resource, she returned to the lodging-house, where her husband's partner, on the first alarm, had retreated, taking the children, drums, and stilt, like a skilful general, bag and baggage, with him.

Mr. Dexter was one of those careless, good-natured men, who float through the world like a feather, incapable either of strong passion or any great exertion. Had he been rich, the probability is that he would have remained honest; but being poor, any effort to become honest was perfectly out of the question. The fellow had received some little education—that is to say, education for one in his position. He could both read and write, and was not without a knowledge of the elementary rules of arithmetic, more especially the rule of subtraction.

When Bet reached the room where Dexter and the children were seated by the fire, she glanced savagely round, and inquired for Lilly.

"Haven't seen her," answered the man. "You seem more anxious about that gal than your husband. Where did Dick get her from?"

"That's my affair," answered the woman.

"I know!" exclaimed Lucy, for which piece of information the woman rewarded her by a violent slap on the side of the head.

"No more of that," said Dexter, who, to his credit be it spoken, never ill-used the children himself.

"What do you mean?" demanded Bet, unable to repress her astonishment.

"I mean that I won't have my pupils and 'prentices interfered with," replied the mountebank.

"Ain't we partners?"

"Your husband and I were partners," said the man; "but the firm's broken up. I take the pupils, you may have the stilt—or stay, as you are fond of a row, you had better keep the drum; it isn't half so hollow as you are."

It was in vain that Bet vowed, remonstrated, threatened, and swore. The children, glad to escape from her tyranny, all declared that they would go with Dexter. She even went so far as to offer him money to continue the concern with her.

"It ain't the money," replied the fellow. "I am for a quiet life; we should never agree. You like to ill-use the kids; now I can't bear to see it. Besides," he added, "where would be the use of our going into partnerships? It couldn't last long—four or seven years at the most."

"Why couldn't it?" demanded the female.

"Dick will be out by that time, and then, of course—but there, why need I talk? you know him better than I do."

"He was a fool!" exclaimed Bet, beginning to feel very uncomfortable.

"I often thought so," replied Dexter, "for he trusted you; I never did, and what is more, I never intend to do so."

"Why yer don't believe I sold him?" muttered the woman.

"I am certain you never gave him," answered the former; "but there, let us stash it: we understand each other, Bet. I ain't a-goin' to be sold."

Deeply galled by his refusal, and still more by the escape of poor Lillian, the woman quitted the lodging-house determined to search Southampton over till she found her, and when she had—but we will not shock our readers by further alluding to the treatment which, in her own mind, she reserved for her victim, who, fortunately, was by this time far beyond her reach.

Whether the child was ever allowed to fall again into her hands or not, the progress of events will show; for the present, at least, she was safe from them.

When our heroine (for Lilly is undoubtedly the heroine of our tale) became separated from her enemy in the crowd, her first thought was to escape. It was the impulse of the imprisoned bird which suddenly finds the door of its cage open; she thought not of the world—it could not well treat her worse than it had done,—or where she should go to: any place was preferable to the dens of vice and misery she had lately passed her days in, the unkindest looks more welcome than the menacing scowl of Bet or the lessons of her husband.

Lilly had not wandered very far before she felt herself suddenly lifted from her feet, and completely enveloped in a cloak: she would have cried out, but the alarm was checked upon her lips by a well-remembered voice which whispered in her ear—

"They are the arms of a friend, Lilly. Not a word! not a word!"

No wonder she recollected: it was the last voice, save that of Jack Manders, that had fallen on her ear in accents of kindness, and she clung to the bosom of Rose in silent thankfulness.

The happy woman hastened to the boat upon the beach, where Corporal Stock and the servants were already seated with the baggage: they had been waiting for her. The instant she set her foot in it the sailors dropped their oars in the rippling waves and rowed towards the "Harold."

"Why, bless me, Mrs. Rayner," exclaimed the corporal, after twice mentally counting the packages, "what can you have rolled up under your cloak so curiously?"

"A child," whispered Rose.

The man looked rather serious, not knowing how Sir Charles might approve of the addition to his party. "Don't betray me," she added, imploringly.

"I won't," replied Stock; "it's no affair of mine: nothing about children in the articles of war."

The woman looked her gratitude.

The speaker not only kept his word, but when Rose mounted the companion ladder, still holding Lilly concealed under her cloak, contrived to prevent her being noticed by the colonel and captain of the vessel who were chatting near the gangway, by walking before with a trunk upon his shoulders, and a package under each arm. The worthy fellow even did more; he suggested the means of concealing the presence of the child till the transport had sailed.

One of the soldiers' wives took charge of her, and passed her as her own.

"You had better make a friend of my lady about it as soon as you can," he observed to the trembling woman, "and let her break the affair to the colonel. If she only smiles while she tells it him," he added, "it will be all right."

The profoundness of this observation proved that although an old bachelor, the speaker was perfectly aware of the influence which a young and lovely wife generally exercises over the heart of her husband.

An hour or two later, the last boat left for shore; the anchor was raised, the white sails unfurled, and the huge ship began slowly to move through the waters. God speed it on its way; for it bore England's sons to a land where the Saxon's tongue and the Saxon's faith must at no very distant day prevail—a land won by the sword, but which the bible alone can keep.

Therefore, we say again, God speed the gallant vessel on her way.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

BUSINESS HABITS.

BUSINESS has been defined as "employment which occupies the labour and attention of men," and although the definition may be amplified, this is its primary meaning, and in this sense it is commonly used. Sometimes, indeed, a distinction is made between those pursuits in which buying and selling form the most important part of the employment, and those avocations which consist chiefly in manufacturing or producing. Distinctions are also made between trades and professions, but both, and indeed every kind of occupation in which men engage for the realisation of profit, may be classed under the head of business. As it is most probable that the young readers of these Hopes and Helps are now, or shortly expect to be, engaged in business of some sort or other, a few hints as to business habits will doubtless be as acceptable as they are appropriate.

ATTENTION.

Whatever trade or profession you undertake, devote all your energies to its accomplishment. Do not for a moment suppose that you can arrive at anything like proficiency without diligent application. No matter whether you pursue one or other of the liberal professions, or one or other of the most ordinary handicrafts, you will succeed in nothing, without all your mental and bodily energies are employed in its acquisition. It should be the earnest effort of every right-minded man or woman to be first-rate in the business they have chosen. To attain to excellence requires unremitting attention and the utmost diligence. Such diligence is seen in tracing the career of any eminently successful man. It is not by a sudden effort that fame or fortune is acquired. The smallest detail of business is of importance to the business man. Insignificant as some of these things may appear to other people, they are not insignificant to him. To acquire a thorough knowledge of your business in all its branches, is essential to your success; and the acquisition of such knowledge demands the closest and most constant attention.

ENTERPRISE.

While too much stress cannot be laid on the importance of little things in business—we must not suppose that attention to these alone, will bring us prosperity. Many a man has sunk into the mere plodder by such a mistake. He has devoted all his attention to detail, thrown all his heart and mind into the minute particulars of his profession or craft. Certainly by this means he has been a useful man to others, but he has never been useful enough to himself. He has failed for want of enterprise. He has been too much afraid of this, that, or the other. He has ventured nothing, and by this line of policy has been left behind by his competitors. While there is nothing so heinous in the business world as daring and groundless speculations, there are few things so crippling to its energies as no speculation at all. We have lately seen the result of over-speculation in the derangement of the money market, and the failure of numerous mercantile firms. At the same time, to denounce all speculation and enterprise would be unjust and dangerous. Without this no noble project would be started, no new manufactures introduced, no railroads constructed, nor steamers built. All these are the results of enterprising speculation.

JUDGMENT.

That which insures success to enterprise and comparative safety to speculation, is JUDGMENT. It does not do to adopt every scheme that is recommended to us: buy up shares in a phantom railway between nothing and nowhere; to invest money in the laudable scheme of extracting sunbeams from cucumbers, or to speculate in any other of the thousand and one schemes which are largely advertised, and promise magnificent dividends. To do this would be foolish and ruinous in the extreme. Yet this sort of thing is really done. The Stags of Capel Court, the South Sea speculators, and many an older scheme, show us how much knavery, and how much more credulity, exists in human nature. But a business man who speculates, does so with a sound judgment. He makes himself acquainted with the facts, and compares them with the figures in the prospectus. He never speculates in that about which he knows nothing, and never takes that for granted on the authority of others which can be thoroughly investigated by himself.

Judgment is wanted in other business matters besides speculation. Blows are only effective when well directed. Mis-directed labour is little better than idleness. There are some attentive, energetic people, always busy—busy as bees—but who never succeed—who make no money. They do right things in the wrong way, or at the wrong time. They are invariably in the way when they are not wanted, and out of it when they are. They are credulous when they should be doubtful, and confident when they should be credulous; they buy in when they should sell out, and sell out when they should buy in; they lay in immense stocks of a certain article, because there is an ephemeral demand for such an article; and they have to dispose of it at a heavy discount. They call themselves unlucky, or unfortunate; but their want of luck really consists in want of judgment. Prudence is the element missing from their character. "When a prudent man," says Chesterfield, "gets into a predicament, he must ask himself more than once what he shall do; sometimes he will have to answer, 'Nothing.' Where reason points out no good way, or at least none less bad than the other, he will stop short and wait for light. A little busy man runs on, at all events,—must be doing, and, like a blind horse, fears no danger because he sees none."

PERSEVERANCE.

The business man must stick to his business. A rolling stone gathers no moss, and a man who often changes his business (if he can help it), or his place of business either, is most likely to remain poor. Said the sagacious Richard—

"I never saw an oft-removed tree,
Nor yet an oft-removed family,
That thrived so well as those that settled be."

There is a great deal of meaning in that other maxim, "Keep the shop, and the shop will keep thee." "Did you ever know anybody," says a graphic writer, "to stick to any kind of business, no matter how unpromising it might be in the beginning, for ten years at most, who did not prosper in it? Not one. If he stuck to it earnestly, and tried hard—no matter how hard he found it at times to keep his head above water—still, if he persevered, he always came out right in the long run;—whatever it might have been at the beginning, at the end of ten years he had made a business for himself."

COURTESY.

Politeness is the road to fortune. No matter what position you are in—master or apprentice, mechanic or shopkeeper, servant or employer, rich or poor—be civil, be courteous; it gives grace to poverty—the only thing that poverty can sometimes retain,—and it adds an attraction to affluence which wealth can never buy. What a marked difference there is in shopkeepers in these simple points. There are some tradespeople who are eminently civil and obliging, who are courteous to every one who enters the shop, and who thus become universal favourites. There are others who are distinguished by their ill-manners; they and their shop people are invariably rude; they give themselves no trouble to be obliging; they serve out their goods as though conferring a favour; they resent any depreciation of the articles as a personal offence, and seem to regard the customer as an intruder. They mistake native rudeness for mercantile dignity; repel a polite request with snobbish incivility. Universal politeness is a primary law in all eminent mercantile houses; it is seen in the conduct of a large number of the industrial classes, and wherever it is seen is a letter of recommendation.

INTEGRITY.

Integrity secures safety, honour, and profit to the business man; but it requires high moral courage to withstand the temptations of worldly policy and selfishness. "To be honest as this world goes, is to be one picked out of ten thousand." Our will must be conformed to the high principles of immutable justice, or personal integrity cannot be maintained. "He that walketh uprightly walketh surely." Solomon has given many a wise precept to business men, and none more encouraging than this. It appears that in his day men were accustomed to the same "tricks of the trades," that, in the present nineteenth century, so called Christian people employ. Sharp and shrewd tradesmen, in those times—with an eye to the main chance—knew how to strike a close bargain. And, perhaps, they were tormented with such swarms of trifling gadders, who, in our polite age, "go shopping" simply to display their finery and to weary shopmen in showing goods which they never intend to buy. There were cheap bargainers then, who depreciated the value of every article they bought, and getting it at last for the lowest coin, chuckled over their own dishonesty. "It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer, but when he has gone his way then he boasteth." We paraphrase the Hebrew expression by such sentences as—"This is of inferior quality—slightly damaged; by the way, your neighbour offered me a better article for less money, but I don't particularly care about it at all." This sort of thing is done in business by business men, who are sometimes boastful of their integrity, and are good, at any time, for twenty shillings in the pound.

There is a story told of a mountebank, who announced that at the next entertainment he would show to every man present what was in his heart. An immense concourse assembled, and the sagacious cynic redeemed his pledge by saying, "You all wish to buy cheap and sell dear"—a sentence universally applauded, as each one found the confirming witness in his own bosom. And this is the rule. The buyer is too often intent on buying at prices unfairly cheap, and the seller on disposing of his goods unjustly dear. He asks one price, and means to take another. He allows for abatements. Should his customer be inexperienced, his marginal profit is correspondingly large. Such a method of doing business is most unfair and equally unsuccessful. A few of the unwary may be pillaged, but the majority of buyers and sellers are old hands, and are aware of one another. The trader who desires to be permanently successful should avoid all such practices. All the cheats of underhanded trickery and sharp dealing, the use of unfair measures, and evasion of legal duties, taking advantage of the inexperienced or incautious, or any other deviation from strict integrity, are sure, when exposed, to invest their practiser with contempt.

STEADINESS OF CHARACTER.

To succeed, a man must be steady. A mechanic or artisan who is invariably making holidays, festivals, and anniversaries quite unknown to the calendar, is sure to be unsuccessful. With such life becomes a scramble: they earn less than others, they lose credit and character; the spender distances the winner in the race, and the winner loses all heart, sinks down lower and lower, subsisting on accidental jobs and precarious meals. The "fast" tradesman follows the same course, and sinks into a similar condition. He leads a gay life, has a country-house, and a dashing vehicle; the money he started with soon vanishes, paper takes the place of bullion, and extravagance finally launches him in a bankruptcy court.

The steady tradesman or artisan takes care that the winner in the race of life shall always distance the spender. He expends nothing but what he can well afford. He lives within his means, never beyond them. He does not ignore the idea that bad days may come, but he prepares to meet them when they do come. You find him in the shop or counting-house all day and at home at night; and you would look for him in vain in a tavern parlour. He does not ape the follies of the unworthy in language, life, or dress. He knows that honest earnings cannot support extravagant habits, and that dishonesty in one form or other must always be at work where such extravagance is indulged.

ALL OCCUPATIONS HONOURABLE.

Every segment of the great circle of civilised society is useful except that which is occupied by the lazy man. Every one may be of some utility in the world's hive except the doing-nothing, eating-everything drone. It is not the relative respectability of different pursuits that we are to trouble ourselves about. Our chief duty consists in being most earnest and upright in the discharge of some specified and appropriate calling.

"Honour and shame from no condition rise;
Act well your part: there all the honour lies."

GOOD HUMOUR

KEEP in good humour. It is not great calamities that embitter existence; it is the petty vexations, the small jealousies, the little disappointments, the minor miseries, that make the heart heavy and the temper sour. Don't let them. Anger is a pure waste of vitality; it is always foolish, and always disgraceful, except in some very rare cases, when it is kindled by seeing wrong done to another; and even that noble rage seldom mends the matter. Keep in good humour.

The company of a good-humoured man is a perpetual feast; he is welcomed everywhere. Eyes glisten at his approach, and difficulties vanish in his presence. Franklin's indomitable good humour did as much for his country in the old Congress as Adams's fire or Jefferson's wisdom. He clothed wisdom with smiles, and softened contentious minds into acquiescence. Keep in good humour.

A good conscience, a sound stomach, a clean skin, are the elements of good humour. Get them, and keep them, and—be sure to keep in good humour.

LOVE AND PASSION.

"I wish he were dead—I do! I hope he may never enter this house again, alive!" and even as the rash words were spoken, the lips that gave them utterance quivered, with a half-suppressed fear that the dreadful wish might be realised, and the little pale, nervous woman, sank down upon a chair, and gave vent to a burst of passionate tears—half of anger and half of penitence.

Adela Raymond was neither so young nor beautiful now, as ten years ago when she stood, a proud, happy bride, beside him who had won her pure, girlish heart, and pronounced those solemn vows, that, through weal or woe, were to bind her to him alone through life; yet, down deep in her heart there remained a green spot, where love still grew as bright and fresh as in her sunniest days, save when the rank weeds of passion strove for a brief season to root out the more gentle and unassuming, but deeply rooted plant.

And if the disappointment, trials, and vexations of life ever render woman pardonable for irritability or ill-humour, surely Adela Raymond could claim the excuse. Scarcely two years of wedded bliss had been enjoyed, ere William Raymond—under the pernicious influences of those with whom his business obliged him to associate—began to tread the downward path, which sooner or later leads to irretrievable ruin.

When first the fatal truth burst upon Adela, the shock seemed too great for her sensitive nature to bear, and her heart appeared utterly crushed beneath its weight of woe. But life's thread is sometimes very tenacious—it will stretch on, through long years of sorrow, ere it snaps asunder.

And so, Adela, when the first shock had passed, nerved her soul to bear with strength and fortitude the impending fate that she feared awaited her, and then in earnest, tearful accents, daily besought her loved husband to shun the wily tempter that was fast winding his insidious coils around the poor, deluded, unresisting victim.

Days and months lengthened into long, weary years, and still Adela continued her pleadings, and not a harsh nor unkind word escaped her lips; she understood enough of human nature to know that what love's persuasive eloquence cannot overcome, severity can never conquer.

But William Raymond heeded not the tears and entreaties of her whom he had pledged himself to love and to cherish; and each succeeding year saw him sink lower and still lower in that pit of degradation, at the bottom of which yawns a drunkard's grave. Business was neglected, accounts forgotten, and work of any kind abandoned for the tavern and the gambling-house, where alternate day and night found him with his even more dissolute and wretched companions. Poverty soon came striding apace over his threshold; then gannet, grim want, until all that remained of former luxury—and almost of comfort—had gone to satisfy the demands of hunger.

Then it was that Adela's long-tried patience gave way, and frequent and violent were the storms of passion that burst from those lips which had never breathed anything but love and tenderness.

Ah! she had forgotten to ask for patience and wisdom to bear the heavy burden of her afflictions. She had ever been a fragile flower—wholly unfitted by nature to bear the chill, rough winds that poverty now swept mercilessly over her; and yet for many long months the toil of her delicate hands had been the only means of support for herself and three helpless little ones, aye, and had oftentimes (through fear) furnished her unfeeling husband with the means of procuring the exciting beverage, the effects of which sank him beneath the brute.

It was after one of these cruel demands upon her slender earnings had been made by the unfeeling husband, that Adela gave vent to the exclamation which opens this little sketch.

Raymond had just left the room where his wife was pursuing her wearisome toil, with half the proceeds of her last week's labour in his own indolent hand, but had not reached the outer door ere those rash, bitter words fell upon his ear. Had he been intoxicated then, he would have turned back and retorted—perhaps with blows; but for once he happened to be perfectly sober, and a sudden and stern purpose instantly entered his mind, which a dogged resolution enabled him to carry into effect.

"Her wish shall be gratified—I never will enter this house again, alive, so help me God!" and with the oath upon his lips, and a curse in his heart for her whom he had driven to the utterance of that terrible wish, William Raymond turned his feet from the home which his own vile passions had made wretched.

Darkness shadowed the earth, Cynthia sat high upon Night's sable throne, and yet the husband returned not; and there, in that scantily-furnished room, by the dusky light of one small lamp, sat Adela, straining her tear-dimmed eyes to finish the garment upon which she had been stitching since early dawn. The non-arrival of her husband did not alarm her, for very often were his nights spent in those gateways to eternal ruin through which thousands annually enter but to plunge into the dead sea beyond.

Often was she obliged to lay down her work, for the tears fell so thick and fast as to blind her entirely; for memory was busy at her heart, and, in the gloom and darkness of that little room, she was living over the last ten years that had been added to her young life.

Away back, through the long vista, she beheld a fair, fragile girl, the only bud upon the parent stem, and on that account all the more tenderly cherished, surrounded by every appliance that parental affection could suggest, until another came and bore her away, to be cherished and worn on his bosom, as she then thought, to the end of life's journey. Again in memory she wept over her father's grave—that kind father who, had he lived, might now shield her from cruel want; again she saw her mother, bearing bravely up for a short season against the cruel stroke that swept away her only means of support; but at length, sinking down beneath consumption's fatal gripe, until her loved form was laid beside that of the husband and father, and she was left to tread her future, dark, dreary path, with none to counsel, encourage, or assist.

Then she thought of all the sorrows, and privations, and sufferings of the last few years, and all caused by him who once professed to love her more than life—him whom she felt she still loved more than all things else, even though in a moment of anger she had uttered the dreadful wish that he were dead; and as that fearful imprecation rose up before her she shuddered, lest it might be fulfilled.

"Oh, if he should die before I ever see him again, I could not survive the pangs of regret that my rash temper had caused me. God forgive me that terrible sin, and I will try henceforth to set a seal of patience upon my lips," and instinctively, ere she was aware, Adela dropped upon her knees, and poured out her soul to Him who alone is near when all other help fails.

A peaceful calm filled her soul as Adela laid her weary head upon her pillow that night, and she resolved to commence a new life; and if she could not be the means of reclaiming her erring husband, she would instruct her children in those paths that eventually lead to eternal life. She arose in the morning, and knelt again, and prayed for strength to support her in every trial that might lay before her that day, and then calmly prepared to enter again upon her unceasing toil.

And divine strength was needed. Towards night a letter was brought her by the post, and with trembling hands she broke the seal and read as follows:—

"Adela,—Yesterday you wished me dead, and if your wish cannot be immediately granted in full, it shall in part at least. I have shipped on board a 'man-of-war,' and will never trouble you with my presence again. WILLIAM."

Adela gave one wild shriek, and fell fainting to the floor. Her little children clung, frightened and crying, to her inanimate form—believing her dead—but the eldest, a bright, noble boy of nine years, with the thoughtfulness of maturer age, brought water and bathed her face and chafed her hands until animation was restored, and she sat once more in her chair with all the depth of her misery pictured upon her pale face.

Not one word or token of love, or even regret at parting from her who had borne and suffered so much for him—with no thought of wife, or children, or home, in his heart, save of those rash words that his cruelty had called from her lips, he had gone—gone, never to return. And she had driven him away. Oh, what would she not now give to recall him once more to her side—how she would work day and night for him and utter no complaint.

After the first shock of her agony had subsided, Adela began to think of her future. How was she to act—what was she to do? She sought help from heaven, and found strength and peace in seeking it.

There were a few brave hearts who had stood nobly by her side when misfortune's adverse winds swept over her devoted head, otherwise she could not, with her feeble health, have kept starvation from her door.

Through the exertions of these friends Adela was supplied with as much sewing as she could do, and liberally paid for her labour; and her little Willie was engaged as errand boy for a tradesman, who paid him a small salary—enough to furnish his clothes for the first year—the next it was doubled, as the tradesman found him faithful and trustworthy; so that Adela, with the expense of her husband removed, now gained a comfortable support for herself and little ones.

Three years passed away and no tidings of the absent husband had been received, when one of the newspapers announced the intelligence that the ship in which William Raymond sailed had been wrecked in a terrible gale, and "all on board had perished!" He was dead then—her rash wish had been granted—he had died without knowing how deeply she had repented, how much she had suffered, and how dear he still was to her loving woman's heart. These were the thoughts that rushed upon Adela's mind as she read the terrible lines. No human power could now alleviate the keenness of her anguish, no earthly consolation pour the healing balm into her torn and bleeding heart.

Until now she had lived in the hope that her husband would one day return, and give her the opportunity of proving her great love; but now all hope died out of her heart, and she would surely have sunk down beneath this accumulation of sorrow, had not the Father sustained her.

Two more sad, dreary years rolled by, and then there came one who had been the playmate of her childhood, and offered her his protection, and the heart that had been hers ever since those juvenile years, though he had judiciously shunned her presence during all her wedded life. But no, she had no love to bestow; it was all, all buried beneath the green sea wave, never, never again to be awakened to a new life.

Had her husband died a natural death, at home, where she would have had the consolation of administering to his dying wants, and smoothing the dark passage with words and offices of love, time might have healed the wound, and she might have eventually bestowed upon her childhood's friend a second love.

But now the attempt to win her would be worse than useless; and so, with the assurance of her friendship, he left her, feeling that never here could he be permitted to enjoy the companionship of her whom he had so long loved.

A few weeks after this event, Adela Raymond sat one evening in her little, neat, and comfortable, but scantily-furnished room, with her children around her. It was Saturday night, and the labour and toil of the week had been laid aside for the higher duties of preparing the mind for the Sabbath.

A little table stood beside her, upon which lay the well-worn family Bible that her mother had bequeathed to her upon her death-bed, with the solemn injunction to peruse its sacred pages often, that from them she might derive consolation in any of the various trials and afflictions that beset life's changeful pathway.

Adela had just finished a chapter, when a loud rap at the door started her to her feet, and on opening it a haggard, emaciated man, clad in coarse, but clean garments, stood before her.

"Adela, have you forgotten your erring but repentant husband?" and the arms of the weary-worn man was stretched towards her.

"William, my husband! God be praised!" and she sank fainting on his bosom.

The story is soon told. William Raymond, with three others, had clung to pieces of the wreck, and after two days' suffering on the raging sea, without food or water, they were floated to a desolate island, and there, for two years, had sustained life with fruits and roots, and such fish and game as they could procure. Then they were discovered by a passing vessel, their necessities attended to, and they eventually arrived in England.

We will not attempt to describe the rejoicings of the long estranged husband and wife, that they were once more permitted to unite here on earth; the imagination of the reader can paint them in truer colours than the pen could portray.

It was not until William Raymond found himself at the mercy of the waves, with the prospect of speedy death before him, that his heart softened towards his long-neglected wife. But in those two days, while floating between life and death, he had lived over his ten years of wedded life, and in them he could find nothing of wrong with which to accuse her; conscience, true to its mission, constrained him to acknowledge himself alone the guilty one; and he there vowed that, were his life spared to return, the future should fully atone for the past. And there, too, on the boisterous waves, he had called upon Him who alone is able to rescue from death, Him whose name had never before dwelt upon his lips, save with irreverence and profanity; and through those two dreary, desolate years, he had not forgotten often to call upon His sacred name, and implore Divine assistance.

And now there they sit—the past long ago forgiven, and now all forgotten in the blissful present.

Oh, never ascended more fervent thanksgivings to heaven than were poured forth from those two reunited hearts on that eventful evening, and never a happier, more loving pair travelled side by side to the end of life's journey.

William Raymond, now wholly cured of his thirst for the intoxicating beverage, entered again upon the business avocations of life, and ere ten years had passed, he, with his noble, manly boy, William Raymond, jun., as partner, became the wealthy owners of a large mercantile establishment.

And all through coming years, whenever any of those petty vexations and annoyances which must sometimes unavoidably intrude, even upon the happiest household shrine, tempted Adela Raymond with an impatient thought, the memory of those five long years of sorrow, and of her narrow escape from a widowed life, checked it ere it found its way to her lips.

THE CELANDINE.

PEEPING from 'neath thy leaves of green,
In early spring thy flower is seen;
And bright thy yellow petals shine,
Thou pretty little Celandine.

On mossy banks thou lov'st to dwell,
Or hidden in some quiet dell
Thou bloomest on, till summer flowers
Breathe perfume in the leafy bowers.

Sweet flower, what memories thou dost bring,
When life seemed but one joyous spring:
When through the woods, with mirth half wild,
I strayed—a gay and thoughtless child!

And now my youth has taken wing,
Still do I love thee, flower of spring;
For now thou speak'st of "joys to come,"
Eternal in my Father's Home.

JOHN GIBSON, R.A.

THE subject of our biographical department this week—John Gibson, R.A.—is a Welshman. He proceeds from a family who were many years settled on the shores of the Menai, close to the spot famous in ancient history as the landing-place of the Romans headed by Suetonius Paulinus; and, in modern times, by the raising of that great triumph of engineering skill—the Britannia Tubular Bridge. Gibson was born in the year 1790, at Gylfyn, near Conway.

His father was exceedingly humble in circumstances. His occupation, as landscape gardener, did not allow him to give his son the education he desired. Nevertheless, the child showed early symptoms of artistic skill. At the age of nine years he evinced considerable talent in drawing from life.

In 1799 the family moved to Liverpool, with the intention, we believe, of emigrating to the United States. In this city the young student found much better opportunities of carrying out his dreams of self-instruction.

At the age of fourteen Gibson was called upon to learn a trade. He was apprenticed to a cabinet-maker, who perceived the talents of the youth, and soon afterwards cancelled the original indentures to bind him over to the wood-carving department of the same factory. Here the boy was looked upon as an exceedingly promising apprentice. He continued at the work some two or three years, in the meantime cultivating and developing his taste for the art of sculpture. Ultimately, like his great contemporary, Sir Francis Chantrey, he determined to discard the carver's work, and apply himself to the chisel. The apprentice had considerable difficulty in releasing himself from the bonds held by his employer. Permission to leave was resolutely refused, but the young student was determined upon the point. In the face of a threat of law proceedings, he expressed his fixed determination to become a sculptor. At that critical moment the boy found a friend. The chief of the firm of Messrs. Francis, statuary, of Liverpool, took a fancy to him, and purchased the remainder of his time for seventy pounds.

Gibson was now put to the work of his fancy. He laboured with so much zeal and success that he soon became foreman of the establishment. In this capacity he secured the friendship of many influential individuals; among these was Mr. Roscoe, the author of the "Life of Lorenzo de Medici." Mr. Roscoe possessed a little temple of art treasures at his seat, Allerton Hall, near Liverpool.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

JOHN GIBSON, ESQ., R.A. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

Here, aided by the excellent advice and mature judgment of his new friend, Mr. Gibson commenced the study of the higher branches of his art. Circumstances were so far favourable; the young man was soon master of all that was to be learned at Liverpool. Roscoe promised to send him to Rome, and to support him while he remained there, but was prevented by commercial disasters. The means, however, were forthcoming; some friends entered into a subscription, and the requisite amount was soon obtained. The young sculptor was furnished with letters of introduction to Flaxman in London, and to the great Italian master Canova at Rome. A short stay in London succeeded. The now rising artist found great encouragement at the hands of Flaxman. He was privileged to attend the studio of the illustrious sculptor, and to see him work. Gibson made good use of the opportunity. At length, all matters prepared, he took leave of England for the city of Rome, where he arrived in the month of October, 1817.

His reception in the metropolis of art was even more satisfactory than he had hoped for. Canova acted as a friend in every respect. He gave the young Englishman a place in his atelier, and permission to attend his "night academy," where the most select students in Rome were exercised in modelling from life. Henceforward Mr. Gibson made considerable progress in his art.

Subsequently, in 1821, by the advice of Canova, he set up for himself. The Duke of Devonshire was the first visitor who entered the new studio, and the first to give a commission. From that time work came in plentifully.

Although now a master, Gibson had the courage to consider himself a pupil. Accordingly, on the death of his first instructor, he placed himself under the great Danish sculptor Thorwaldsen. The grace and beauty of Gibson's works soon brought him under the notice of the King of Bavaria, for whom he executed several groups. He next secured the patronage of the Grand Dukes of Russia, the Duke of Northumberland, the late Sir Robert Peel, the late Sir George Beaumont, and other munificent patrons of art. Of Gibson's numerous works in poetic sculpture, his "Cupid disguised as a Shepherd Boy," his "Hebe," the "Sleeping Shepherd," "Cupid and Sappho," "Girl and Child," "Phaeton driving the Chariot of the Sun," and many others, might be mentioned. His portrait statues are numerous, and many of them exhibit the highest qualities of the sculptor's art. "Beyond almost any other English artist," observes one of his critics, "Gibson appears to recognise and to appreciate the limits and the conventions of sculpture, and hence his works are always perfect in pose, exquisite in form, severe, yet not cold in style." In modelling he is very successful, and in the management of the chisel admirable.

Mr. Gibson was elected A.R.A. in 1833, and R. A. in 1836, while still absent in Rome. The academy infringed one of its most important rules in electing an artist settled and practising in a foreign country, but the occasion was thought of sufficient importance to justify a departure from ordinary rules.

In 1844 Mr. Gibson received a commission to execute a statue of her Majesty. He was then on a visit to England, after an uninterrupted residence of twenty-eight years at Rome. The bust was modelled at Windsor Castle, and the Queen sat every day for ten days; her Majesty desired "that the statue should be a faithful portrait, such as her children would recognise, and calculated for a room in the palace, not for any public institution." Thus instructed, the artist returned to Rome, and there executed the statue. It was exhibited in the Royal Academy in 1847, and is now among the art treasures of Buckingham Palace. A second has been since executed for the new houses of Parliament.

This work created great commotion in the artistic world on account of some colour being introduced. By one party this was looked upon as judicious; and by another as an innovation unworthy of the great reputation of Gibson. In the case of the Queen's statue, the merest tint of colour was employed; but it was sufficient to provoke a long discussion. It was admitted that the Greeks had occasionally done the same thing to give harmony to their works, and Gibson defended the practice by a reference to the precedent. The innovation was, however, not the less objected to.

Mr. Gibson is very industrious in his art. We should be afraid to enumerate the many palaces and mansions of the nobility which are enriched by his works. Liverpool is particularly fortunate in this respect; her townspeople always considering the sculptor a native of the place.

One of Gibson's early groups, "Hylas and Nymphs," is included in the Vernon Gallery. With the exception of a few portrait-busts, it is the only piece of sculpture in that collection. It is a group of three figures very masterly arranged. It was completed as far back as 1836, and was exhibited in the Royal Academy in the following year.

A few weeks since Mr. Gibson paid another visit to his native country, but his stay was exceedingly short. Before he returned to the land of his adoption, his friend Mr. Mayall secured an admirable portrait by his magic-like process of photography. We have the sculptor's permission to engrave the picture. The likeness is inimitable.

CORAL.

CORAL, like sponge, to which reference has been made before,* is one of those common things about which the majority of people know very little. The following particulars, therefore, will no doubt be interesting to a large class of readers.

Coral is the work of that infinitesimally small and laboriously industrious family, the Polypes. Just as men are best known by their doings, so are these polypes best known by their works. These are spread over all parts of the world. They are built up from the bed of the ocean, and form habitable islands as well as dangerous reefs. A portion even of our own island is based on a foundation of coral, and many of the tropical islands rest entirely on masses of coral rock. The order and regularity with which these vast accumulations of solid matter are constructed, by means apparently so inadequate to the end, are no less astonishing than the amazing number of such masses which are known to exist.

Coral formations occur chiefly in the Pacific, the Indian Ocean, and the Red Sea. In the Indian Ocean, and round New Holland, they are produced by various species of polypes, known as cellepora, modrepora, millepora, and tubipora. The navigation of the seas in which they abound is rendered continually more difficult by the incessant labour of these animals. To trace the progress of these formations is an interesting branch of geological research. The immense height of the reefs may be estimated by the fact that within a short distance of them there are no soundings to the depth of several hundred fathoms. These zoophyte builders have laid the foundation of their structures deep and strong; and by the minute but combined labour of millions, they have built up their reefs to the very surface of the water. The ridge of reef having reached such a height that it remains almost dry at low water-mark, the polypes cease from building higher. On these foundations islands are formed, vegetation is produced, and man establishes a home. Of their gradual development an interesting account is given by an eminent traveller. After describing the work of the polypes, he says:—

"Sea shells, fragments of corals, sea hedge-hog shells, and their broken-off prickles, are united by the burning sun, through the medium of the cementing calcareous sand which has arisen from the pulverisation of the above-mentioned shells, into one whole or solid stone, which, strengthened by the continual throwing up of new materials, gradually increases in thickness, till it becomes at last so high, that it is covered only during some seasons of the year by the high tides. The heat of the sun so penetrates the mass of stone when it is dry, that it splits in many places, and breaks off in flakes. These flakes, so separated, are raised one upon another by the waves at the time of high water. The always active surfer throws blocks of coral (frequently of a fathom in length, and three or four feet thick) and shells of marine animals between and upon the foundation stones; after this the calcareous sand lies undisturbed, and offers to the seeds and trees of plants cast upon it by the waves, a soil upon which they rapidly grow to overshadow its dazzling white surface. Entire trunks of trees, which are carried by the rivers from other countries and islands, find here at length a resting-place after their long wanderings. With these come some small animals, such as lizards and insects, as the first inhabitants. Even before the trees form a wood, the real sea-birds nestle here; strayed land-birds take refuge in the bushes; and, at a much later period, when the work has been long since completed, man also appears, builds his hut on the fruitful soil, formed by the corruption of the leaves of the trees, and calls himself the lord and proprietor of this new creation."

There is much that is beautiful as well as interesting in the appearance of a coral reef. On the coral coasts where the water is bright and transparent, the effect presented by the submerged reefs may be easily observed. Every variety of form, glowing with vivid tints, rival the floral splendour of a cultivated garden.

"The floor is of sand, like the mountain drift,
And the pearl-shells spangle the flinty snow;
From the coral-rocks the sea plants lift
Their boughs, where the tides and billows flow.

"The water is calm and still below,
For the winds and waves are absent there;
And the sands are bright as the stars that glow
In the motionless fields of the upper air.

"There, with its waving blade of green,
The sea-flag streams through the silent water,
And the crimson leaf of the dulse is seen
To blush like a banner bath'd in slaughter.

"There, with a light and easy motion,
The fan-coral sweeps through the clear, deep sea;
And the yellow and scarlet tufts of ocean
Are blended like corn on the upland lea.

"And life in rare and beautiful forms
Is sporting amid these bowers of stone,
And is safe when the wrathful spirit of storms
Has made the top of the waves his own."

Towards the tempting fields of wealth and splendour the coral-divers, knife in hand, make their adventurous descents. In their boats they proceed to the locality selected for their work, as calculated to yield not only the most abundant supply, but the most easily acquired coral. Having made their preparations, the divers, in succession, plunge into the water, and, tearing off the coral from the rocks, ascend to the surface laden with their spoil. The operation closely resembles that of sponge-fishing, and is sometimes conducted at the same time and place.

LATSON.

BY FELIX STOWE.

CHAPTER XXXVI. REPORTS PROGRESS.

"You must let me have my own way for once, aunt, especially as I am now no longer a servant, but in business on my own account, you know."

And Hugh bent over his aunt, and patted her chin as lovingly and simply as of yore, she sitting at her old task of the needle, though—we are all thankful to say—in somewhat different plight from that of number nineteen.

"Remember Jacob—Jacob, wasn't it?—yes, Jacob."

"What of him, dear?"

"It is said, that 'when he was a dying, he worshipped, leaning on the top of his staff.'"

"I've often wondered what that means," said Ruth.

"Just so, and that's the reason you're always persuading me to change my name. You see, Jacob's staff was the symbol to him, first of his early poverty, and then of his subsequent success in life. Don't you remember, he said, 'With my staff I passed over this Jordan, but now I have become two hands.' Aunt, I'm quite aware I'm entitled to take the name of my father and mother, and I will quickly enough, if any duty comes to require it. But, you see, the name 'Church' is my staff—it has been with me through the darkness, and on into the light—it's my staff, and I shouldn't wonder if I die with it, after all."

"Hugh, Hugh! is that kind, to speak of death to me?"

"Well, well! dear" (for he often spoke to her as if they were even more to each other than aunt and nephew)—

"Well, well! I won't. But, there's another thing. Nothing that I've ever heard of the name of Latson strikes me as offering any very strong inducements to bear it, aunt. Eh! I almost think if I had been Latson till now, I'd rather look out for 'Church,' or some other title, than change a name I've borne for many years."

For, at the time of this conversation, Hugh had been long regularly installed as a partner in the firm. And on the dingy door-posts, among two or three other lines of lettering, belonging to other tenants, there was this:—"Messrs. Sporlock and Church, Solicitors."

And so it happened, that, with that genuine high-mindedness, which is the very opposite alike of boasting and of meanness, Hugh Church resolved to remain Hugh Church still.

And it was as Hugh Church, that, after more than three years' study and dining, by the urgent advice of his friend and former partner, he embraced the higher branch of the profession, and was called to the Bar.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE OLD LONDON CHURCH.

THAT was a memorable day, in the great house at Hackney, in more respects than one,—the day when Hugh was entered of the Middle Temple.

Ruth had scarcely known what trouble meant, since she had become housekeeper to the returned medical missionary.

The servants had ever treated her with great respect, for she had always treated them with kindness and consideration.

She remembered other days. And gratitude would have taught her to govern gently, if her own good sense had not.

Then, Mr. Bliss himself had made her position in the house as easy as it was honourable. And now that he lived altogether at home, and depended upon Ruth's management of the household for more than half his comfort, he had discovered, every day, how very safely he could depend on it, and how little he was ever disappointed.

Marmaduke Bliss was not past the prime of life. He bore still, in his countenance and manners, traces of the buoyancy and spirit which in youth had hurried him into folly. But he never once lost the consciousness of the sacred trust he had undertaken, when he admitted Ruth and Hugh into the house. And that trust he had discharged for years, as a Christian gentleman would.

Mr. Bliss had lost his wife within two years of their marriage, and he had never dared to think it possible that another might take her place. He did not look to see her equal, and therefore he had never borne to think of her successor.

During the first two or three years of Ruth's engagement in the family, he had seen very little more of her than just at meal-times, or when he asked for an interview on household affairs.

But after a while (and really altogether for her improvement), he would beg her to bring her work into the library, very frequently, in the evening, and while she stitched he read aloud.

Good, simple man! Quite true, that this was all for Ruth's improvement; and it did improve her. This kind of education was nearly the only sort of education Ruth required. For Ruth was one of those women, of whom we have met many an example, whom a polished boarding-school course would never have made into more complete ladies than they are already. There is in some women a manner, and there is a voice, and there is a look, which no expensive governess could improve, and which many a governess spoils.

Ruth had grown into one of these women—rather, she was always one, as our readers may have perceived, ever since we made her acquaintance in this narrative.

Well, then, all she wanted was a better knowledge of the world, and that sort of knowledge which books can yield.

And while Mr. Bliss was sincerely resolving to pay the homage of a life-long solitude to the memory of another, he had, to some extent, undertaken, during the long winter evenings, to form and to fill Mrs. Wofield's mind. Good, simple man!

Generally, Hugh (whose power of self-abstractedness had always been remarkable) brought his writing, his drafts of deeds, and so on, down stairs, and sat, undisturbed, beside them, while the reading went on. Occasionally he was away; but for a long time it was all the same to the master of the house, and most assuredly all the same to Ruth (except that she preferred his being with them), whether Hugh was absent or present.

As these meetings wore on, and as Ruth herself would sometimes divide with her employer the task of reading, one evening it occurred to Mr. Bliss that it was not quite the same pleasant time to him when Hugh was there, though the work went on precisely the same, before him or behind him.

Especially when Ruth was reading, seated there at the table, her soft, sweet, pensive eyes drooping over the book, and every word pronounced so clearly by that exquisitely chiselled mouth, occasionally her voice stopping for a moment at something she didn't understand, but only asking explanation by her silence;—I say, on these occasions, while Mr. Bliss sat looking and listening, he at last found out (though he was extremely surprised at it), that he preferred sitting and looking at her quite alone.

Singular, most singular.

Matters had been thus for some little while, when Hugh was called to the Bar.

On the evening of this day, Church was enjoying the hospitality of his late partner, and celebrating the event with a select party of lawyers, who, it was thought, might probably join Mr. Sporlock in helping Hugh in the matter of briefs.

They were reading—Ruth was reading—Mitford's short memoirs of the poet Gray.

She had just finished this sentence in the last paragraph—

"His life, indeed, did not abound with change of incident, or variety of situation; it was not blessed with the happiness of domestic endearments, nor spent in the bosom of social intercourse; but it was constantly and contentedly employed in the improvement of the various talents with which he was so highly gifted; in a sedulous cultivation both of the moral and intellectual powers, in the study of wisdom, and in the practice of virtue."

"Poor man!" said Mr. Bliss, with a deep sigh, not removing his thoughtful gaze from Ruth's countenance.

Ruth looked up, as if for an explanation.

"Poor Gray!" said Mr. Bliss, their eyes meeting as he spoke.

"I don't see that, sir," Ruth observed, whose mind was on the improvement of talents and the study of wisdom, &c.

"Then, poor Mrs. Wofield too," said her tutor.

"Really, sir, this seems to me a high character to give of the man, 'contentedly employed'—"

There was a very melancholy, but yet strange mingled look on his countenance as he interrupted her, and said—

"High enough character, but character is not all we want for happiness, is it, Mrs. Wofield? though without it none can be happy. Have you missed that part, Ruth?"

(He had never called her Ruth in his life!)

"Have you forgotten that part?—Not blessed with the happiness—what is it? Will you read that again?"

A little tremulous and a little embarrassed, Ruth did read again—

"Not blessed with the happiness of domestic endearments, nor spent in the bosom of social intercourse."

"Now, then, Mrs. Wofield, are you surprised to hear me say, 'Poor man?'"

And this was said very softly, and with an expression in his kind face she had never seen before.

"No doubt, sir, Gray would have been happier in the midst of relations and friends; but we might have lost, by that, the 'Elegy in a Country Churchyard.'"

"Ruth, would you be willing to love nobody, and to have no one to love you, merely that you might leave a little poetry to be read, when you are in your grave?"

"I can't say that, sir."

"Neither can I, Ruth."

And Mr. Bliss rose from his chair, but immediately seated himself again, and rested his face on both his hands, and his elbows on the table.

Ruth looked on in amazement. For they had often read, with great indifference, passages far stronger than this, on the pleasures of domestic life.

She laid the book in her lap, and was beginning to muse, till he should tell her to go on reading.

"Will you go on, Mrs. Wofield?"

"His letters will be read by all who are desirous of estimating, not only the variety of his learning, and the richness and playfulness of his fancy, but the excellence of his private character, the genuine goodness of his heart, his sound and serious views of life, and his warm and zealous affection towards his friends."

"You see, sir," Ruth said, as she laid down the book, "he had friends, and loved them too."

"Friends, yes."

There was a pause.

Then, he rose and came to where she sat, and very gently took Ruth's little hand between both of his, and held it there.

"Will you let me speak to you, Ruth, as I have never spoken to you, since we met?"

Ruth knew not where to look; and as for an answer, she had none. But she was conscious of a strange fellowship, of fear, and surprise, and yet of happiness.

She was ashamed, however, when she recollected having felt the last; for what could she ever have hoped to be, but as a servant to a master?

He went on—

"Ruth, I cannot die, as that poet died. I once thought I could. You speak of friendship. Bless God for that! But, we were created for something beyond friendship.—Ruth, have I ever, for one moment, taken advantage of our relation to each other in this house, to make you respect me less than you would have done? Have I spoken harshly or inconsiderately, even once? Tell me!"

"Never, sir, never!"

"Then you can trust me that I am not going to begin to take either sort of advantage now?"

"Most perfectly, sir."

"And if what I am going to say offends you, you will believe me when I promise it shall never be said to you again; and you will not quit my house in anger, nor quit it at all, will you, Ruth?"

"No, sir."

"I have not always," he went on, "been without those domestic ties you read about just now—you know that, Ruth?"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you think that any one would blame me, if, after all these years of solitude, I tried to find sympathy and love once more?"

"Blame, sir! I cannot see it."

"Ruth, could you, could you be contented with a love that is not the first love?"

And as he spoke, he gently raised her from the chair, and held her by both hands, and looked very anxiously at her, as she hung down her head, and breathed very quickly.

"We are neither of us young, Ruth—but we are not so old, either. I have long watched you, when you were thinking of any one, perhaps, rather than of me. And I have seen, more and more, that in you, dear Ruth, which I could desire in a companion for the rest of my days. I can hardly hope you will tell the same story of me."

"Oh, sir," she answered, taking her hands from him, and covering her face with them, and sitting down again, "it never once struck me that this could be possible—never! I could not have—"

And the rest of the sentence was stopped (she never could explain why—no one ever can) by a flood of convulsive tears.

"Then I may not hope?" he began.

"Nay, sir, nay! Forgive me!" she said. "I know not what to say. It comes so like a shock to a poor creature like me, that you can ever once have thought about me in this light."

And then she looked up at him through her hot, burning tears, and animation made that well-formed face very beautiful.

He must have thought so, for he lifted her to his side again, and standing by her, whispered—

"I didn't hope, dear Ruth, that you cared anything for me yet; but will you tell me it is possible you ever may? that's all I ask."

"I should be very, very ungrateful if I said I thought I never could care for you, shouldn't I?"

"I must ask you, dearest, to go a step beyond gratitude—indeed to forget that altogether. There is no gratitude—no room for it. I have been the gainer, not you, since we met. Don't mention gratitude, dear Ruth. Will you try to begin to love me?"

"I will," she answered. "But"—and she looked at him almost wildly—"I can't think this is true, sir; it must be a dream."

"Sir!" Did I hear the word 'sir' just after the 'I will'? O Ruth!—a bad beginning—shocking! Say, 'I can't think this is true, dear Marmaduke.'"

And she laughed up at him, drying her eyes.

"Come!"

And before they parted she had said it. And long ere she took the other name for her own, she had whispered over so often to herself "Bliss—Bliss!" that she must have worked the word in upon her little heart, she was so happy.

And still the slab, far, far away, moves not; and the letters, though filled up with green moss and dirt, are there yet; but when, some few months after what we have told you, happened, Mr. Sporlock gave away Ruth, at the altar, to Marmaduke Bliss, and Hugh, full of grateful gladness, stood and saw him do it, Ruth fancied that instead of a bridesmaid, there was a form like unto an angel, that she had often seen in her dreams, now coming through the mist in the church, (mind you, still the same old church), and as it passed, it seemed to whisper to her, as I am sure we all do, "May God bless the dear bride!"

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

FINDS THORNS ON THE ROSES.

THE house-agent had turned the last key upon Latson Towers, and had come up to London, and advertised the estate for sale about as many years,—say nine, or ten—when the marriage of Ruth took place, and when other events of some importance were going on down in Norfolk.

Away down in Norfolk, there moves along among the sick, on most days in the week, a handsome, stately, and withal, gentle woman, who is generally accompanied by her daughter, a lovely girl, just entering her teens.

The daughter carries part of the treasure—perhaps the basket of home-grown grapes—while the mother has, under her shawl, or, just as likely, under nothing at all, the pint-basin of good, strong calves'-foot jelly; wrapped up carefully in paper, as they stand underneath the thatch of many a cottage, and almost touch it, when they stoop to go in.

That daughter, the rector's wife often sighs over, as she calls her,—Ethel.

Ethel wonders why. We do not.

The worst thing you could do for your own peace of mind, and even bodily safety, down in Sharstone, would be to hint a syllable against Mr. Montgomery, the Lady Maude, or any one of their six children.

They are happy, happy hours, every day, down at Sharstone. While these six children have been born, and been growing up, a singular circumstance has been happening every quarter, that we may as well mention, in a kind of parenthesis.

Every quarter, a little packet has been regularly dropped into the village post-office, on a particular day; generally by the lady's own hand.

This little packet, on the next day, or the next but one, has been delivered, bearing no name inside it, at one door, in a little row of almshouses, far off in Wiltshire—the prettiest little row of almshouses perhaps you ever beheld.

Upon the contents of this little packet a very old man has lived; and, out of it, obtained a great number of old man's comforts he must otherwise have been without.

Just after one of the little packets had gone off, Mr. Montgomery read in the newspaper one day the following, in the list of deaths:—

"Ralph Grange, formerly the faithful steward and servant of the late Honourable Colonel Hugh Latson, of Latson Towers, aged 91."

Old Ralph had sat outside the little almshouse, underneath the honeysuckle and roses, on summer evenings, as long as he could sit without being wearied with the beauty and fragrance of his comfortable home, and then, he had fallen asleep.

He had asked to be buried as near his old master as possible. So they made his grave as close to the vault as they could—of course outside the church; and many more of the neighbours followed the faithful old fellow to his last resting-place than were found at the funeral of his miserable master.

The last little packet was more than enough to bury him.

Well, it was just about the time of old Grange's death, that Maude received the following letter by post, the postmark showing that it came from London, and that was all they knew of the writer's whereabouts.

"My dear Aunt,

"I don't know why I should call you 'dear,'—not being aware of any particular trouble you've taken to be so to your nephew. But, as I understand you're living away in clover down there in the country, I take the liberty of telling you that you once, I believe, had a sister, who had the honour of being my mother. Perhaps you've forgotten her. If so, my name may jog your memory. The fact is, I'm 'hard up,' and think of running down and looking up your country crib."

"I can't stay long, so it's no use for you to press me. But I think it my duty to live a little longer, which can't be done conveniently in my present circumstances. I suppose you see the papers sometimes, and I dare say you're acquainted with me under some of my fancy names. Ask your husband, and he'll tell you. There's a law somewhere against letting your left hand know what your right hand doeth; so I haven't generally thought it modest to come before the public precisely in my baptismal character. However, I'm coming down into your parts in a day or two, if I can raise the wind for the purpose; and I've no doubt you'll be glad to see me. If not, the pleasure may be very easily postponed by your sending me a trifle, say, a humble sovereign or two, addressed to X. Y., at 'The Knave of Hearts,' Bucklersbury, London."

"Of course, you know,—though I don't know why you should, either,—that your excellent brother-in-law departed this life long since. I wish he had taken with him

"Your unsuccessful nephew,

"CLAUDE BLANCE LATSON."

At a consultation in the rectory study, over this precious document, it was, of course, agreed, that the best way was to send a five-pound note, to the address named, together with a letter from Mr. Montgomery.

That letter contained all that a kind Christian clergyman may be supposed likely to say under the circumstances. And Maude, dear, good creature, added a postscript of her own.

"It is wrong in you, dear Claude," she wrote, "to imagine that I can have forgotten you. And much more wrong to suppose that I can ever forget your dear, dear mother. As to yourself, what could we do? We have never had the slightest clue to your place of abode—and you yourself admit that we never could have known anything of you, from these sad reports in the newspapers. Oh, Claude! don't be offended if your mother's only sister begs and implores you to turn away, even now, from bad companions, and to recollect her dear memory, who would have rather died a hundred deaths than be your mother, if she had supposed it possible you could ever do anything to be ashamed of your name."

"As to your coming to Sharstone, but for the strange tone of your letter, I would have said, 'Come directly.' You know I would. As it is, I must leave it to yourself."

"I fear, from the way in which you write, that a quiet country rectory would have but few attractions for you. Indeed, I am not sure whether it would be for the happiness of either of us, that we should meet at present. Still, I leave it with you."

"Dear Claude, pray remember that you cannot have gone so far, as that there is no return. Don't fancy you are past recovery. But your letter seems to me a very sad one. I hardly know what to write."

"As soon as you receive this, do pray write again, saying that you have received the money, which we send with our best wishes, and give us some reason to hope that better days are in store for you."

"Don't misunderstand Mr. Montgomery's letter of advice. I assure you, he means it to be respectful, and very kind,—and I am not a whit more concerned about you than he is. Oh, Claude! will it not be terrible, never to see any more, for ever, that dear mother, who prayed so often, as I know, in her last hours, that her little boy might meet her in heaven!"

"Forgive my saying this, and don't laugh at it, as merely a woman's weak affection. Apply to us in any trouble; and, above all, apply to some One else, who knoweth all our weaknesses, and will cast out none that come to him."

"Believe me, my dear Claude,

"Your affectionate aunt,

"MAUDE MONTGOMERY."

It was well that the good creature was not by, when her postscript was read.

He read it in one of his midnight revels, at the table with some of his worst associates, to whom he was giving an entertainment, with the five pounds.

After this, letters and applications for money were things of constant occurrence.

Until, at length, they were compelled to take no notice whatever of either one or the other.

One day there came this epistle, which the good rector and his wife read together:—

"Aunt Maude,

"So you've determined between you, have you? to let me sink. Well, I suppose, sink I shall. But, to let you into a secret, you and your precious husband shall sink with me."

"Be it known to you, that my best friend in London is engaged on one of the chief London papers. Good."

"I've got hold of some nice little stories about your excellent Montgomery. Stories that refer, as I understand, to the time before you had the honour of his acquaintance. Aye, and some since then."

"These little anecdotes are all in print, my dear aunt. And, as sure as you live, I've only to give the word, and out they all come, to the edification of an enlightened public."

"Do you suppose I'm going to lie down and die quietly in all sorts of misery, up here in London, when my own flesh and blood is living in plenty, and rolling in wealth, under the — hypocritical cloak of a country parsonage?"

"You don't know me, I can tell you."

"If my father had had his health, instead of being wrapped, for the last few years of his life, in those confounded flannels, you'd have known better than you seem to do, what Latson blood is made of."

"Ten pounds by return of post to 'The Knave of Hearts,' or you and the parson are done for, world without end, I can promise you."

"And so, I remain, madam,

"Your excellent nephew,

"C. B. L."

"Well, my love," said Mr. Montgomery, "this sets the seal on our resolution to do nothing more. Of course, we take no notice whatever of a letter like that. I hope we know ourselves too well, to be intimidated by any such foolish rhodomontade."

"Entirely my own opinion," sighed poor Maude.

"We can do no more. Poor, poor Ethel! Thank God that she was taken away from the evil to come! And yet, to be sure, hearts can only break once; and, if ever heart broke, hers did."

"It is the Lord, dear girl," said Ernest. "Let Him do what seems to Him good!"

Of course Claude's lies came to nothing; and, happily for the Sharstone circle, they heard no more of him for some time to come.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

SCUM.

THE theatres were all closed, and had been for two hours or more.

There was no light along the Strand but that of the street-lamps, save, perhaps, here and there, where a night coffee-shop sent a glimmer through a lettered blind—a glimmer which a drizzling rain made duller.

You could hear the policeman's tread long before you saw him; and when you did see him, your better way was to walk right boldly past, or he would turn his bull's-eye on you in a moment.

London at two o'clock in the morning! Surely it would have been sombre and silent enough for him who wished, for the "lodge in some vast wilderness,—some boundless contiguity of shade."

Look up one of these side streets. Here is no policeman here.

All is silent as the grave—in front, that is to say. Plenty is going on at the back of two or three of these side-street houses.

In a moment, one of the doors that you thought had long been bolted and barred for the night, is torn rudely open by some one inside, and a man is thrust out; and before you have time to catch a glimpse of the passage, the door is slammed, and chains put on, and bolts drawn.

The man is thrust out with such violence that, after a stagger, he falls down on the outer edge of the pavement, and his head lies off the curb, cheek-by-jowl with the half-filled gutter.

His clothes have seen better days. They are not a poor man's clothes, but clothes whose wearer knew what he ought to put on when he bought them, but has had no means of renewing them.

The cut is a gentleman's—the age, a beggar's.

"What's up? Here's a go!" cried one of two girls to her friend, as they dragged along to the place where the man was lying.

"Oh! I see," said the other. "It's only the Daisy, as I'm a living sinner. He's been at his old tricks again—gone in without the ticket—and they've out with him: quite right. Come on, Su; let him be!"

"Not a bit of it!" said the first speaker. "I shan't let him be. Go on, if you've a mind. Come, old fellow, look up. What's the row, eh? By Jove! but, I say, it's a rum 'un to me if they ain't done for him this time. Pol, take my umbrella."

And the girl knelt down in the mud of that London street, and took the man's hands in hers, and began chafing them one after the other on her knee.

Then, she thundered at the door whence he had been thrust forth.

She needn't have thundered—it was opened in a trice; and fearfully she swore at the man.

"I wouldn't give a fig for your neck, you precious Hottentot" (the porter was a black man); "you've killed the gent—and so, I suppose, you meant to do, you black beast. He's as dead as a door-nail, and all through you. Hi! police! police!"

And down she knelt again—this time at his shoulders, and leaning his head gently against her own breast, she began to unloose his cravat.

The other girl, partly alarmed now, undid his waistcoat, and put her hand over his chest.

"He's coming round, Su," she said. "That's it, my man; you're not hurt. Heavens! how blue and white he looks, don't he? Hi! police! Those precious peelers never are near but when they ain't wanted."

And the man began to breathe quick and heavily, as the first girl passed her poor hand over his forehead, and then, taking out a miserable smelling-bottle, held it to his nose.

He lifted up his bleared, wasted face, and looked at his wretched nurse.

"Ah, what! you've come—at last, have ye! Pay those fellows, old girl, will ye? Tell Mont—gomery he must let ye—"

And he lifted himself on his elbows, and put both his hands to his head.

"Tell him I'm—I'm a lost sheep;—aha! aha! He's bound to—"

And then he fell again into the poor creature's arms.

"He's mad, stark mad," said the other. "This ain't the drink, Su."

"Hold your noise," the girl said. "He's got something on his mind, poor devil! and he ain't the only one, God help him!"

And before any stronger succour came, those two had carried the man into a house a few yards off, up a court.

And when he staggered away, next morning, there was that in his pocket which, had it been there overnight, he had never been flung away as dirt, into the London kennel.

You don't believe it!

Well, take care; there is a class of persons, mentioned by One who never makes mistakes; and these, perhaps, will enter the kingdom of heaven before you.

(To be continued.)

THE NEW YEAR.

THE New Year's morn, serenely fair,
A frost-work garland in its hair,
Comes, marking on its scroll the date
Of eighteen hundred fifty-eight.

And yet, though ruddy is its cheek,
Its features seem to wear

A gathering tinge of anxious thought,
Or trace like wrinkled care,

While listening with an ear profound,
To one reverberated sound:

"Hard times! Hard times!"—a dismal wail
From town and tower, from cliff and dale;

"Hard times!" the shrieking steampipe cries;
"Hard times!" the darkened mill replies,

And far the winged gales prolong
The key-tone of that mournful song.

Hark! from those lips what accents flow
Responsive to the notes of woe;

"Ah! not too much at loss repine,
Nor waste the strength that might repair it;

Ill fortune may o'ertake the wise,
But they should have the power to bear it.

The spider-teacher of the brave
(In Bruce's history you'll find it)

Fell six times with his broken thread,
But at the seventh, sprang up and joined it;

And not too proud of him to learn,
Was the great chief of Bannockburn.

And while we walk as friends together,
These twelve months on, through wind and weather,

Suppose my counsel you should try—
(Though simple, there's no need to flout it),

Pay at the time for what you buy,
Or, if you cannot, do without it.

Let those who have a surplus, spare
In idle luxury to spend it;

But with free hand, and feeling heart,
Seek to divide, disperse, and lend it;

Give work to Labour's willing son,
And wages when that work is done;

A kindly word to cheer the sad,
A loaf to make the children glad;

Let woman in her sphere maintain
Of just economy the rein,

And bid a happy hand repay
Man's vexing troubles through the day,

As sunbeams smile the cloud away;
So from these hard times, fruits shall grow

That selfish ease can never know.

Then when the vernal sun shall sweep
Away these wintry shadows deep,

Let waking Agriculture rise
With quicken'd heart and brightening eyes,

For in his hard and earnest hand
Are the true riches of the land.

His are the specie-paying Banks
That know no defalcation,

The Railroad Bonds that never cheat
And paralyse the nation.

Hail, Farmers! Princes of the soil,
Teach your own sons to love their toil,

With vigorous hand and honest pride
Count rural labour dignified,

Nor cast them out, beyond your aid,
Upon the troubled sea of trade,

To be by storms and breakers tost,
Perchance on Folly's quicksands lost.

Be full of hope, my native Land,
And lift to God the prayerful hand,

That all thy sons from east to west,
In His protection richly blest,

May as a band of brothers rest,—
And thus New Year's departing day

Fresh incense on His altar lay.

Now.—"Now" is the constant syllable ticking from the clock of time. "Now" is the watchword of the wise. "Now" is on the banner of the prudent. Let us keep this little word always in our mind; and whenever anything presents itself to us in the shape of work, whether mental or physical, we should do it with all our might, remembering that "Now" is the only time for us. It is, indeed, a sorry way to get through the world, by putting off till to-morrow, saying, "then" I will do it. No! this will never answer. "Now" is ours; "then" may never be.

Inventions and Science.

WATERPROOF BOOTS.—Some important improvements have recently been made in the manufacture of waterproof boots and shoes by a method which, to some extent, may be applied to ordinary boots. The material consists of perforated sheet India-rubber with vulcanised sheet rubber placed on the face of it with cement. The uppers so completed are submitted to pressure between dies or plates, one of which is grooved to form corrugations on the inner face of the fabric, which when the material is made up assist the ventilation of a boot or shoe. The heel is moulded of hard India-rubber, making the same hollow to receive a filling piece of elastic substance, which projects beyond the edge of the inclosing case, so as to form a cushion for easing the blow of the heel when it strikes upon the ground.

NOVEL EXPERIMENT TO OBTAIN BLACK ROSES.—The obtaining of a black rose has been for some time a favourite scheme with German gardeners, and the following experiment has been lately made in that country. There was selected a fine, healthy oak-sapling, about an inch in diameter. After removing a little of the earth near the root (collum) of the oak, it was cut transversely with a very sharp and thin saw. In this section was ingrafted a healthy twig of a wild rose, and the sprout well tied over with the usual gardeners' wax. After this had been done, the earth was again carefully replaced, and a little trodden down, so that, in fact, an underground grafting has been effected. Although the experiment is rather an adventurous one, it is worth the little trouble of trying during the ensuing spring.

PECULIAR PROPERTIES OF THE NETTLE.—It is a singular fact that steel dipped in the juice of the nettle becomes flexible. Dr. Thornton, who made the medicinal properties of our wild plants his peculiar study, states that lint dipped in nettle juice, and put to the nostril, has been known to stay the bleeding of the nose when all other remedies have failed; and adds that fourteen or fifteen of the seeds ground into powder, and taken daily, will cure the swelling of the neck known by the name of "goitre," without in any way injuring the general habit.

A HINT FOR AMATEUR GARDENERS.—KEEPING OUT FROST.—You may keep the frost out of your pits by a free and judicious use of matting. Thatched hurdles are very convenient for the purpose, because easily lifted off and on, and creating no litter. We have many a time put a lighted rushlight into a small pit on a sharp night, and with a mat or two kept all safe. In a greenhouse, or a small conservatory without a flue, a large stone bottle painted black and filled at night with boiling water will be found to radiate sufficient heat to keep the temperature from sinking to freezing point.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR H. HAVELOCK, C.B.

THIS gallant veteran, who has closed his life amidst the scene of his most brilliant victories, and whose death is regarded as a national misfortune, was born at Bishopwearmouth, near Sunderland, in 1795, and was educated at the Charter House. At that time the school was in its full tide of prosperity under Dr. Russell, and Havelock numbered among his school-fellows the distinguished names of Canon Thirlwall, now Bishop of St. David's; the late Sir William M'Naughten, Archdeacon Hare, Dr. Waddington, Dean of Durham; George Grote, the historian of Greece; Sir Charles Eastlake, and Lord Panmure.

At the Charter House Havelock, owing to his sedate habits, was commonly called the "Philosopher," or "old Philo." It was more a title of respect than an idle nickname, for the boys universally esteemed young Havelock. He was never known to provoke a quarrel, nor to harbour malice. He could fight if it came to that, and never stopped to consider the size of his adversary. Another excellent quality, and one much approved by his schoolfellows, was, that he never "told tales," and that he preferred suffering punishment in his own person, to peaching about others. His shrewdness also won for him many friends. It was clear enough, however, that he had mistaken his vocation when he began to study for the bar, and to eat his terms in the Middle Temple. He was not the man to be tied down with red tape to nisi prius precedents, nor to prosecute or defend a case irrespective of its merits. He found this out soon enough, and having obtained a commission in the army, was assisted in training for this more congenial pursuit by Captain Harry Smith.

For eight years Havelock was on home service, but in 1823 he exchanged from the 95th (Rifle Brigade), into the 13th Light Infantry, and with his regiment embarked for India.

In 1824 the war with the Burmese broke out, and Havelock was immediately engaged in active service, and began to exhibit those soldierly qualities for which he has since become so distinguished. He was present at the actions of Nepadee, Patanagoh, and Paghon, as deputy-assistant adjutant-general. He was subsequently intrusted with a mission to the court of Ava, preparatory to the signing of the Yandaboo treaty. In 1827 he was nominated adjutant of the military depot at Chinsurah, and remained at that place till the breaking up of the establishment, when he returned to his regiment. In the first year of his official appointment at Chinsurah he married the youngest daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Marsham, of Serampore.

For three-and-twenty years Havelock served as a subaltern, and it was not till 1838 that he was promoted to a company. An army was at that time collecting for the invasion of Afghanistan, and Havelock was appointed on the staff of Sir W. Cotton. In this capacity he passed through the campaign, and was present at the storming of Ghuznee and the occupation of Cabul. He was afterwards placed on the staff of General Elphinstone as Persian interpreter; and on the blockading of Cabul by the Ghilziees was sent to join Sir Robert Sale, and was present at the forcing of the Khoord Cabul Pass, at the action of Tezeen, and all the other engagements of the army till it reached Jellalabad.

Havelock particularly distinguished himself during the final attack on Mahomed Akbar, in 1842. During that engagement he commanded the right column, and defeated the chief, and compelled him to raise the siege before the other columns came up.

The name of Havelock is, in fact, associated with all our military movements in the East during the last thirty years. His life alone would furnish a tolerably correct outline of our Indian affairs since 1823. Immediately after the defeat of Mahomed Akbar, Havelock was appointed Persian interpreter to General Pollock, and was present at the Mamoo Keil and the second battle of Tezeen. He played an important part, together with Sir John M'Caskill, at the brilliant affair of Istaliff. In 1843 he acted as Persian interpreter to Sir Hugh Gough, and fought at the battle of Maharajpore. In 1845 he was actively engaged in the Sikh war, and figured at the battles of Moodkee (where he had two horses shot under him), at Ferozeshah, and Sabraon. At Sabraon a cannonball passed through his saddle-cloth, and killed his horse.

In 1849, after five-and-twenty years' active service, Havelock returned to Europe. Hard work and the climate of India had begun to tell on his constitution, and he remained in England two years for the restoration of his health. In 1851 he went back to Bombay, was soon after made brevet colonel, and adjutant-general of the queen's troops in India. The recent war with Persia summoned him again to the field, and he commanded the troops at Mohammerah. In returning to Calcutta, the vessel in which he had embarked was wrecked off Ceylon. Five days after he obtained a passage in the Fire Queen, and arrived at Calcutta about the time of the outbreak of the late disastrous mutiny. He was immediately sent up the country as brigadier-general, in command of the movable columns.

His subsequent triumphal march and decisive victories are too well known to require recapitulation. Nena Sahib and the mutineers again and again fled before him, and in revenge for their defeat, massacred the women and children at Cawnpore! That atrocious and unprecedented barbarity gave redoubled energy to Havelock and his troops. "Remember the women, remember the babies" became a rallying word. The blood of the women, crying from the ground, made every right arm stronger in dealing out punishment to the murderers. The Highlanders parted the shorn locks amongst them and swore to take a Sepoy's life for every hair.

The relief of Lucknow is a most important event in the long list of Havelock's victories. The subsequent siege of the Residency, when starvation had to be encountered as well as murderous Sepoys, is scarcely less remarkable than the relief of that position. Shut up in Lucknow, and surrounded by the mutineers, Havelock supported the courage of his half-famished troops, and although he might easily have fought his way out, refused to listen to such an expedient, lest the lives of the women and children might be endangered. Relief arrived, and the gallant Havelock came out to meet a brother veteran, Sir Colin Campbell. Six days after the relief of Lucknow Havelock expired, Nov. 25, 1857.

The services rendered to the country by Sir Henry Havelock cannot be over estimated. The public voice is raised in favour of the man whose gallantry preserved the garrison of Lucknow from the sword of Nena Sahib, and so signally defeated that monster at Cawnpore. The rewards bestowed were not commensurate with the services rendered. The debates in parliament, whether or no he should be allowed his thousand or his two thousand a year, indicated that caste was not confined to India; that family interest and aristocratical connections had more to do with promotion than actual service. Why should not Havelock have been raised to the peerage? Why should we not have an Earl of Lucknow and Baron of Cawnpore? A head crowned with laurels would not surely disgrace a coronet. It was on the field of battle that many of our noble families were founded: why should not the Havelocks, whose sire fought for humanity and religion, count with the descendants of those fierce Norman lords, whose deeds are so proudly recounted, and whose memories are so fondly cherished? We are doing some honour to the departed hero in offering consolation to his widow and orphans. The voice of the country demanded that honour and reward commensurate with the service he had rendered should be given to his family. Never was a soldier's loss more deeply felt by his sympathising countrymen—and never was a nation more anxious than is England to render a grateful tribute to her fallen veteran.

"Mourn ye for him, let him be regarded
As the most noble corpse that ever herald
Did follow to his urn."

The Matron.

NO. VI.

In a beautiful poem called "The Song of the Bell," we are told how much wise sayings lighten work. Now, from experience, I know this to be a fact.

When we hear a subject well discussed, in other words well talked over, we feel we can master it. Therefore I hope that my discussions on household matters will lighten the work of some of my readers, and enable them to master many subjects important to the comforts of home.

I have said a great deal about cookery, and I intend saying more; but in the first instance I wish to make a few remarks on two very important agents in cookery, and in everything else, viz., on fire and water.

To begin with fire. What waste of time, food, and fuel, is occasioned by mismanaging fires. 'Tis a lamentable fact, that this mismanagement should exist in a country like ours, where the fireside of every man, rich or poor, should form his earthly paradise. I am so impressed with the importance of managing a fire well, that, sometimes, I long to arrange the ill-built fires of my friends, whether of the higher or lower classes. To do this efficiently, I should bring all the live coals to the front, rake out a few cinders from the lower department of the grate, and then throw up the ashes if possible; for sometimes the ashes have accumulated to such a degree that they have become quite unmanageable. The sloven never thinks of throwing them up. He is quite satisfied if they are at length removed, and thrown with all the cinders on some rubbish heap close to his dwelling, where bones, rags, potato peelings, and, occasionally, lost silver spoons, form (as a whole) an emblem of the confusion and wasted capabilities of the master's mind. I beg my readers to attend to these words, "wasted capabilities," for I intend to prove that hardly anything thrown away by the thrifless, might not have been turned to some account.

In the first place, however, I wish to speak about fires. As I have kept servants myself for many years, it is not often I have had to "begin at the beginning" and kindle the fire, but I know very well how it should be done, and I know the causes of failure, as many improvident housemaids do, to their cost. One fruitful source of difficulty is damp wood. Surely this might have been dried the day before. Another cause of failure is inattention to the fact that air is necessary to combustion. Many thoughtless people choke up the grate with coals and cinders, leaving the flame no vent. But let us suppose your wood dry, your fuel lightly and judiciously laid, and the fire burning cheerfully. What is the best way to keep up the flame? Do not suppose that large coals are indispensable to a good fire. They are useful in the first instance; but when once drawn up, the fire will last much much longer if both small coals and cinders are thrown at the back. Should you wish to make the fire last remarkably long, you may then put on some nice lumps of coal, place a few clumps of wood over them, and throw small coals and cinders at the back.

I now turn to the consideration of water. For cooking, washing, and cleaning, soft water is advisable, and where it cannot be procured, art must come to the help of nature. Put a piece of chalk into hard spring water and it will soften it. Another method is equally simple: boil hard water, and it becomes soft. The truth of this assertion you may put to the test. You may have vainly endeavoured to use soap with hard water. Boil this water, and let it stand till cold. Then apply soap, and you will find it assimilate perfectly.

Having thus gone "through fire and water," I resume the subject of dinners; and here let me recommend all mistresses to introduce as much variety as possible into their bills of fare, and never to give their husbands, sons, or brothers cause to say, "I must dine out to-day, I am so tired of always having the same thing." I have touched on a subject involving such important results, that instead of trusting to my own powers of persuasion, I will warn and instruct my readers, by a few lines borrowed from Soyer. He represents a poor husband coming home ready for dinner, long before dinner is ready for him. In fact there is nothing in the house for him; but his wife proposes getting him a mutton chop or a steak. Now listen to the dialogue that follows:—

"Can I have nothing else? I am tired of chops and steaks."

"Why, my dear, what can be better than a chop or a steak?"

"Well, let me have a steak."

"You had that yesterday; now let me get you a chop."

"Well, send for two chops."

In about twenty minutes the servant returns, saying she could get no chops, but has a nice piece of steak.

"Very well, that will do, will it not, my dear?" to her husband, who is reading a paper.

"Yes! but how long will you keep me before it is done?"

"Not a minute, my love. Now, Jane, do that well on the gridiron."

However, Jane finds no broiling fire. The husband gets tired of waiting, with nothing but the well-known steak in anticipation. He throws down his paper, rushes out in a rage to dine elsewhere, and consoles himself with something to drink for having found at home nothing to eat. With no stimulus in wholesome food, he seeks it in pernicious spirit;—and who is to blame, if he becomes a bad and even a brutal husband?

On the part of wives, a little forethought may avert all the evils just portrayed; and I hope my occasional list of dinners may prove useful and welcome to all who have the difficult task of catering for others.

I have not yet spoken of a Sunday dinner. This might consist of six pounds of the ribs of beef. Place them on a trivet, standing in a nice Yorkshire pudding (for this I have already given the receipt). Send or take both meat and pudding to the nearest baker, to whose care you may also intrust your potatoes (in their skins). This dinner I recommend for Sunday, because you will not thus be obliged to devote to cooking, time that should be spent in public worship.

On Monday, I suppose you have some cold beef and cold pudding left. Carefully mince half of your meat in the following manner:—Chop it small, put it on a dish, sprinkle over it about a teaspoonful of salt, a third of ditto of pepper, one of flour; mix it well, add half a pint of water, and put it on the fire in your saucepan. Stir it when it begins to boil, and let it simmer ten minutes. Serve it up with a dish of good potatoes.

The cold pudding should be cut in slices, and browned in the fryingpan. Thus there would be a pleasing variety for Monday's dinner; and variety may be secured on Tuesday, also, by following this receipt. Make up the remaining cold beef into that old-fashioned, but savoury, dish, called "bubble and squeak." Though generally composed of salt, it is very nice with fresh beef. Cut your remaining cold meat into thin slices (including all the fat); then boil two nice Savoy cabbages, drain them well, and chop them up rather fine. Put three ounces of fresh dripping in the fryingpan, which place on the fire; when hot, put in your slices of meat, and fry them of a brownish colour, then take them out and put them on a dish, and keep them hot. After this, brown the cabbage in the fryingpan, adding a teaspoonful of salt, and another of pepper. Dish up the cabbage and place the beef over it. I am much mistaken if the "bubble and squeak," with the addition of potatoes, is not considered an excellent and palatable dinner.

In this chapter I intended to prove how many useful things are thrown away by the thrifless; but my limits forbid. This important subject will, with other matters, be discussed in next number.

Chemical Experiments.

MAGICAL COLOUR-CHANGES.

When a man perceives the nature and reason of a thing, it ceases to be magical to that particular individual; for which reason none of the experiments presently to be detailed will appear in the slightest degree magical to the chemist. Quite otherwise to such persons as are not chemists: to them the colour-changes about to be mentioned will appear very extraordinary.

Experiment 1.—Dissolve about ten grains, a good pinch, of iodide of potassium, sometimes called hydriodate of potash, in pure water—i.e. distilled water; put the solution aside in a wineglass or phial. Get a chemist to dissolve for you (the operation is not easy), two grains of corrosive sublimate in an ounce of distilled water. He will label it "Poison," of course. When this solution is prepared and given into your possession, do not let it out of sight for a single instant, and any portion which may not have been used in your experiment throw away.

By adding solution of iodide of potassium and solution of corrosive sublimate to each other in various proportions, you will get some of the strangest changes of colour imaginable. The tints rapidly vary from all shades, beginning with canary yellow, up to the most lovely carnation; and the formation of each separate colour takes place not irregularly, but in festooned garlands, as if some invisible fairy amused herself by throwing flower-garlands into the liquid. Presently, if either of the solutions be added beyond the limit of certain proportions, the mixture suddenly becomes colourless. This beautiful experiment is of more value than that of furnishing a means of chemical amusement. It illustrates to those who are unacquainted with chemistry the method followed by chemists in speaking so confidently as they do about the presence of this or that thing. The beautiful play of colours just supposed to have been produced by mixture of the two agents, iodide of potassium and corrosive sublimate (bichloride of mercury), are yielded by no other agents; consequently, if a certain unknown liquid yields the above tints, as particularised, when tested with iodide of potassium, it is an unknown liquid no longer: it contains corrosive sublimate, or bichloride of mercury. The latter substance is a frightful poison, far more violent than arsenic, but less to be dreaded, notwithstanding—1. For the reason that arsenic is devoid of taste, whereas sublimate has a powerful taste (dip the end of a straw in your solution and taste it), and therefore can hardly be administered by a murderer to his victim; 2. Because there is an antidote for sublimate in the shape of white of egg, mingled with water, which curdles it, and renders it innocuous, whereas there is practically no antidote to arsenic.

Experiment 2.—Take a piece of copper—say a farthing, or any copper coin—drop a little vinegar upon it, allow the vinegar to remain for a few moments, then finally immerse the coin in some water contained in a wineglass. However pure the water might have been previously to this operation, it will now be charged more or less with copper. Perhaps the non-chemical experimentalist, unaccustomed to testing, had better make a tolerably strong solution of copper, by taking out the copper coin, smearing it with vinegar, and re-immersing it several times following. Instead of vinegar, aquafortis may be used, and with quicker effect, though vinegar will answer every purpose.

Pour in a little solution of prussiate of potash into a portion of the copper solution, and a mahogany-red colour will be evolved.

Into a second portion of copper solution pour in a little hartshorn, and mark the lovely blue colour which is generated. No metal in creation, other than copper, when dissolved and the solution treated by prussiate of potash and hartshorn successively, can yield by the first a mallowy-red or brown colour, by the second a blue colour. Which facts being duly committed to mind, the reader will perceive the method of determining the presence of copper. Usually hartshorn is quite sufficient to the end in question, without the use of prussiate of potash, or any other testing.

Experiment 3.—To change iron apparently into copper.—If a piece of iron or steel—the blade of a knife, for example—be immersed in a solution of copper, the copper deposits in the metallic condition upon the iron or steel, and creates the notion in the mind of the observer unacquainted with chemical science that the result is a case of transmutation. It has no pretensions to be regarded in that light; it is merely the deposition of one metal upon the surface of another.

Should you desire to surprise a friend by this sort of apparent transmutation, and surprise him effectually, it will be necessary to operate on a somewhat stronger solution of copper than the one just mentioned. You had better dissolve a drachm of blue vitriol (which is a salt of copper) in say a pint of water; which will be enough to furnish a good bath, capacious enough to dip a knife blade into. Depositions of copper will speedily take place, and in a few minutes the iron knife will apparently be transmuted into copper.

Copper is a very poisonous metal: it frequently gets into articles of both food and drink, where its presence is highly undesirable. Wherever present in the soluble form, it admits of being discovered by one of the methods indicated above. If the solution be at all strong, the mere immersion of an iron knife blade, well freed from grease, into the liquid, will sufficiently indicate the presence of copper, without having recourse to any further test.

Experiment 4.—Dissolve a piece of sulphate of iron* about the size of a filbert, in about a pint of water, and divide the solution into three portions.

To the first portion add a little infusion or tincture of gall nuts (either will do), and remark the black tint developed; it is merely writing ink, which, as ordinarily made, is composed of this sort of black iron liquid, thickened, more or less, with gum water.

To the second portion add a little of prussiate of potash solution, or even a small crystal of the same; and remark the lovely blue tint developed. It is Prussian blue, or rather, one of the many varieties of Prussian blue which are known to chemists.

To a third portion add a little of solution of the salt termed red prussiate of potash. By contact with this, the iron solution will yield a colour so exactly like the tint of blood, that former chemists imagined the real colour of blood to be due to the active principle of this very agent.

Experiments involving change of colour by the mixture of different tests, should not be looked upon only as mere matters of amusement. They display the principles upon which chemical analysis is conducted, and, duly pondered, are very instructive.

Small Change.

CRAB'S TAILS.—A young lady at a ball was asked by a lover of serious poetry whether she had seen "Crabbe's Tales." "Why no," she answered; "I didn't know that crabs had tails." "I beg your pardon, miss," said he; "I mean have you read 'Crabbe's Tales'?" "And I assure you, sir, I did not know that red crabs, or any other, had tails."

A CANDIDATE FOR CELEBRITY.—"Do you publish matrimonial notices for the subscribers to your paper?" said a gentlemanly-looking youth, stepping into our office the other morning. "Certainly, sir." "Well, then, I'll go and get married; for I don't see any other way of getting my name in your paper—since you have rejected all my poetical effusions."—American Paper.

CHANGEABLE AS THE WIND.—"How changeable the wind is," said Mrs. Partington, upon her return from a walk in the city. "It is the changeablest thing I ever did see." When I went up Cannon-street, it was a blowin' in my face, and when I turned to go down it went blowin' on my back!"

PROGRESS OF RUMOURS.—The art of spreading rumours is compared to that of pin-making. There is usually some truth, which is the wire; as this passes from hand to hand, one gives it a polish, another a point, others make and put on a head, and at last the pin (or the rumour) is completed.

* Otherwise known as green vitriol and "copperas," though it contains not one particle of copper.

MEDICAL STUDENT'S EXAMINATION.—"Do wounds often heal by the first intention?"—"Not when the patient is rich and the doctor poor."—"When does mortification ensue?"—"When you pop the question, and are answered no!"

THE papers tell us of a little city girl in the country, who, looking out of the window, exclaimed, "Oh, ma, what are these queer-looking animals that are walking about with powder-horns growing out of their heads?" But we see no mention of the little country girl in the city, who cried, "Oh, mother, who are these queer-looking people that are going along with great ugly shoe-brushes under their noses?"

DENTAL OPERATION.—Jones, while recently engaged in splitting wood, struck a false blow, causing the stick to fly up. It struck him on the jaw and knocked out a front tooth. "Ah," said Bill, meeting him soon after, "you had a dental operation performed, I see." "Yes," replied the sufferer, "axe-dental."

WANTED, OPPORTUNITY.—At a party a gentleman passed a branch of thyme to a young lady, his sweetheart, in the presence of her mother and all the guests, which she refused, and said, "It is not time I want, but opportunity."

TEMPORAL BLESSINGS.—Wish for them cautiously—ask for them submissively—want them contentedly—obtain them honestly—accept them humbly—manage them prudently—employ them lawfully—impart them liberally—esteem them moderately—increase them virtuously—use them subversively—forego them easily—resign them willingly.

PEACE OF MIND.—Quiet of mind and ease within is a great blessing, upon which the comfort of life depends. Nothing, without this, can make one's life happy. The spirit brought down to the lot, makes and maintains this inward tranquillity. Our whole trouble in our lot in the world ariseth from the disagreement of our mind therewith. Let the mind be brought to the lot, and the whole tumult is instantly hushed.

THE BEST DOWRY.—A maiden being asked what fortune she would bring her husband, replied, "I will bring him what gold cannot purchase—a heart unspotted and virtue without a stain—the inheritance from parents who had these, and nothing else, to leave me."

COMPOSITION AND DECOMPOSITION.—One of Bishop Blomfield's latest bon-mots was uttered during his last illness. He inquired what had been the subjects of his two archdeacons' charges, and was told that one was on the art of making sermons, and the other on churchyards. "Oh, I see," said the Bishop, "composition and decomposition!"

STIR THE FIRE.—A gentleman, at a musical party, where the lady was very particular not to have the concord of sweet sounds interrupted, seeing that the fire was going out, asked a friend, in a whisper, "How he could stir the fire without interrupting the music?" "Between the bars," replied the friend.

FLATTERY is a sort of bad money, to which our vanity gives currency.

TOASTS.—Alliterative toasts are in great demand just now. At a late public meeting, the following "dry" toast was given (the author of which got "battered" when he reached home)—"The Press—the Pulpit—and Petticoats—the three ruling powers of the day. The first spreads knowledge, the second spreads morals, and the last spreads considerably."

MODERATION.—A clergyman was rebuked by a brother of the cloth, a few days ago, for smoking. The culprit replied that he used the weed moderately. "What do you call moderately?" inquired the other. "Why, sir," said the offender, "one cigar at a time."

ERROR.—The mixture of one error with much truth adulterates the whole: as the chalice of pure liquid is rendered dangerous by the infusion of a drop of poison. We should therefore beware of all error, however slight and inconsiderable it may appear. One error may soon lead to a hundred—ay, to a thousand.

A CUNNING LAWYER.—A lawyer in Ireland, who was pleading the cause of an infant plaintiff, took the child in his arms and presented it to the jury suffused with tears. This had a great effect, till the opposite lawyer asked, what made him cry; "He pinched me," answered the little innocent. The whole court was convulsed with laughter.

A BRAVE SCHOLAR.—"Ah, you're at the schule now are ye?" was the interrogatory of a countryman to a little nephew who had a short time before commenced his education—"an d'ye like the schule, my man?" "Yes," whispered the boy. "That's right! ye'll be a braw scholar, I've warrant—how far are ye, hinny?" "Second dux." "Second dux, says ye? od man, he deserves something for that," thrusting two whole penny-pieces into the hand of delighted urchin. "An' hoo mony's in ye'r class?" "Me an a lassie."

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—The back numbers of "Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper"—new series—are now on sale at one penny each; and these aforesaid back numbers of the new series, each containing sixteen pages demy quarto, will continue at this price until further notice.

T. A. P. G.—"The Prince Consort," by virtue of his patent, retains the title of "Prince Consort" for life.

MARY GRIFFITHS wishes to know who was David king of Israel's mother. We cannot tell. The Scripture is silent; and the case is really of no importance.

HOMO.—If a husband or wife obtain a divorce à vinculo matrimonii either can marry again, and the wife who has been divorced by her husband would marry again under her maiden name.

SORBAON.—The two persons can only be married in the district in which (supposing they are domiciled in separate districts) one of them resides, and the three weekly notices must be given in both districts. "Sorbaon" is mistaken in supposing that a license entitles persons to marry where they choose, irrespective of residence. One of the two contracting parties must reside for three weeks in the parish in which their marriage by license is to be solemnised.

B. O. K.—The new act which came into operation on the 11th of January does not entitle a wife who has been deserted by her husband for two years to marry again. The circumstances under which a wife deserted by her husband can marry again are explained in the answer to "Cesar Borgia."

CESAR BORGIA.—The wife would, under the circumstances, be able to procure a "judicial separation," formerly termed a divorce à mensa et thoro, but this separation would not entitle her to marry again. She has heard from her husband within the space of two years, and it is only after a disappearance of seven years, during which the wife has made every effort to discover whether her husband is still alive, without effect, that the law looks upon him as legally dead to her. But even in this case, if the first husband should eventually return he would have a right to claim his wife, notwithstanding her second marriage, which would be thus rendered null and void; but the wife would not be indictable for bigamy.

D.—Prepared chalk is the best tooth-powder. It corrects acidity, which is the great destroyer of the teeth. Avoid camphor, as it injures the enamel.

JOHN S.—Under the impression that the intentions of "John S." are honourable, we recommend him frankly to write to the parents or guardians of the lady in question. He should state his views and prospects, and beg to be allowed to cultivate the acquaintance of the object of his affections. But if "John S." has no inclination for this decisive plan of proceeding, we can assure him we, on our side, have no intention of assisting him to form a clandestine intimacy with any young lady in England or elsewhere.

HOMO.—Lovers often suffer unnecessary misery through concealments and misunderstandings. If either party had the courage to seek an explanation, how much evil would be removed! "Homo's" case is plain. As an accepted lover, he has a right to ask for an interview with the lady in question. Having procured it, he may find the fault complained of was committed through ignorance; and that on becoming aware of the character of the acquaintance formed, the lady he loves is willing to relinquish it. Should she persevere in associating with an individual of acknowledged disrepute, "Homo" is justified in discontinuing his addresses; but, as he describes himself to be "enamoured," we caution him against harshness or precipitancy, for,

"To be wroth with what we love,
Doth work like madness on the brain."

A CLERK.—The word instant, abbreviated inst., means the present month. Ex. On the 14th inst., means on the 14th of the present month. But if I say on the 14th ultimo, or ult., I allude to the 14th of the past month.

J. THOMAS.—In prescribing for chilblains we must bear in mind that there are three degrees of chilblains. In the first stage the skin is red, swollen, and tingling. In this stage they should be soaked well in warm bran and water, and then rubbed with mustard seed flour. In the second stage small blisters appear. Then, tepid water and the application of a leech gives relief. If the chilblains have reached the third stage—id est, if they are broken—then emollient ointment must be used. But "prevention is better than cure," and, therefore, we earnestly recommend attention to regular exercise, and to avoid one frequent cause of chilblains—viz., warming numbed hands and feet at the fire.

PHIZ.—"Phiz" is answered in a reply to "Caroline Ada." S. M. B.—We cannot give "S. M. B." much hope, for it is our opinion that long petticoats will be worn until ladies learn to prefer economy and comfort to grace and elegance.

SARAH SHAW.—"Sarah Shaw" requires a recipe for getting rid of a lover. The wisdom of ages, condensed into a proverb, tells us, that "where there's a will there's a way." Is "Sarah" sure that this will exists, and that private encouragement does not counteract outward coldness? Vanity is a very strong principle in man's heart. It is soon disgusted by a repulse, and where he continues to love he has generally been led on to hope. Let "Sarah Shaw" take this hint.

A THREE YEARS' SUBSCRIBER.—Your verses are feeling and eloquent. There is not the least danger of your "making a fool of yourself" by sending them. We think there are few "dark-eyed maidens" who could read them unmoved.

ANDREW YOUNG.—"Andrew Young" wishes for our advice on two important subjects—the first, his own hair; the second, his sister's bunsions. "Andrew" wishes to know how to dye his light hair; his reason is that his employment makes it very dirty, and that constantly washing it gives him cold. If our subscriber is determined to dye his hair, we recommend him to do as follows:—Procure lime for about twopenny, and reduce it to powder with a little water; then mix this with litharge (three quarters lime and a quarter litharge); sift this through a fine sieve. Put some of this mixture into a saucer, pour boiling water on it, and mix it up with a knife. Divide the hair into layers with a comb, and plaster layers and roots with the mixture. Then place on your head a covering of damp brown paper; over this closely bind a handkerchief, and put a nightcap over all. In the morning your hair will be black, and a beautiful black too, when you have washed it with soap and water, and oiled and brushed it. As for your sister's bunsions, they should be perseveringly rubbed night and morning, and during the daytime they should be tightly bound with broad tape.

HARROD.—Her present Majesty was married at the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the old series of the FAMILY PAPER can be procured at the publishers'.

BEITA.—To restore your velvet cloak, plushed from pressure, you must remove the lining, and hold the reverse side of your velvet over a basin of boiling water.

ALEXANDER.—When the lady in question offers you at parting two fingers instead of her whole hand, she "gives you to understand" that she is very ignorant and ill-bred.

MARY.—"Mary," who took the contradiction of a senior so patiently, was in the right all the time. Of civil engineering the construction of railroads forms an important part; and the great George Stephenson, who had almost as much to do with railroads as with the railway carriage, was a first-rate civil engineer.

PILGRIM.—We pity "Pilgrim's" forlorn condition; but, as in business, so in love affairs, there is nothing like coming to the point. Have an explanation with your sweetheart. Perhaps while you are doubting her love, she is doubting yours. In these estrangements it is the gentleman who should generally take the first step.

AMOS WILSON.—The lines of "Amos Wilson" on the "Old and New Year," are very good for a boy of twelve years old; but we do not recommend him to throw down the goose in order to take up the quill. Tailors get on much better than poets in our matter-of-fact days.

DUNLUCE.—"Dunluc" wishes to get married. We think he is perfectly right, and we are happy to assist him. Supposing "Dunluc" to be a peer, a member of parliament, a baronet, or a baronet's eldest son, he would be allowed the privilege of a special license. This would cost him £25, and it must be procured at Doctors' Commons. At the same place the usual marriage licenses may be had for £2 12s. 6d. If "Dunluc" should prefer the good old-fashioned plan of having his banns put up, the fee required would be only 7s. 6d. In the parish in which he wishes his marriage to be celebrated, either himself or bride must have resided three weeks.

AN ENRAGED QUERIST.—"If 'An Enraged Querist' knew what piles of letters are now awaiting the attention of the editor, he would become aware of the fact that others have to wait as well as himself. Let all be patient, and they will be attended to in due time. The reason why the Princess Royal is not to be married at Westminster Abbey is understood to be the expense that the arrangements would entail. Sixty or seventy thousand pounds would be required for the purpose. Prince Frederick William of Prussia is the son of the Prince of Prussia, presumptive heir to the throne.

A YOUTH.—"A Youth" is suffering from two evils, a red nose and a wish to become an actor. We think the last the worst of the two. But if decidedly stage-struck, we doubt whether he will listen to any advice from us, and probably the difficulties he will encounter at the very beginning of a theatrical career will be effectual in checking his passion. As to the red nose, we are glad it does not proceed from intemperance. In a young person the most common cause of a red nose is indigestion, or irregular circulation of the blood. The first cause may be removed by attention to diet, the second by using the flesh-brush, and taking daily exercise. Sometimes acidity on the stomach occasions redness in the nose or face. For this a tea-spoonful of magnesia, well mixed in milk, and taken twice a week, would prove a remedy.

OMEGA.—Yes.

MARVEL.—Edwin Landseer was a pupil of the great but unfortunate painter, B. R. Haydon.

MILLNER.—"Milliner" has swallowed a pin. The best thing she can do is to take four grains of tartar emetic dissolved in warm water, and, immediately after, the whites of six eggs. But instant recourse must be had to a surgeon if, instead of being swallowed, the pin has stuck in any part of the throat.

CAROLINE ADA.—R.S.P.: These initials are the abbreviations of a French sentence, "Répondez, s'il vous plait," in English, "Answer, if you please." In like manner the initials P.P.C. represent another French sentence: "Pour prendre congé," "To take leave." Of course R.S.P. is placed in notes of invitation, and P.P.C. on cards left at a farewell call.

LILLIE.—"Lillie's" case interests us excessively. In her heart "love and duty are at war." Hitherto she has fought bravely on the right side, and we trust she will continue to do so. We can hardly imagine a parent whose heart would not be touched by such a letter as "Lillie" has addressed to us. Let her write a similar one to her father. "What is written remains;" and not only does it remain, but it often proves more convincing than what is spoken. Let "Lillie" dwell on the fact that anxiety is preying on her health, that she is willing to wait for years if her father will only allow her to hope; and let her remind her father that she has not fixed her affections on an unworthy object. We believe that the result of this proceeding will be more successful than "Lillie" may dare to hope; for it will probably establish more confidence than has hitherto existed between herself and her father; and we can assure "Lillie" that much of the seeming harshness of parents is owing to the silence and cold reserve of their children.

ALFRED J.—We would not advise "Alfred J." to take to the stage, so many requisites being necessary to attain distinction. In the first place, education, which "Alfred" does not appear to have sufficiently received; added to which, the chances of success are so much against every theatrical aspirant. "Alfred's" age is the right one at which to begin. His only course would be to apply to a dramatic agent, say Mr. Anson, in Bow-street; and, should "Alfred" be fortunate enough to procure an engagement, he would soon discover whether he was fitted for the stage; and if he could not find the fact out himself, his employers would soon do it for him.

DUBITANS is perfectly at liberty to publish his tract. There is no law to prevent him from doing so. Of course the tract contains no statements that could come under the denomination of "libel."

CLAYMORE.—There is certainly a great affinity between earthquakes and volcanic eruptions, both being effects of the same cause, namely, the imprisonment of gases within the earth, which seek to form an outlet for themselves through the surface. The destruction of Herculaneum and Pompeii occurred in the year 79. The loss of life was comparatively small. Most of the inhabitants had time to fly, taking with them their most valuable possessions. Vesuvius has been the safety of Naples on various occasions; and in the late earthquake the city escaped with little damage, while other towns were completely overthrown.

HOCHELAGA.—Muffled paddles or oars should be used; a little practice will enable you to avoid all noise. Wild ducks are proverbially shy; and, unless the punt be propelled very gradually, it is difficult to get at them.

A SUBSCRIBER is puzzled to make out the meaning of the exclamation, "O yes! O yes!" with which many cries in the provincial towns commence their announcements of things lost and found, &c. The words as they stand are a corruption of the French, "Oyez Oyez!" hear, or listen, by which all proclamations were preceded in the olden time.

NELSON, already eighteen, and a landsman, had better not have anything to say to a man-of-war, for the man-of-war's men will certainly have nothing to say to him.

GEORGE H.—You are wrong in your conjecture. All towns ending in caster or chester, such as Doncaster, Rochester, Manchester, are of Roman origin, the terminations indicating a camp; those ending in ton, ham, vick, or burg, are Saxon; those with the prefixes Caer or Car, and Aber, are Celtic, Caer signifying a town, and Aber the mouth of a river.

CURIOS.—The term "beefeaters," by which the attendants at the Tower of London are designated, is a corruption of the word "buffeters," or attendants at the buffet or side-board. The costume of these "yeomen of the guard" on state occasions is almost entirely the same as the dress worn by their ancestors, in the time of bluff King Harry the Eighth.

ENQUIRER.—Caste in India means rank or station—the natives being divided into various castes or stations, according to the professions or trades they follow. To lose caste, is to be degraded to a lower rank. Natives who have lost all pretensions to be admitted into any caste are called Pariahs.

TOBACCO.—The specimen with the elegant signature "Snooks" is the best.

HUGH LATSON.—The Cato-street conspiracy was so named from the small street near the Edgeware-road where the conspirators used to meet. A villain named Thistlewood was the ringleader. The design of the conspirators was to murder the chief ministers of an unpopular government. Betrayed by one of their number, they were arrested, and suffered death for high treason. They were first hanged and then decapitated.

SPIITALFIELDS.—Several attempts have been made in England to breed silkworms and produce silk, but all have failed. The climate is against such enterprises.

SCRUTATOR.—The "engaged" finger is the third of the right hand, the counterpart of the marriage finger on the left. Is "Scrutator" engaged? We wish our correspondent joy.

B. V. N.—The marks left by the smallpox are indelible. Pray do not be foolish enough to use any "powerful remedies" to get rid of them. You will only injure yourself. "What can't be cured," says the proverb, "must be endured."

J. H.—The "Company of Merchants trading to the East Indies" was first incorporated in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. You will find all particulars in former numbers.

B. K.—Many of our festive observances are founded on customs that existed before the birth of our Saviour. Even the custom of sending valentines is founded on an observance in vogue among the Roman citizens a couple of centuries before the Christian era.

JOHNNY STYLES says he is coming to London with his father, who has promised to take him to see a "Pantomime." ("Johnny" should call it "Pantomime," from παρ, παντοει, all, and μιμος, a mimic), and he asks our opinion as to which is the best. Now, we must confess to "Johnny" that, from our own knowledge, we cannot give an opinion, for theatrical managers do not favour us with free admissions, because it is not our province to notice theatricals. However, showing "Johnny's" letter to a gentleman connected with the press, he at once exclaimed, "Tell 'Johnny' that if he is determined to see a pantomime, I should recommend him to select the Haymarket, for it is not only one of the best pantomimes, but the scenery is most beautiful."

PUZZLE asks whether the statement made by Lord Derby in the House of Lords, that our imports for the last three years had exceeded our exports during the same period by £150,000,000, is correct; for he thinks that if it is, the country must be in a disastrous condition. "Puzzle's" difficulty doubtless arises from the indefinite meaning of the terms, exports and imports, which, in the published returns, only include "produce." They now, however, comprise bullion also; and, as this bullion includes all the gold received by us in payment of exports, we can thus account satisfactorily for that balance in favour of the imports of which Lord Derby speaks.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Friendship above all ties doth bind the heart;
And faith in friendship is the noblest part.

LORD ORRERY.

By this time we trust that our readers feel anxious to hear something respecting the Markhams. It would be ungenerous to trifle with so natural a desire, a proof of the interest the tale of the husband's errors and his wife's devotion has excited in their minds; to say nothing of the loss of their son which still weighed with hopeless sorrow on the hearts of both his parents.

When Peter Mangles informed his employer of Rachel's resolution not to abandon her husband in the path of reformation, which at its commencement requires kind words and patient smiles to cheer us onwards—for it is only towards its close that the thorns become less jagged and flowers begin to bloom—Mr. Bently could not conceal either his surprise or anger.

"This is madness! infatuation!" he exclaimed. "What can she expect from a drunkard? Happiness? absurd! as well seek fire in ice, darkness in the blaze of sunshine. The bitter experience of the past might tell her what the future is likely to prove."

"But George is no longer a drunkard," observed the old clerk, deprecatingly, and with a slight degree of hesitation, as if he did not feel quite convinced himself.

"A thief!" added the merchant, passionately. This accusation was most unjust, and, but for the excitement he was labouring under, the speaker would not have made it. Peter, who had long since come to a conclusion upon the subject, now felt himself on sure ground, and warmly took the cudgels in defence of his protégé.

"You have fallen into one of your evil moods again, Richard," he replied; "how often must I repeat to you that your son-in-law is as honest as yourself. You may stare and turn away impatiently," he added, "but I won't give up that point."

"Who else could?"

"Who else?" interrupted the old man, "why,—but no, no—I'll not fall into a similar error—imitate your example and take away any man's character without proof."

"I know where your suspicions point at," observed his employer.

"Perhaps you do."

"They are absurd."

"Absurd!" repeated Peter, sharply; "perhaps they were absurd when they saved the firm a much larger sum than the missing securities ever realised, in Gridleston's affair. You thought them honest, I believe—placed unlimited confidence in their representations; I suspected them to be rogues, and acted accordingly."

"You do not like my nephew," observed the merchant, somewhat angrily.

The clerk shrugged his shoulders, a constant habit when unable to contradict an assertion.

"You do not deny it."

"I have not forgotten his conduct to your daughter on the bridge, although her father has," answered the former speaker.

"Carus has explained it," said Mr. Bently. "At first I felt indignant at it too, and spoke to him harshly upon the subject. His motives were to induce her to quit the man who has destroyed her happiness for ever. Rachel must have exaggerated his words and manner."

"Pah!" ejaculated Peter Mangles, with a look of incredulity.

"I know the reason of your aversion to him," continued the merchant.

"Do you?"

"He thwarted you in your wish of sending Sterling out to India instead of Sanford, and you have never forgiven it."

"Never!" exclaimed the old man, emphatically; "for it lost the only chance of clearing up the mystery of the securities. Sterling had been brought up in the counting-house under my own eye, possessed a clear head for business, and not a whit clearer than his integrity, whilst Sanford—but there, I have done—speak of it no more."

"You are still determined to continue your protection to Rachel?" observed his employer.

"I am."

"And to her husband?"

"To George too."

"Although you know that it is a barrier to a reconciliation with my child," said Mr. Bently, bitterly; "were you to abandon him, she would soon see the necessity of separating from him."

"Feel it, you mean," replied the clerk; "but even there you are mistaken, as you generally are. You may be very clever at figures, Richard,—in fact you are clever at them, thanks to my instruction, for you know I taught you—but there is one problem you can't solve—the depth of a wife's affection. I have only just begun," he added, in a tone of naive confidence, "to calculate it myself, and find it unfathomable. Whilst George pursues the path he has chosen, the iron grasp of poverty would not prove strong enough to tear Rachel from his side."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the merchant, impatiently; "do you believe in such romantic nonsense, at your time of life?"

"Well, the belief certainly did come rather late," observed the old man; "had it struck me thirty, or five-and-thirty years ago, the probability is I should not now be a bachelor. Perhaps," he added, musingly, "it is not too late."

Despite his anger, the disappointed father could not repress a smile; there was something irresistibly ridiculous in the idea of the speaker ever taking a wife. Peter Mangles noticed the curl of his lips; the half-suppressed drawing down of the corners of the mouth; and began to feel exceedingly indignant. It acted like a spark to the train of gunpowder already laid; an explosion became inevitable.

"I insist upon knowing what you mean by that smile, Richard," he exclaimed; "it was a most impertinent smile; in fact, I may say, an offensive smile. What is there either absurd or unreasonable in the possibility of my marrying?"

"Neither one nor the other," replied Mr. Bently.

"Glad to hear it," said his clerk, looking him very hard in the face to see whether or not the smile was repeated.

"I see no reason against it," added the speaker, "if you do not. But this is not the point; what I am anxious about is, that your confidence in George Markham should not lead you too far."

"Take care that your prejudice against him don't lead you in an opposite direction," retorted the old man; "you have been unjust enough already."

"He is not fit to be trusted with money."

"My money is my own!" exclaimed Peter, warmly; for he had not yet forgotten, or quite forgiven, the smile. "I worked for it, and earned it hardly enough; and I shall do exactly as I think fit with it,—let George make ducks and drakes with it, if I feel disposed, without asking any one's permission. Mind, Richard, I said any one's: you know what I mean by that. And now," he added, "as I have Mellinger's accounts to go over, let us drop the subject; don't unsettle me any more. You have chosen your line of conduct to your daughter and your son-in-law; I have made up my mind to mine."

The above conversation had taken place in the counting-house in the city a day or two after Rachel's interview with her husband. At first Peter felt something more than dissatisfied with her decision; he pronounced it madness and folly, but having heard all she had to urge, and listened to George's explanation of the motives of his night walks in London, he gradually came to a different conclusion.

The correctness of his petty cash-book had not yet lost its influence on the old man's mind.

Although Peter Mangles, like a certain distinguished political personage, loudly asserted his right of doing what he pleased with his own, even to allowing George Markham to make ducks and drakes of his money, he was about the last man in the world to be really guilty of such an act of folly. His liberality to the objects of his bounty was directed by a prudence no less judicious than kind; and although the society of Rachel and little Mary had become almost a necessity to him, he resolved to deprive himself of it as soon as the health of the former would admit of her removal to the neat little cottage he had taken and furnished for her in the Charlton-road, close to the factory where George was engaged. The old man longed to see them independent, unrestrained by his presence, no eye constantly overlooking them.

That was the way, he thought, to judge them.

It was astonishing what interest Peter Mangles had taken in furnishing the cottage. Had it been for himself he would not have felt half so great a pleasure. Scarcely an evening that on his return from the city he did not bring some useful articles with him; articles which Mrs. Lawrence, his housekeeper, jealously observed she had always been obliged to manage without. She could not imagine how he came to know even the names of many of the things, and concluded by amiably and mentally congratulating herself on never having hinted at any such extravagance. So her conscience was at rest.

Of course it was; for it was affection that suggested them. There is a spring in every heart, whose existence may remain unsuspected for years, even by its possessor, till some chord is struck, some powerful emotion or feeling breaks the seal, when the waters gush forth, fresh and sparkling. In other words, it is circumstance that develops the purest and best sensibilities of our nature.

This was exactly the case with Peter Mangles. Under ordinary circumstances, George Markham would have been to him no more than any other clerk in the firm who conducted himself steadily, wrote a clear hand, and happened to be quick at accounts. It was his marriage with the only child of his old friend, and that old friend's harsh treatment of him, which first excited a deeper interest. And this interest the presence of Rachel under his roof strengthened and confirmed, till he became doubly anxious for the husband's welfare on her account. In fact, so much so, that for several weeks he quitted his home half an hour earlier every morning, purposely to walk round by the factory where George was engaged as time-keeper. And when he recognised him, pen in hand, and the book before him, the old man smiled cheerfully, and went on his way rejoicing.

The cottage had long been ready, but from day to day the departure of Rachel and the child for their new abode was delayed. Their benefactor had always some alteration to suggest—some addition to make to the comforts he had already provided. At last, after a great effort, the old man made up his mind to the separation; but not without a struggle: for home would no longer appear home without them; but Peter never tampered with principle—it was so very unbusiness-like.

He insisted upon conducting them to their new abode himself, and showed them over the house with the pride and satisfaction which an honest heart feels in the sweet consciousness of having acted nobly.

The eyes of Rachel filled with tears.

"My benefactor!" she exclaimed, trying to kiss his hand—a proceeding which the old clerk would not by any means permit; "how can I ever show my gratitude for such unexampled goodness?"

"Say no more," replied Peter, deeply moved. "If the parent bird forsakes its young, some one must supply its place."

"My future conduct, sir," observed George Markham, "must be my thanks."

"That's it, my dear boy: the only thanks I require. Make Rachel happy, and I shall be amply repaid: the most profitable investment I ever made in my life," he added. "Cent. per cent. at the very least, and without usury"—a thing the speaker particularly abhorred.

Mary, who, with childish curiosity, had been running all over the house, came into the neat little parlour.

"O mamma!" she exclaimed; "have you seen my room? such a pretty white bed, and—would you believe it?—a doll—a real doll—in it!"

Peter Mangles must have been very far gone in his affection to the Markhams and their child when he thought of such a thing.

"You will want something to amuse you," he observed. "I am sure I shall," he added; "for I shall miss you sadly."

"You will stay with us?" exclaimed the child, looking anxiously in his face.

The old man shook his head.

Mary burst into tears; declared that she would not have the doll—that she hated dolls; insisted upon his living with them, and concluded by throwing her little arms around his neck and kissing him.

Peter Mangles felt very much inclined to follow her example, and cry too; but he determined not to give way to any such weakness—it would be unbusiness-like: so he buttoned up his greatcoat with an air of great determination, shook hands with George and his wife, muttered something which sounded very indistinctly as he parted the flaxen curls of the child and pressed his lips to her forehead, then marched out of the cottage.

"May heaven reward him!" exclaimed Rachel—"we never can."

The clerk felt his heart exceedingly heavy as he trudged over Blackheath towards his home, where only Mrs. Lawrence and the parrot—which, to the great satisfaction of the last-mentioned personage, had been sent for back—were waiting to receive him. He had no one to talk to now; no Mary to run and meet him in the passage, climb upon his knees as he sat at tea, and insist upon his telling her a pretty story, instead of reading the nasty evening paper: no wonder the change seemed lonely.

Mary's tears, and above all, the kiss, had made a deep impression upon Peter. He felt proud of the love of the fair and innocent child; and he was right, for if there is an affection upon earth free from the taint, the suspicion of interest, it is the artless love of infancy.

"She shall never know want," he thought; "let her grandfather do as he likes with his money, I am the master of mine."

Then he reflected how delightful it would be, if Providence spared her life, to see Mary grow up to womanhood and marry. In his anxiety for her happiness he planned it all as he sat indulging in his waking dreams by the side of the cheerful fire. Her husband was to be a city man, that was a sine qua non, the junior partner in some well-established firm, to whom a few thousands might prove an advantage—help him on—whom Peter could advise.

We cannot inform our readers where the few thousands were to come from; but Peter knew, and that was quite sufficient.

In his meditations he pined his employer, whom he knew to be unhappy, despite his wealth, and too obstinate to take the only sensible means, as he thought, to repair the errors of the past, by a reconciliation with his daughter.

"It is all that rascal Carus's fault," he murmured: "he has set Richard against his son-in-law. George, with all his folly, is worth a hundred of him in principle; and, if he will only keep steady, may one day be so in money. Steady," he repeated several times to himself. "I can't imagine, for my part, how young men can be otherwise—what pleasure they can possibly find out of business. I never found any—till lately," he added, "very lately."

With respect to the nephew of his employer, he consoled himself with the conviction that one day he should be able to unmask him; for if anything that was wrong occurred in the firm, it could only be through him. Peter kept too close an eye upon the clerks for them to deceive him; but Carus Kearn, as junior partner, had an authority which even his supervision could not always control.

Every evening, on his return from the city, did their benefactor visit the cottage of the Markhams. The first evening that he saw George button on his greatcoat, with the evident intention of going out, he felt a little uneasy till the sad smile of Rachel reassured him. Regularly, twice a week, did the repentant father devote the whole night to searching through the purlies and resorts of crime in London, in the hope of obtaining a clue to his lost son. Hitherto he had proved unsuccessful, but the attempt, forlorn as it seemed, was not abandoned.

"Aye," thought Peter, "if the boy would only turn up, that would bring his grandfather to reason: nothing else will."

This last reflection he wisely kept to himself.

Although the salary which George Markham received was a very humble one, both husband and wife assured their benefactor that it was quite sufficient for their wants, and firmly declined receiving any further assistance from him. The old clerk felt delighted, for he had a great idea of independence, and respected his protégé the more for his perseverance and attention in a position so inferior to his capacity. When told that the heads of the firm, struck with the good conduct of their time-keeper, had offered him a seat in their counting-house, at a handsome increase, he felt as proud and satisfied as ever he had been at his own success in life.

To Rachel, also, it was most gratifying. It seemed the seal of her husband's reformation, the pledge that he would never again fall into the fatal error which had caused his ruin.

The morning after the affair was finally arranged, Peter Mangles arrived ten minutes later than usual in the city. The junior clerks looked surprised, and suspected that for once St. Paul's was a little too fast; a far more likely circumstance, in their opinion, than Old Punctuality, as they called him, being beyond his time.

Strange to say, Carus Kearn, who seldom made his appearance in the counting-house before twelve, had arrived before him.

"Ah!" exclaimed Peter, with a satirical smile, "the Indian mail is in."

"You have seen the papers, I suppose?" observed the gentleman, colouring slightly.

"No."

"How did you know it, then?"

"You are here."

"Have you gone through the correspondence?" inquired Carus, eagerly.

A dry negative from the old man was the only reply.

"I wish you would. I expect private letters."

Peter drew from his pocket the key of the letter-box.

"Stop, stop!" he exclaimed, as Carus stretched forth his hand to seize on the contents; "I can't have the letters opened in that way—it's not business-like."

Placing them methodically before him, the speaker began looking them over.

"Grindham and Polk, Swan and Tapton, Bright and Peek, Marks and Winton."

These were the names of foreign firms with whom the house of Bently and Company corresponded.

"You are very particular," muttered Carus, impatiently.

"Can't be too much so," replied Peter.

"With the clerks, of course not."

"With every one."

"You forget I am a partner."

"I seldom forget anything, Mr. Kearn," replied the old man; "not even that you have an eighth share in the business. Dear me! ah,—another proof of the excellence of my memory—here is the letter you expect, in the handwriting of your friend Sanford."

A second time a satirical smile played upon the lips of the speaker. Carus snatched the letter hastily from his hand, and broke the seal.

"Any news for the firm?"

"No, it is not a business letter."

"Then it's no affair of mine," answered Peter Mangles, sorting the remaining portion of the correspondence.

"Bless me!" he added to himself, "who can this be from?"

The letter alluded to was addressed in a gentlemanly, but unbusiness-like hand, to Mr. Bently; sealed with a coat of arms, and marked "private;" postmark, Jersey.

"The second letter within a month," thought Peter, "I wonder if Richard has any private speculations there. I dare say he has."

When Mr. Bently arrived in the city, the only letter he looked over was the one which had excited the curiosity of the speaker. He read it carefully, and a smile played for an instant on his usually grave features.

"Business?" said his clerk.

"Private," answered the merchant. "Did you not perceive that it is marked so? I have no business secrets from you."

Peter Mangles was quite convinced of that.

"Here are other letters," he said, "from India."

"Oh! never mind them," interrupted his employer; "you know how to answer them."

"Your nephew had one from his friend Sanford," observed the former speaker. "He appeared very anxious respecting it; found him here on my arrival. He does not usually make his appearance so early."

"Indeed! and what would you infer from that?"

"Nothing! nothing!" replied the old man; "only it struck me as rather singular that both partners should have letters marked 'Private' on the same day.

But I have other news," he added, in a tone of great complacency. "Ranson and Co. are so satisfied with the exemplary conduct of your son-in-law, that they have offered him a desk in their counting-house."

Mr. Bently listened attentively, and despite the effort to conceal it, seemed satisfied with the intelligence.

"Has he accepted it?" he asked.

"Commenced this morning."

For the first time for several weeks, her father inquired after the health of Rachel.

"Better, Richard, much better," replied Peter, who invariably addressed him by his Christian name, when he felt either pleased or dissatisfied with him. "The perfect reformation of her husband is a subject of deep contentment to her."

"She is happy now, then?" observed the merchant, with a sigh.
